START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

MARCH 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-019

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 19

Volume 39

BSO-POPS
1919-1920

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 39

BSO
Pops

1919 - 1920

Dr. Muck

Press (1919-1920)

THE IMPROVED COLUMBIAN CLASP NO. 83
PAT. JAN. 7, '19
THE UNITED STATES ENVELOPE CO. SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Dr. Much
Prus (1919-1920)

THE IMPROVED COLUMBIAN CLASP NO. 83
PAT. JAN. 7, '19
THE UNITED STATES ENVELOPE CO. SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

DAMAGED PAGE

Laugh, ~~for the time is~~ Laugh and be proud

The Great Breakfast
Table Paper of New England

The Boston

TWENTY-SIX PAGES—TWO CENTS Established 1831 THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 19

DR. MUCK HAD FRIENDS WITH GREAT POWER

Department of Justice Officials Were Greatly Hampered in Completing Case Against Enemy

The gathering of the evidence that led to the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck was no simple matter. There are some phases of it which will stagger patriotic men and women when they learn of the difficulties and disappointments under which the men of the Department of Justice were laboring. Fate was kind to Dr. Muck for a long time and fate had helpers.

That Dr. Muck's claim to Swiss citizenship was a pure fake was quite well known to men of the Department of Justice who were trying to close up the net they had woven about him. In spite of this Dr. Muck had presented a Swiss passport to the State Department and applied for permission to leave America. A great deal of stock was taken in Dr. Muck's claim to Swiss citizenship in certain quarters, and it is not impossible that Dr. Muck might have gotten away with it and departed for Switzerland had not the agents of the Department of Justice been able to spring the trap and land him in jail. And when he was safe in jail the Department of Justice officials had the evidence to keep him there.

MUCK HAD POWERFUL FRIENDS

In all the history of America at war there never was a case where so much influence was exerted in behalf of an admitted enemy of America as in the case of Dr. Muck. And all the influence was not from "sympathizers." He had "friends" in places where "friends" could do him the most good.

When the entire history of the Muck case is told, the amazing struggle of George E. Kelleher and Norman L. Gifford of the Boston bureau of the Department of Justice against forces they never dreamed would be set in motion to save an enemy of America in war time will be clear to most people.

These men were face to face with the cleverest rascals in Germany's service here in America and more than that, these alien enemies had the most remarkable facility for gaining important information and powerful support. Dr. Muck had months and months of immunity. Time and again the agents of the Department of Justice found the way blocked. More than once they despaired of ever bringing him to justice.

PATRIOTISM AGAINST INTRIGUE

Less conscientious [illegible] and patriotic officials would have given up the struggle. But they were bound to win in the end. Patriotism was a match for intrigue.

After Dr. Muck had been safely landed in an internment camp the struggle was not yet over. The story that he was guiltless and was "railroaded" was set in motion. The men who arrested him were again helpless. They knew the evidence, but could not of themselves make it public. A hint of the real evidence against Dr. Muck appeared in the Post some months ago. The story was absolutely true. A notorious German propagandist who happens to be a citizen of America wrote to a New York paper, denouncing the entire story as a lie and as a dastardly

Continued on Page 7—Second Col.

Statement of Condition at Close of

D'OLIER MADE LEGION HEAD

Pennsylvania Man Elected Commander—Logan Withdrew Candidacy—Chambers Is 4th Vice

BY HERBERT L. BALDWIN
Post Staff Correspondent

MINNEAPOLIS, Nov. 12.—Franklin D. D'Olier of Pennsylvania, former lieutenant-colonel in the Quartermaster Corps, A. E. F., was tonight elected national commander of the American Legion. He won the honor by a vote of 366 to 291 over his nearest competitor, Hanford MacNider of Mason City, Ia.

The convention adjourned tonight. It will convene in Cleveland Sept. 27, 1920.

Colonel Edward L. Logan of Massachusetts was not entered as a candidate. The Bay State commander withdrew from the contest early this afternoon after he, in a speech before the convention, cast aside all personal ambitions and chances for possible election, by attacking the "steam roller" methods of the convention and censuring the New York delegation, members of which, he said, had been circulating unpleasant reports about him throughout the convention hall.

Continued on Page 16—First Col.

SKULL BROKEN IN AUTO UPSET

Boston Insurance Man I[illegible] jured in North AttleB[illegible]

NORTH ATTLEBORO, Nov. [illegible] uel R. Crowell, a Boston insur[illegible] with offices at 159 Devonshir[illegible] on the danger list at the Sa[illegible] rial Hospital, Pawtucket, su[illegible] a fractured skull sustained [illegible] tomobile blew a tire and [illegible] South Washington stree[illegible] ternoon.

H. Brooks Allen, 12[illegible] Boston, an associate[illegible] well as Samuel Vor[illegible] Chelsea, the chauffe[illegible] were allowed to g[illegible]

Crowell was en[illegible] train to New Y[illegible] was proceeding [illegible] when the crash[illegible]

FOUND

Mary Ro[illegible] in the roo[illegible] cord street[illegible] in a ch[illegible] landlad[illegible] sary t[illegible] assist[illegible] East[illegible]

ROF[illegible] A[illegible]

PLAN TO DEPORT I. W. W[illegible]

68 Taken in [illegible] Washingt[illegible] "Lite[illegible]

RADICALS [illegible] KEEP C[illegible]

16-Y[illegible] C[illegible]

TELEPHONE 6560 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Symphony

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS

Address Pittsburgh, Pa.

Date NOV 23 1919

Established: Lo

From ENQUIRER, Cincinnati, Ohio

FEB 8 1920 A

MUSICIANS SEEK ADVANCE.

Boston, Mass., February 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages, and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused. "Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, said.

From RECORD

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 6 1920 B

Boston Symphony Program.

The program for the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening has been changed and will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major; Mozart, aria, "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni;" Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyll; songs with orchestra, (a) two berceuses from "The Kiss," by Smetana; (b) song from "Rusalka," Dvorak; Wagner, excerpts from Act 3 of "The Mastersingers," introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices," "Welcome to Hans Sachs." The soloist is Emma Destinn.

'May the Devil Take Pittsburg!'

Wrote Boston Symphony Conductor

New Muck Letters Made Public

Copyright, 1919, (Boston Post.)

Boston, Nov. 22.—New letters written by Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are being made public here.

Apparently, while giving a concert in Pittsburg, in January, 1917, Dr. Muck was unable to restrain his venom when his eyes met the picture of the great steel mills turning out cannon and munitions to be used against the Fatherland. In a letter written to a girl from this point he says:

"May the devil take this Pittsburg—a horrible day—Thank God, it is already 1 o'clock at night, and in eight hours I can leave this cursed munition mess. . . . You cannot imagine with what vexation and with what disgust I stood before this public, which teemed with diamonds. "KARL."

The doctor's violent conviction with regard to the war are most explicitly shown in this letter, dated Cleveland, O., Jan. 28, 1916:

". . . Of course, Pittsburg is indeed the main center for the manufacture of American neutrality murdering instruments. . . . When, yesterday, I got onto the stage in Pittsburg in the sold-out house of Carnegie Hall, and saw the thousands sitting before me who through the murder of my people have earned and still earn millions, everything became red before my eyes. It required my full strength not to shriek out loud, but enough, there is a reckoning justice coming in the world history, that is my only comfort. "KARL."

Further villification of America is contained in a letter postmarked April 3, 1916, which reads as follows:

"This whole county is ruled by a crowd of bums who are tainted with English money, and my only hope is that the American people will finally wake up again and hang the few dozen bums to the highest tree which grows in the county. . . . My conscience is quite clear, and when the bums shall venture against me they will repeat it bitterly—that I can assure you.

"Be calm and take good care of yourself. "KARL."

From Springf[illegible]

MAR 8 1920 X

UNION

Central Labor Union Acts in Symphony Trouble

BOSTON, March 7—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions today asking the trus[illegible] of the Boston Symphony orch[illegible] reinstate Frederic Fradk[illegible]ert master, who was dismisse[illegible]ilure to acknowledge applaus[illegible]e resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players. They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organisation which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

From Times

New York City

DISMISS CONCERT MASTER.

Boston Symphony Trustees Drop Fradkin for Disobeying Conductor.

BOSTON, March 5.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the Board of Trustees tonight.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, President of the Trustees, said that the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement, in that he did not comply with the nistructions of the conductor (Montaux) in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. Mr. Fradkin said afterward that he thought the applause was meant for the conductor.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the Trustees over salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, came to a head at a concert last night when Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

A committee representing union members of the orchestra issued a statement upholding the concert master.

From Springfield, Mass.

MAR 1 1920 UNION

NO CHECKS FOR SYMPHONY MEN

Trustees to Pass on Men's Cases Before They Are Paid.

BOSTON, March 10—When the salary checks were passed out to members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall after the rehearsal yesterday morning, the 35 musicians who declared themselves on strike last Saturday night discovered that no checks had been made out for them. The weekly checks were given to the other players.

The absence of the checks was discussed by these 35 men and it was decided to send the committee to Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees for an explanation. A conference was arranged and held at Symphony Hall during the afternoon lasting about half an hour.

Members of the committee, when seen at the Back Bay Station, where they boarded a special train for Providence, said that Judge Cabot informed them that the checks for the "strikers" would not be given them until after a meeting of the trustees, at which it would be decided which of the men, who were accused of violating their contracts Saturday night would be retained in the orchestra and which were to be discharged.

Members of the committee stated that they did not worry over this answer of Judge Cabot, owing to the fact that according to their attorney, the alleged "breach of contract" was voided by the action of the management of the orchestra in allowing the men to take part in the rehearsals of Monday and yesterday mornings and in taking them to Providence last night.

What action will be taken by the union in the event that any of the men who went on "strike" are discharged could not be told by the committee last night, but the opinion was expressed that the union would back the discharged men to the limit in fighting their grievances in the courts.

A special meeting of the union members will be held tday.

From Herald

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY DISMISSES FRADKIN

Didn't Rise for Applause—Members Join Union.

Boston, March 5.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late to-night.

Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in a letter to Fradkin the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgement of applause. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

Mr. Fradkin said to-night that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the trustees concerning salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members of the orchestra had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians came to a head at a concert last right when Conductor Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

A committee representing union members of the orchestra issued a statement upholding the concert master.

From Star

New York City

MUSICIANS WANT MORE

Boston, Feb. 19.—The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined for a wage increase which would approximate $100,000 yearly. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has refused the request on the ground that the orchestra cannot afford the increase. The musicians have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. This, however, is not now an issue between the players and management. Recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would assume the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Republican

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON STRIKE

Thirty Members Refuse to Take Seats When Reinstatement Is Refused Concert Master

Boston, March 6—About 30 members of the symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS SEEK INCREASE IN WAGES

Demands Aggregating $100,000 More Pay Refused; May Join Union.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day. The question of union membership is not an issue between players and management, he explained, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the trustees had recently received a letter from some of the players, in which they asked for more wages, on the ground that their present compensation was inadequate under increased living costs. The number of players who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 90. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request were available. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question, with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

ESTABLISHED

From JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

APR 18 1920 A

Invitations to renew subscriptions to the Boston Symphony's concerts in Boston next season show that there will be an advance of 10 per cent. in the price of tickets. It is not unlikely that the same raise will be made upon the tickets here next year.

* * *

SUN

ss: Baltimore, Md.

[illegible] 1920 E

—The man who said, "This is the unkindest cut of all," was probably trying to eat one of those cheaper cuts advised by Palmer.

—Perhaps members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra went on strike because they couldn't pay the rent on their flats. That would B natural.

TELEPHONE 8560 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS

Address Pittsburgh, Pa.

Date NOV 23 1919

Established: Lo

From ENQUIRER,
Cincinnati, Ohio

MUSICIANS SEEK ADVANCE.

Boston, Mass., February 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages, and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused. "Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, said.

RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Program.

The program for the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening has been changed and will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major; Mozart, aria, "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni;" Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyll; songs with orchestra, (a) two berceuses from "The Kiss," by Smetana; (b) song from "Rusalka," Dvorak; Wagner, excerpts from Act 3 of "The Mastersingers," introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices," "Welcome to Hans Sachs." The soloist is Emma Destinn.

May the Devil Take Pittsburg!

Wrote Boston Symphony Conductor

New Muck Letters Made Public

Copyright, 1919, (Boston Post.)

Boston, Nov. 22.—New letters written by Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are being made public here.

Apparently, while giving a concert in Pittsburg, in January, 1917, Dr. Muck was unable to restrain his venom when his eyes met the picture of the great steel mills turning out cannon and munitions to be used against the Fatherland. In a letter written to a girl from this point he says:

> "May the devil take this Pittsburg—a horrible day—Thank God, it is already 1 o'clock at night, and in eight hours I can leave this cursed munition mess. . . . You cannot imagine with what vexation and with what disgust I stood before this public, which teemed with diamonds.
> "KARL."

The doctor's violent conviction with regard to the war are most explicitly shown in this letter, dated Cleveland, O., Jan. 28, 1916:

> ". . . Of course, Pittsburg is indeed the main center for the manufacture of American neutrality murdering instruments. . . . When, yesterday, I got onto the stage in Pittsburg in the sold-out house of Carnegie Hall, and saw the thousands sitting before me who through the murder of my people have earned and still earn millions, everything became red before my eyes. It required my full strength not to shriek out loud, but enough, there is a reckoning justice coming in the world history, that is my only comfort.
> "KARL."

Further villification of America is contained in a letter postmarked April 3, 1916, which reads as follows:

> "This whole county is ruled by a crowd of bums who are tainted with English money, and my only hope is that the American people will finally wake up again and hang the few dozen bums to the highest tree which grows in the county. . . . My conscience is quite clear, and when the bums shall venture against me they will repent it bitterly—that I can assure you.
> "Be calm and take good care of yourself.
> "KARL."

From Springf
MAR 8 1920 X

UNION

Central Labor Union Acts in Symphony Trouble

BOSTON, March 7—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions today asking the trus[illegible] the Boston Symphony orch[illegible] reinstate Frederic Fradk[illegible]ert master, who was dismisse[illegible]ilure to acknowledge applaus[illegible]e resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players. They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organisation which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

From Times
New York City

DISMISS CONCERT MASTER.

Boston Symphony Trustees Drop Fradkin for Disobeying Conductor.

BOSTON, March 5.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the Board of Trustees tonight.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, President of the Trustees, said that the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement, in that he did not comply with the nistructions of the conductor (Montaux) in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. Mr. Fradkin said afterward that he thought the applause was meant for the conductor.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the Trustees over salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, came to a head at a concert last night when Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

A committee representing union members of the orchestra issued a statement upholding the concert master.

From Springfield, Mass.
MAR UNION 1920

NO CHECKS FOR SYMPHONY MEN

Trustees to Pass on Men's Cases Before They Are Paid.

BOSTON, March 10—When the salary checks were passed out to members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall after the rehearsal yesterday morning, the 35 musicians who declared themselves on strike last Saturday night discovered that no checks had been made out for them. The weekly checks were given to the other players.

The absence of the checks was discussed by these 35 men and it was decided to send the committee to Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees for an explanation. A conference was arranged and held at Symphony Hall during the afternoon lasting about half an hour.

Members of the committee, when seen at the Back Bay Station, where they boarded a special train for Providence, said that Judge Cabot informed them that the checks for the "strikers" would not be given them until after a meeting of the trustees, at which it would be decided which of the men, who were accused of violating their contracts Saturday night would be retained in the orchestra and which were to be discharged.

Members of the committee stated that they did not worry over this answer of Judge Cabot, owing to the fact that according to their attorney, the alleged "breach of contract" was voided by the action of the management of the orchestra in allowing the men to take part in the rehearsals of Monday and yesterday mornings and in taking them to Providence last night.

What action will be taken by the union in the event that any of the men who went on "strike" are discharged could not be told by the committee last night, but the opinion was expressed that the union would back the discharged men to the limit in fighting their grievances in the courts.

A special meeting of the union members will be held tday.

From Herald
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY DISMISSES FRADKIN

Didn't Rise for Applause—Members Join Union.

Boston, March 5.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late to-night.

Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in a letter to Fradkin the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgement of applause. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

Mr. Fradkin said to-night that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the trustees concerning salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members of the orchestra had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians came to a head at a concert last night when Conductor Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

A committee representing union members of the orchestra issued a statement upholding the concert master.

From Star
New York City

MUSICIANS WANT MORE

Boston, Feb. 19.—The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined for a wage increase which would approximate $100,000 yearly. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has refused the request on the ground that the orchestra cannot afford the increase. The musicians have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. This, however, is not now an issue between the players and management. Recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would assume the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS SEEK INCREASE IN WAGES

Demands Aggregating $100,000 More Pay Refused; May Join Union.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day. The question of union membership is not an issue between players and management, he explained, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the trustees had recently received a letter from some of the players, in which they asked for more wages, on the ground that their present compensation was inadequate under increased living costs. The number of players who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request were available. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question, with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

ABLISHED 1881

om Republican
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON STRIKE

Thirty Members Refuse to Take Seats When Reinstatement Is Refused Concert Master

Boston, March 6—About 30 members of the symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

ESTABLISHED
From JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

APR 18 1920 A

Invitations to renew subscriptions to the Boston Symphony's concerts in Boston next season show that there will be an advance of 10 per cent. in the price of tickets. It is not unlikely that the same raise will be made upon the tickets here next year.

* * *

SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.

—The man who said, "This is the unkindest cut of all," was probably trying to eat one of those cheaper cuts advised by Palmer.

—Perhaps members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra went on strike because they couldn't pay the rent on their flats. That would B natural.

Muck Kept List of Women Who Aided

Continued From First Page

Every single person there, every man, woman and child, sacrifices himself. We Germans here can only look on from a distance. That alone has been making me more and more miserable for the last two years. When, then, I undertook work here to the best of my ability for my country, that is only my duty and share. I would have to die of shame if I did not do it. Whether I will later earn thanks God knows; I have not even thought of that. I am doing it not for the sake of thanks. It is possible that this war has shortened my life just as it has taken hundreds of thousands of other lives; but that is only a matter of course.

"With us in Germany the idea is first, the nation with relation to the state, and then the individual. Here in America the idea is: first the 'ego,' then the individual, and then, if there is time and space, perhaps the whole nation.

"We Germans have another conception of the duties of a citizen of the state. This conception is as old as German history. Even Tacitus has already spoken of it with great reverence in 'Germania,' and according to my opinion the German conception is far more democratic than the American individualism, which in the last analysis is nothing more when it is carried out to its full conclusion than officially approved egoism in its crudest form.

"You must not be angry with me for this historical, ethical exposition, but I had to give it to you because you spoke of thanks. The thought that any thanks was expected for anything which is done for the threatened Fatherland is to a German so far off that I was almost frightened when I read these words in your letter. What worries on my nerves and confuses me more than I can say is the shameless slander to which my people are exposed here. . . . . .

"Your Karl."

ASKED LETTERS BE DESTROYED

Had it not been for the efficient and quick work of the Department of Justice in the case of Dr. Muck it would not have been possible to link him up so thoroughly with the German propaganda in this country as was done. It appears that the warning given him that his interest in German propaganda would certainly result in his being caught in the web of the secret service made considerable impression for it was discovered by the agents in Boston that at his earnest solicitation many of the letters he had written between March, 1917, and March, 1918, had been destroyed.

He expressed the greatest anxiety concerning these letters and urged that they be destroyed, which leaves no doubt but what they were even of more incriminating character than those seized by the government. In a letter to a girl, referring to the burning of the letters, Dr. Muck says:

APPREHENDED SEARCH OF HOUSES

"The sacrificial fires which you made of my letters—yes, that seems a hard step for you; it was also a hard thought for me, too, at the time I read it, but it is perhaps the best way. In the midst of the present brutal hysteria it is better to exercise all possible care. Incredible as it seems, it is nevertheless not beyond the realm of possibility that there will be a search of the houses of all those people whom I personally know if once the 'hunt-down' party gain the upper hand."

The fanatical hatred which Dr. Muck had for those who opposed Germany is indicated in letters written during 1916 and 1917. At this time Dr. Muck was frequently in New York in conference with German spies and propagandists, who were later apprehended by the government. Many of these letters admit meetings and conference with German agents in this country.

"I was just on the point of writing you a philosophical letter when I was called away by the most important, pressing news; . . . My head is ready to split. The general situation looks very serious, but do not have any worry for me. I am doing my duty and nothing against the holy (Satan was once holy) laws of the so-called U. S. A. In vexation and haste, with a kiss.

"Your Karl."

CAMBRIDGE A "NEST OF HYPOCRITES"

Another reads:

"Thank you for your letter. . . . Today I must conduct at Cambridge again; that certainly suits my mood; this fanatical nest of hypocrites. . . . All good wishes for your concert tomorrow, from

"Your Karl."

Another to the girl reads:

"Today is a contrary day. . . . Today a postcard came from my brother, dated March 12th. My sister is slowly but surely getting worse, and the question of nourishment seems to be getting continually more unpleasant. In Bloomfontain (Transvaal) there is a monument in memory of 32,000 Boer women and children whom the English in the Boer war starved at Kitchener's orders. At that time the American papers were full of articles about the English brutality and bestiality and hundreds of protest meetings were held.

"Today the English attempt the same starvation process with about forty million women and children, but 'the cultivated Americans, full of humanitarian consideration and the rights of me... find this perfectly correct'; they are only German women and ch... dren who are starving; and, furthermore, America indeed is making these splendid millions of profits during this starvation process. . . . With deepest love.

"Your Karl."

INDIAN ONLY TRUE AMERICAN

"My dear———:

"I was so pleased with your long, dear letter which you put before my eyes yesterday, and God knows I certainly needed it, for my life is not too gay, but the joy has been dampened in the water. Only one thing from your letter is a pleasure that you write, namely: 'You could see from my letters that I was in a good humor.' That shows me that I must be a good comedian or perhaps a diplomat—one who says 'words are simply to hide thoughts'; but, joking aside, in order to assume that I now am in good humor—in order to assume that you must have been in a strikingly gay mood yourself: 'Is Wilson, is Roosevelt, is Elliot, is Elihu Root, is Lansing, is Choate, is Rice, is Page—are all these chief editors of the local papers come from the riffraff of Europe? Even you are no longer American. The only real, true, non-hyphenated American is the Indian; and 'reasonable American'—my dear———— yes, I know there are some. I myself know a few and they are as fine, blameless, upright souls as any in the world, but there is one of these perhaps for every million of the others; but enough of that . . . With greetings. Your Karl."

"You can well understand and realize . . . My dear sweetheart, you should arm yourself with patience; it is not yours, nor is it my fault, that the people here are so cheap and low. Believe me that there are a great number of people here who, from professional jealousy, political hatred or personal antipathy, etc., would give all they have if I could be in some way mixed up in a cheap scandal. . . . In the greatest vexation and excitement. Your Karl."

(To be Continued in Tomorrow's Post)

Be Pretty! Turn Gray Hair Dark

Try Grandmother's Old Favorite

HELP TRAFFIC

DRIVE HELPS

as Minute Men. This detail will speak two minutes on traffic at each of the leading theatres the remainder of the week.

Others of the corps will "buttonhole" taken into custody in... cials from the off... torney Nathan... county, aided... a repres... eral's... return... special... East...

Brothers Seize... Lowell 'R...

Continued From Fi...

OWI...

Cons... the tw... to the... and w... in the... morni... ter 19... that t... pictor... to inc... life an... old an... ducted... 101 La... to this... years a... It is... en...

Penn... matter... police... was ar... Worker... in adva... trodden... police f... an appe... the won...

Say Yo...

The ex... reported... of the L... tention... assemble... store. C... Dwyer, Superinte... facts the... the Depa... trict Att...

Yesterd... Tufts... grand... ing a... warran... the bro... tion of... assigne... and C... Cambri... yesterd... the adj...

When... into cu... protests... cerned... restaur... the po... norance... crime, have s... all the... ties ch... for the... timate... a gang...

Rate...

The... Lowell... Distric... Cambr... the d...

DAMAGED PAGE

Let a man try faithfully, manfully to be right; he will grow da

The Great Breakfast Table Paper of New England

The Boston

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES—TWO CENTS | Established 1831 | WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1919 **

MUCK FEARED SCANDAL MORE THAN ARREST

Was Not Observed by Secret Service as He Suspected Until Shortly Before Arrest

Dr. Karl Muck long before his arrest and even before the indignation against him arose had the persistent idea that he was being hounded and shadowed by secret service agents. If he wrote the truth in his letters, he believed that his every action was watched.

To those who do not know the facts there is an element of pathos in Dr. Muck's cry in one of his letters, "I am like a shabby dog here in this country, where every cutthroat may assail me with impunity." But the facts were entirely different. Dr. Muck had been left severely alone by the secret service men. No one had been detailed to shadow him, he was free to come and go as he liked. More than that, he was not even suspected of propaganda work.

PROMISED NOT TO MENTION WAR

The Symphony officials had Dr. Muck's word of honor that he would not so much as mention the war to anyone. He had expressed a full willingness to cut himself entirely adrift from Germany and German associates and be content to devote himself solely to music. Dr. Muck's word was taken at full value.

Continued on Page 9—First Column

Not Much

argument is necessary to sell

TICKET "SPECS" STUNG EMPTY SEATS PROVE

At Keith's Theatre last evening there were about 100 seats unoccupied which speculators had purchased a week ago. The internal revenue officers were hand, but the purchasers of the s did not put in an appearance.

MINERS BO... CALL O...

Obey Mandate Under P... Leaders in Anno... Declare Co...

PRINCE HAS ... PRAIS... U.S. P...

Lauds ... High...

DAMAGED PAGE

And yet 'tis when it mourns and fears,
The loaded spirit feels forgiven;

And through the mist of fa
We catch the clearest gli

The Great Breakfast Table Paper of New England

The Boston P

TWENTY PAGES—TWO CENTS | Established 1831 | MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1919 **

HOW MUCK FOOLED ALL HIS FRIENDS

Got Cash for Germany Here and Had Influence Where It Did Him Most Good

How Two Women Were Ruined —Allies' Friends Were Muck Contributors

Boston has probably seen the last of Dr. Karl Muck. Few people will now have the assurance to defend him, and fewer still venture to air his plans to return to America. The public by this time knows what manner of a man Dr. Karl Muck was and is. The truth about him has been told, but not by any means the entire truth.

There is still in the files of the government much against Dr. Muck that cannot be told in any newspaper, and perhaps never will be told.

It is possible that some day the Department of Justice will publish some of its evidence against a few highly placed Germans like Count von Bernstorff, for instance, and let in a little light on the personal character of men who represented a great government. It is safe to say that not one person in a million has

Continued on Page 18—Fifth Col.

MEXICAN OI
IN

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES—TWO CENTS | Established 1831

MUCK LISTED WOMEN WITH PHONE CALLS

Kept Record of Names and Activities in German Cause—Calls Cambridge 'Nest of Hypocrites'

The records of the Department of Justice show that in private memoranda of Dr. Karl Muck were found names of a number of women with their telephone numbers. Many of these were students in the musical schools and there are a number of German names among them. The agents of the Department of Justice found a number of memorandums in the doctor's pockets which were in code, and the telephone index in his house contained almost exclusively names of Germans.

It was clear that his house was the centre of German activities in Boston, and a large number of letters belonging to his wife referred to German causes, largely propaganda and ostensibly relief work. Just previous to his arrest a girl evidently began to be fearful of the doctor's activities for Germany, and she urged him to give them up. She feared that he would be discovered and punished. The following letter, which shows how thoroughly "Germanized" he was was in answer to the young woman's request that he cease his activities:

UNDERTOOK WORK FOR COUNTRY

"

"In the first place: a German who cannot now be in Germany during this terrible war is above all a poor devil.

Continued on Page 9—First Column

HUB FIRE CLUB QUITS A. F. OF L.

PRINCE GOLFS AND DANCES

Serious Orchestra Crisis Safely Passed

It is gratifying to know that the Philadelphia Orchestra, through the tactfulness of its management and the conciliatory disposition of its members, has early met and safely passed a crisis in its affairs so serious that had it not been successfully surmounted the existence of an invaluable institution which never meant so much to the city as it does today would have been gravely jeoparded. The trouble was that a scale of compensation which was established years ago had been rendered gravely inadequate by the changed and abnormal economic conditions from which not this country alone, but the whole world, is suffering. As the musicians discovered by painful experience that they could not live on the salaries they are receiving, when the time came to renew their contracts they naturally applied for an advance which, while not in itself unreasonable, would have been extremely embarrassing for the management to meet.

Notwithstanding the endowment fund for which the public a few months ago subscribed, the financial status of the Orchestra is far from being such as to place it in an easy and assured control of the situation. Its expenses of every kind have kept pace with the universal increase in the cost of living, and it could not have granted the requests of the players, reasonable for the most part as those requests were, without incurring a deficit beyond its ability to meet. Here was a dilemma which needed to be very diplomatically handled if disaster was to be avoided, for not only were the musicians not asking for more than they were entitled to get upon the abstract merits of the case, but they had the best of the strategical position.

Good orchestral players are just now in great demand. One after the other all the principal cities of the country are organizing orchestras of their own, and some of them are offering inducements more attractive than ours is able to present. Under these circumstances our men would hardly have had much, if any, difficulty in securing satisfactory engagements elsewhere, and as their terms could not be fully met, it became necessary to obtain their acceptance of the best compromise that the management felt justified in offering, or to face the prospect of a dissolution whose consequences must have been deplorable.

The success of the negotiations which were instituted to that end is very much to the credit alike of Mr. Arthur Judson, the Orchestra manager, by whom they were so skillfully and understandingly conducted, and of the musicians themselves, who when they had been convinced that the association was doing the very best it could, acquiesced in an arrangement which involved some disappointment of their hopes and expectations. In making this concession they showed a spirit which the music-loving people of this city will not be slow to appreciate.

DAMAGED PAGE

Resolve to be thyself; and know that
Who finds himself, loses his misery—M

The Boston P

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1919 **

Established 1831

—TWO CENTS

'able Paper
New England

ESTED
LEGED GENTS

im to Have Anarchist paign

CENTRE FOR LAND SYSTEM

eting Places dicals Loin City

ee persons on charges archy through the dis-le of literature of al-flammatory nature by isrupted, the police astic propaganda camby 50 or more agents,

y city and county of-stood to have led to losures pertaining to propaganda activities.
may come from the ties are now waging ultra-radicals. The were arrested:
Emerson Sproul, 36, et, Lowell, now out while awaiting trial for promoting an-

36, of 111 Harold ve been identified ements for a con-ge 22—Fifth Col.

NGS BANK Boston before 5
date

LOYALTY NOT IN MAKEUP OF DR. KARL MUCK

Disloyal to Germany, America, Wife, Major Higginson and Women Admirers

Copyright by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post).

Dr. Karl Muck was never loyal to anybody. He was disloyal to America which harbored him, fed him and honored him, because he plotted the destruction of America; he was disloyal to Germany because he denied his birthright and insisted he was a Swiss citizen; he was disloyal to his wife because he schemed to get a divorce from her and wed one of his numerous admirers here; he was disloyal to Major Higginson, the founder of the Symphony Orchestra, who believed in Muck, who trusted him in every way, who paid him an enormous salary, who made him the foremost musical figure in America, because the first chance he got he assailed bitterly the one man who was his friend and who stood by him even when the finger of suspicion had been pointed strongly in his direction.

The letters from Dr. Muck will show plainly in what offensive terms he speaks of Major Higginson. Dr. Muck owed practically his whole career to the head of the Symphony Orchestra, who made it possible, but he had nothing but words of scorn for him in private. The musical critics of the newspapers, for whom he affected to have a strong admiration, he told his real opinions about in some of his letters. There were women patrons of the Symphony Orchestra who were great admirers of Dr. Muck and from whom the doctor received numerous letters. His opinion of these women, who refused to believe that he was an enemy of America and American institutions, are also extremely interesting and revealing.

GIRL NOT THE ONLY ONE VICTIMIZED

The case against Dr. Muck does not depend entirely on letters already published in the Post which he wrote to a young Back Bay woman. She was not his only correspondent; she was not the only young woman who was victimized. Her part in the case is ended. She was very young and was deeply imposed upon. No blame rests on her, and their relations were not what might be argued from the letters which Dr. Muck wrote. There are other correspondents of Dr. Muck whose letters are even more interesting.

Continued on Page 20—First Col.

TREATY IS BY VOT

Reservation on Article 10 Pas in Same Form That Pr Meant Death of Pe

SMITH MAY YE MARRY FI

Miss Michaud Is Sti Ex-Paying Tell Leave Court A

Even while Marshal N. Smith, 20-year-old ex-paying teller of the National Shawmut Bank, was being raigned yesterday morning in Court answering to the having stolen more tha the bank, federal awaiting the repe aminer prior to the prosecuti

Add
of
A MOTOR

DAMAGED PAGE

Muck's Claim to Be a Swiss Astonishes

Continued From First Page

"This statement has, as you will no doubt understand, come as a great surprise to everybody, as you were generally believed to be a subject of the German empire. Also, personally, I did not know that you are Swiss.

"I looked into the matter immediately upon my return to Washington and found the statement to be correct. In view of this fact I cannot understand how it is that you have always been looked upon in this country as a German. As you are a well known personality in the United States, and as this matter has stirred the public interest further in view of the rather peculiar situation in which this incident puts not only yourself but also the Swiss legation here, I would greatly appreciate it if you could give me some further information in this regard.

"From your papers it appears that you are a citizen of Neuheim, Canton Zug. When did your family acquire the Swiss citizenship? How is it that you so far always have been looked upon as a German in this country? Have you, without renouncing your Swiss citizenship, later on acquired the German citizenship? (The Swiss law provides that a mere naturalization in another country does not involve loss of the Swiss citizenship unless especially renounced.)

"Awaiting the favor of your reply, I beg to remain,

"Dear sir," etc.

CONFIRMATION FROM BERN

"January 7, 1918.

"Honored Doctor:

"I acknowledge with thanks your explicit lines of the 14th of December and very much request your forgiveness for not having answered them before today.

"I regarded it as necessary to procure a confirmation of your citizenship from Bern. This confirmation has just recently arrived, and, of course, is entirely in conformity with your statements.

"I have been repeatedly approached by the press for an official explanation respecting your Swiss citizenship. I, however, naturally was compelled to decline until I was in possession of authentic information from Bern. Now that this is at hand, of course, nothing lies in the way on my part to give out this explanation; before doing so, however, I consider it of importance to secure your concurrence therein.

"I would plainly state that you were born in Wurzburg in 1859, that your father acquired Swiss citizenship for himself and his family in 1866, and that since then this citizenship has continued to exist unchanged.

"In connection herewith I desire to remark that, notwithstanding this verification, unfortunately you will be denied entrance into Washington by virtue of the regulations of the Department of Justice.

"According to these regulations, every native born German is regarded as an alien enemy, even though later he has been naturalized in any country other than the United States. This definition would therefore also apply in your case. If my lines of the 12th of December have created a somewhat alarming impression, I desire to offer you my apology. I did not wish to awaken such a one in you; they were rather the expression of no trifling astonishment that a man as well known in the whole world as you should suddenly metamorphose into a Swiss citizen, when everybody, with the exception of a few persons, regarded you as being a German.

"That may perhaps only be traced to the fact that your whole external and internal life has been identified with Germany, even though, as you write, it has never been engaged in any political affairs. Will you permit me to ask you one more question? Did not your engagement at the Berlin Royal Opera invest you ipso facto with German citizenship, naturally, without your otherwise losing your Swiss citizenship?

"I am aware that foreigners employed in the Prussian government service, for example, professors in German universities, on grounds of their appointment become Prussian citizens. I am not certain, however, whether the citizenship terminates with the expiration of the appointment or continues in spite of the dissolution thereof.

"I have been somewhat protracted; your extraordinary case may offer the excuse therefor.

"I truly hope that the enmities which, at this time, you are enduring from certain quarters, will not bring you greater annoyances. The beautiful sphere in which you are engaged, fortunately, lies so far distant from politics and is so international that on these grounds, in the very foremost instance, an understanding in the present unhappy highly aroused national passions should be effected.

"Accept, honored doctor," etc.

RESENTED PRUSSIAN DOMINATION

Dr. Muck had written to the Swiss minister urging that it would be to his advantage if the Swiss legation declared him to be a citizen of Switzerland.

But there can be no doubt but Muck was able to provide a certificate to the Swiss legation, at least that he was entitled to his claim for citizenship in that country. Muck claims that he secured his certificate of Swiss citizenship in 1881 and he produced to this effect that his father was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, and was said to belong to the party of Bavarians who during the years preceding 1866 resented Prussian domination and crossed over into Switzerland, later returning to Germany, where the son was born.

(To be continued in tomorrow's Post.)

WELL KNOWN

Rio Grande." He graduated from Chapultepec, the Mexican West Point, St. Cyr in France

UP

ete change Carranza vasion of y.

Column

CE YALE AT THE KICKOFF IN THE STADIUM TODAY.

MUCK'S WIFE VERY ACTIVE PROPAGANDIST

Evidence that Dr. Muck's wife was as intimately involved in the German propaganda work as her husband is in the possession of the government.

Her activities were generally commented upon by people, yet she was, to all intents and purposes, allowed the freedom of the country, and after her husband's arrest and internment came and went as she willed. Even while Dr. Muck was under the eye of the secret service Mrs. Muck made trips to Germany and returned without being molested.

Following is part of a letter from Mrs. Muck to the doctor:

TELEPHONED TO MUNSTERBURG

. . . . "This morning I spoke over the telephone with Munsterburg about Albrecht's plan. He said that Albrecht was only a mediator and that he has no influence, that the

Continued on Page 6—Fifth Column

QUINCY HOUSE
BRATTLE STREET
Between Adams Sq.

Time Wasted Is Existence; Used Is

eakfast per land

The Boston P

CENTS Established 1831 MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1919 **

DR. MUCK WAS AUDACIOUS IN USE OF CIPHER

Complained Code Was Muddled by Telegraph Co.—Boasted of Secret Meeting at Copley Plaza

SIR EDGAR AND LADY SPEYER.

English financier and chairman of the underground electric railways of London, who, while protesting loyalty to Great Britain, was intriguing with Dr. Muck in Germany's cause. Lady Speyer is the daughter of Ferdinand Count von Bosch of Germany.

(Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post.)

After his return to America in 1914, after the war started, the correspondence of Dr. Muck shows that most of his associations were with Germans. In addition to his close connection with the German Embassy and the German court, he was in constant communication with the German consul at Boston, captains of the German ships, with Sir Edgar Speyer, Mrs. Munsterberg, Baron von Scholley and members of the Swiss Embassy.

Sir Edgar Speyer was one of the most prominent of British financiers. He was of German parentage but had been knighted by King Edward and at the start of the war protested his undying loyalty to Great Britain. In 1916 he left for America. He is shown to have been in constant conferences with Dr. Muck. Later revelations have much to do with Sir Edgar Speyer and Lady Speyer.

Continued on Page 2—First Column

"In the Evening"

Have You Been Looking

FATE OF

DAMAGED PAGE

nd

The Boston P

CENTS Established 1831 TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1919 **

MUCK WOULD NOT BE GUIDED BY HIS FRIENDS

Refused to Withdraw From 'Limelight' Although Public Sentiment Was Against Him

(Copyright, 1919, by the Boston Post)

Dr. Karl Muck, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, dearly loved the "limelight." He liked to be in the public eye and persisted in holding his important position in the American music world even when public sentiment was running strong against him. He disdained all well meant advice an insisted upon following his own inclinations.

Several friends of his suggested to him that for a time at least he withdraw from the public gaze during the duration of the war. They suggested that he leave Boston and the United States and go to Mexico, there to remain until peace was declared, when perhaps he might come back here and once more resume charge of the orchestra. Others did not advise leaving the country, but suggested that he relinquish leading the orchestra at public concerts. Their idea was that Dr. Muck should rehearse the orchestra, but that when the concerts were rendered an

Continued on Page 11—First Col.

COAL S

MRS. OTTERSON

Dr. Muck Refused to Listen to Any Counsel

Continued From First Page

understudy should wield the baton. But to all such suggestions he turned a deaf ear.

In spite of the fact that he knew public sentiment was strongly against him, that his movements were watched and his liberty was jeopardized, he refused to make himself inconspicuous. That he well knew this is evident from the contents of a letter written only a few days before his arrest. The letter also expressed his candid views of America and Americans. It is as follows:

Boston, Mass., March 19, 1918, Back Bay Station.

My Darling:

Since yesterday I really did not find a moment's inward rest; I feel that owing to some mysterious impulse you have put it in your head that I "must do something for you" in order to prove my love to you; and that this "something" is exactly something that I am not allowed to do if I wish to consider you and your family.

You say today, and you even believe it, of course, that you do not care at all, nor does your brother, if you folks have trouble in case I come to his house. But it is you particularly who would suffer terribly if anything should happen. I have spoken today with —— and with —— in detail about this case, because a similar case happened recently here (not with me). This new patriotic society, "National Defence League," has made it its special business to make a blacklist of all Americans who associate with Germans, and to discredit them publicly as "traitors." They go so far, that a short while ago a business man had all his bank connections cancelled, and he almost went into bankruptcy: only because he received in his house twice a harmless old German professor. And then I! Not at all harmless, but emissary and spy, etc., etc., pursued everywhere and suspected and boycotted! You still do not understand that the fanatics here in this country wish to make existence impossible to Germans by trying to persecute with never heard of terrorism those few remaining Americans whose thoughts are honorable. No means, no lies, no slander is too bad for them. A German—that is simply a Hun. But an American who means to be friendly with a German: he is a traitor to his country, a cad—the worst criminal in the land. Didn't you see what happened to ——? Did not these terrorists break even this stubborn head? By business—boycott, slander, lies. And then you must not forget that these curs would no doubt find out at once with their lynx eyes the one weak spot in our position, drag it in the open, before the public, make it coarse, common, dirty, our "friendly" relations. I never heard such remarks, except perhaps once that I seem to be very much interested in your artistic development. But you told me yourself that some woman made a fresh remark in a concert in S. H. so loud that you could hear it with your own ears. It is a sad fact that since the dismissal of the two decent (honorable) officials in the local Department of Justice (about 14 days ago) and their replacement my position here is ten times worse than it ever was; and the last New York scandal has made the whole pack still more rabid. The local "National Defence League" had the impertinence to send me a letter today with a number of questions for me to answer! Woe to the American who falls into the hands of these beasts today as "my friend"! Don't you see all this? Don't you see that your brother is menaced by business anger and difficulties eventually? It is possible that one visit might pass by without the pack getting wise to it. But is this the time, this the situation, where one may risk so much for the sake of a possibility? You have no suspicion how miserably I feel to write you all this; first, because the whole situation is so degrading for me; I am like a shabby dog here in this country, whom every cut-throat may bombard with stones unpunished; and it is not very pleasant to be compelled to explain all this in addition in detail. On the other hand, I am again and again surprised that you are so remarkbly stubborn in this one point and that you do not see everything clear, when you are such a clever and sensible head otherwise. And I am asking myself often since yesterday: "Is there some secret motive behind it, which I cannot see, cannot forebode (suspect)?" When you have reached this point of my letter, sit down quietly and think it over in peace what I have written you, and when you have thought everything over quietly you will agree with me.

I hope to see you tomorrow evening in the choir rehearsal. I am so absent-minded that I really do not know for the moment whether the rehearsal begins at 7 or 7:30. I will telephone you as to this tomorrow forenoon. The whole choir and orchestra band must enter via the stage entrance; YOU must, of course, not do this. I shall take care that the main entrance shall remain open for you; respectively that somebody should wait there for you who will admit you. During the intermission and at the end of the rehearsal (perhaps also before the rehearsal begins) I may find an opportunity to speak to you, to hold your hands and to glance into your eyes.

And now God bless you for today, my beloved darling!
Be sweet to me!!

Your
KARL.

To Be Continued in Tomorrow's Post

TWO YEARS FOR NEW

DAMAGED PAGE

ATTEMPTS TO GET MUCK OUT

Even Went to Extent of Saying He Would Become Citizen— Insanity Dodge Fails

Copyright, 1919, by the Post Publishing Company

Dr. Karl Muck, the deported leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made attempts to get out of the clutches of the federal officers who had him in custody. His recent interview given out in Berlin, to the effect that he will not stay in Germany, but will go to Switzerland, recalls some of the remarkable statements made by him while under detention by the United States authorities.

When he was first taken into custody Dr. Muck gave the federal officers to understand emphatically that Germany was impossible for him—that he would come to some great harm the minute he stepped foot on German soil—for his friends had declared that he had become too much of an American and in fact that he loved America greater than the fatherland. Furthermore, he had become absorbed with American ideals and their aims in war. Berlin was impossible!

In view of events that have been brought to the surface since Dr. Muck was taken into custody and his deportation, his statements seem laughable.

TRIED TO GET OUT OF DETENTION CAMP

To get out of the detention camp he did every thing in his power. Time and time again he reported severe illness. Powerful influences were set to work in his behalf. But the federal officials were sceptical. The influences working in Dr. Muck's behalf even appealed to the President, so firm were they in their belief that an innocent man had been wronged. But the attempts all failed, for link after link of the chain of evidence against the musician had been forged until there was no longer any doubt.

Dr. Muck even went to the extent of declaring that he wanted to become an American citizen—that there was no flag like the Stars and Stripes and no land like America—the land of the free. But Dr. Muck remained an inmate of the Southern detention camp. His attempt to gain the freedom he desired failed miserably.

For a few weeks nothing was heard from Dr. Muck, although his friends were using powerful influence to get his case before the powers-that-be. Every argument and political lever within the reach of his friends was used in his behalf at Washington. Then stories appeared in the papers that Dr. Muck's health had given way under the strain of his imprisonment in the detention camp. His friends again appealed to the Department of Justice. "If Dr. Muck was not released at once he would die," they pointed out. It was then that a board of examining physicians was sent to the detention camp to examine the doctor. The board found Dr. Muck in excellent physical condition.

POWERFUL MACHINERY AT WORK

Again the name of Dr. Muck disappeared from sight and again his friends in the United States set the powerful machinery to work in another attempt to gain his release. In February, 1919, the final attempt was made. Suddenly there came word to the Department of Justice that Dr. Muck was going insane —in fact, if he was not released at once his condition was such that he would become dangerously insane. Washington was again sceptical. Dr. Muck's friends persisted, and finally such powerful influences were set to work in his behalf that the Department of Justice again sent doctors to examine Dr. Muck.

In the meantime there had been much correspondence between Washington officials and the detention camp. Muck's friends saw that it was their final attempt to obtain his release and they mustered all their forces and influence to bring it about. The physicians questioned the former orchestra leader and they examined him thoroughly. Back to Washington flashed their verdict: "He's mentally sound." Again they had failed. Dr. Karl Muck was doomed to remain where he belonged—within the limits of the detention pen until the end of the war.

FIND NO EVIDENCE OF INSANITY

A letter dated Feb. 27, 1919, and signed by the examining force of two men, states:

"We have examined Dr. Karl Muck and find no evidence of any mental change whatever. There appears to be no evidence of on-coming insanity. As a matter of fact Dr. Muck seems to have adapted himself unusually well to his environment, and so appears on the date of this examination."

To be continued.

Baxter will be with ... proaching battle. The anti-Crane sentiment ... ted itself immediately ... first mani- ... wing the ... when ... would work to ... in the State an... to take ... situation ... sachuset... the party ... inclined ... the local

DAMAGED PAGE

on to e Again

whom First Mate Theodore o marry.

that is his at sea, and he e couple in marriage.
arrival of the Foss here in he stowaway bride was taken tody by the immigration au- and given a hearing before al inquiry board. Facts brought rding her past life at the hear- ed in the officials ordering her as an undesirable. An appeal his decision was made to on, where the case is still Commissioner of Immigration Skeffington stated last night d not been advised of a final om the capital, and was at a ow why Burnett should file approaching marriage when of the girl remains in doubt.

TAINEERS HOLD EVENUE OFFICERS

GHAM, Ala., Nov. 18.—Heav- a posse of revenue officers sheriffs left here today for elby County, in answer to elp from three officers who ed to be held for ransom neers who captured them while they were confis- el of syrup, believed to be making corn whiskey.

MUCK'S HATE IS FANATICAL

Rails at Credulity Shown by Americans to Any War Rumor— Lady Speyer's Poem to Him

Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post.)

That Dr. Muck was living in a perpetual state of bitterness against the people of this country in every phase of life is indicated by his readiness to resent even musical criticism, as shown by the following letter, dated April 1, 1916:

"My Dear———:

"I have just come from old Sourquell. . . . I today had a little personal joy in that Philip Hale opportunely spit out an altogether too fanatical insult against Germany in a criticism of the new Symphony of Stock. Now the musical critics begin. It is really no longer possible for a decent German to breathe in this country. Karl."

Dr. Muck had the utmost contempt for the gullibility of the American people and their susceptibility to propaganda, and he thought that Great Britain was very successful in taking advantage of this weakness. In a letter written on May 12, 1916, he said:

ORDER TO RESERVISTS A FRAUD

"My Dear ———:

"I am still unable to clearly see what eventually will come out of the political conditions here. Have you heard of the newest fraud—the military order to all German reservists in America given out by the Grossen Generalstab in Berlin with the instruction to proceed immediately to Mexico at the breaking off of relations between Germany and America? The New York Herald prints the facsimile of the order. In the eyes of every reasonable, intelligent man who knows Europe at all it is immediately evident that this is an utter fraud. The fraud is too stupid, too complete and too asinine; but that is the sad and vexing part of it. There is nothing in dumbness, in utter fakes and in stupidity which cannot be perpetrated upon the American people. The ignorance and lack of intelligence is so frightfully great that every fake, however stupid and simple it may be, is calmly believed; and upon this, from the beginning on, was based the English campaign of baiting and lies in this country. The Englishmen who know America perfectly, who have always hated and despised America and who today despise it more than ever before—these Englishmen have known perfectly how the American newspaper public could be deceived and cheated. At first all this enraged me; today it only vexes me.

"Forgive this empty outburst, sweetheart, but I have been mixed up in so much unpleasant politics today that I must pour my heart out. With heartiest kiss and greetings. Your Karl."

COPIES OF LA FOLLETTE'S SPEECH

When agents of the United States government raided Dr. Muck's apartments in Boston it was quite evident that the doctor considered "the thorough ignorance of the American people" offered a very fertile field for propaganda. During this visit of the Secret Service agents to Dr. Muck's house they found copies of Professor Von Mach's pamphlet entitled: "Loyal American Citizenship Consists in Keeping Unsullied One's Allegiance to the Constitution and to the Principles on Which This Nation Was Founded—Humanity, Justice and Good Will Toward All."

The Secret Service agents also found at least a dozen copies of La Follette's speech made in the Senate April 4, 1917, as well as copies of a leaflet entitled: "Real Belgian Atrocities," showing three natives of Belgian Congo Free State mutilated by the Belgians.

LADY SPEYER'S POEM TO MUCK

When the Department of Justice agents visited Dr. Muck's house in Seal Harbor, Maine, they found among his papers the following piece of poetry, dedicated to him by Lady Speyer:

"Oh, German melody, stand forth and sing
Thy meaning to these dull, unwilling ears
That listen now with me! So let it ring.
A Teuton truth, through mists of blood and tears.
To ignorance and prejudice, to hate,
To fear, to faltering hope and fecund lie,
Speak now thy classic word, and vindicate
A people's honor with serene reply.

"They sit before thee, silent, unentranced,
And I among them silent—but my heart
Is thine with understanding, and each note
Blesses my German heritage, enchanced
And glorified with pain that seems a part Of this great song the German master wrote."

(To be continued in the Post tomorrow)

MILK RATION IS HEALTHFUL

Children in Test Show Good Gains

Continued improvement in weight and color marked the third examination, held yesterday, of the six Roxbury children who commenced a three months' test on Sept. 30 under the care and supervision of the Roxbury Babies' Hygiene Association to determine the exact value of a daily quart of milk properly administered to children between the ages of two and five.

An average gain of 2 1-2 pounds has been recorded during the first 40 days of the test, and a general improvement in all conditions of the children has been noted. Dr. Edwin Curtis and Miss Ida A. Brown of the association are in charge of the test. Yesterday Miss Brown said that the gain in the children is positive proof that milk should form the principal diet of younsters between the ages of two and five.

et Sug Worries th

DAMAGED PAGE

Muck Feared Scandal More Than Internment

Continued From First Page

The Symphony officials trusted Dr. Muck, and this trust was reflected in the actions of the secret service men. Because Dr. Muck had been so strongly vouched for he was immune for months.

NEVER REFUSED TO PLAY ANTHEM

Dr. Muck's "refusal" to play the "Star Spangled Banner" was not the cause of his arrest. In fact, to give him his just due, Dr. Muck never refused to play the national anthem. Other people made the decision for him. The outcry that arose as a result of the attempt to put Dr. Muck on record merely made his case conspicuous but it produced no evidence against him. If Dr. Muck had been arrested and sent to an internment camp merely because he once refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he was a German some of his outcries against America in his letters might be justified.

During all the excitement that was stirred up over the "Star Spangled Banner" incident the secret service men were unable to secure evidence enough to warrant an arrest. Many people clamored for an arrest. Washington was flooded with telegrams demanding it. Yet any move had to be backed up by something more than patriotic indignation.

EVIDENCE AS A PROPAGANDIST

When the secret service men were about at their wit's end something happened which enabled them to at one swoop get evidence they never thought existed and to definitely place Dr. Muck as a dangerous propagandist. What this something was will be told in the course of these revelations. From the moment this information was placed in the hands of the authorities Dr. Muck's reign in Boston was over.

Dr. Muck had no illusions about the secrecy of his relations with the young woman he had so grossly deceived. He realized that sooner or later it might result in trouble for him. He wrote in one of his letters:

PLANS FOR SECRET APARTMENT

"My Darling:—

"Since yesterday I find myself delirious with joy. In these days when the beast-like agents of the Department of Justice are following my every footstep we must make our plans with care lest these hunters will have a chance to drag our sweet friendship before public gaze. For that reason I have made arrangements to secure a small apartment, secret and secluded, where no vulgar footsteps will tread. When tomorrow I meet you I will explain to you all the details. I will see to it that you have a duplicate key to the apartment, and after we have talked over every detail we can meet at our new nest as often as it is mutually convenient and safe for you.

"And then, my darling, we will snap our fingers to the herd of swine and drink the sweet cup to the last drop.

"Until tomorrow, with kisses,

"Your Karl."

TRIED TO BREAK WITH HIM

There is ample evidence that Dr. Muck was not always able to convince the young woman over whom he exercised so great a fascination that he was all he pretended to be. It is apparent that several times she made an effort to terminate the friendship. Certain letters seem to show that she felt she was being placed in a false position. Once she definitely cast off the spell. She determined to have nothing more to do with Dr. Muck. But his fascination still prevailed, as is shown by this letter:

WIFE KNEW OF LOVE FOR GIRL

"My Darling:

"I fail to find words to express my joy over your decision to renew our old friendship which you so cruelly broke off in a moment of despondency. I feel happy to learn that you no longer feel worried.

"You say, and you are right in saying so, darling, that my marital entanglements make it very hard for you to continue our hitherto pleasant relationship. But can't you see, darling, how much harder it is for me to renounce the love that grew between us so sublimely? Must we, for the sake of foolish sentiments that are imposed on us by others, forswear the love that is divine and inexpressible by common language? No, a thousand times no! You are mine and I am your slave and so I must remain. . . . It will perhaps surprise you to learn that to a certain extent Mrs. Muck knows our relationship. She has a noble heart and her mind is broad beyond the comprehension of the swine-like people among whom we must live a little while longer.

"And it will be only a very short time when our gracious Kaiser will act upon my request and recall me to Berlin. Once there, through the good offices of my beloved friend, ———, our Kaiser will be prevailed upon to see the benefit to the fatherland in my obtaining a divorce and making you my own. Then darling. . . .

"Please be considerate of

"Your Karl."

MUST AVOID SCANDAL

Again in a letter Dr. Muck refers to the fear of exposure which had evidently troubled his correspondent. He wrote:

"My Darling:

"I sympathize with you in your fear for the consequences of our very sweet relationship. We must not overlook any precaution that will save us both from a scandal. My enemies would rejoice in dragging to vulgar public gaze our love that is sacred and which we alone understand. Our relationship must be guarded until I am free to make you my own, darling. As to your fear of consequences, hereafter we must take stronger precautions. . . . And do not fear, darling, should our relationship result in disgrace (which God forbid) I would be only too proud to shoulder it all. . . . But to discontinue our friendship, I can never permit myself to consent to it.

"Your Karl."

Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (the Boston Post).

(To be continued in tomorrow's Post)

KILLS GUARDSMAN IN

Cont

in the ri let aime
Joseph

AB

Accordi McDonou minutes h entering an argu which, by the barbe said to h names.
Fearing harm, hir threats a have run ordered leave. Th that no o or the t attack.
The firs

breast, causing a flesh wound. The second went wild, passing through the front window and, narrowly missing a

WH

SCH-NUT BR

DAMAGED PAGE

Dr. Muck Was Aided by Powerful Friends

Continued From First Page

assault on Dr. Muck's character. This man knew the story was true.

This man himself had been long under the scrutiny of the officials. They tried to have his citizenship papers abrogated so they could proceed against him, but the effort failed.

STILL WORKING FOR MUCK

The attempt to show that Dr. Muck was innocent and that he was a "victim" has not yet ceased. There is a definite movement on foot to save Dr. Muck's face and reputation. Some of those interested hope to go far enough to enable Dr. Muck to return to America. It is reported, though not fully verified, that prominent people in Boston have been asked if they would sign a petition directed toward allowing Dr. Muck to return here.

Instead of being a victim, Dr. Muck enjoyed a greater immunity than any other suspected enemy alien in America. He knew his good fortune, also. Certain letters of Dr. Muck to be printed will show how well aware he was that he possessed powerful friends.

Boston was a hotbed of propaganda. It was cleared up with a difficulty which faced no other section of the country. And the men who cleared it up will deserve all the reward public opinion can give them.

(Copyright, 1919, by the Post Publishing Co.—the Boston Post)

(To be continued in tomorrow's Post)

tion now, according to attorneys, to "make an e

Not long of the ban ceived fro counts. T haustive.
bank emp ords of grilled, a apparent on young had gone was som

The cas
A. Ford
Saltonsta Detective traced to It was a was with home to Swift, 10 and that shall Sm

The po had mar large cit down to

Co

Neithe runaway lived in the two lice say marry living t his mi young her you lice.

Wher started this mo again f
the me

Robs Bank and Deserts Girl He Ran Away With

tion department of the bank and not far from the receiving teller's cage, among many other girl clerks there

From
Herald
Yonkers, N. Y.

NOV 17 1919

Dr. Muck Back in His Fatherland.

Dr. Carl Muck, former Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who was interned during the war as a dangerous enemy alien photographed in Berlin recently on his return to Germany from the United States.

ENING MAIL

New York City

WELL TREATED, SAYS DR. MUCK

Noted German Orchestra Leader Attributes His Internment Here to British Propaganda.

Berlin, Oct. 23 (Associated Press Correspondence). — Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says he was accorded "altogether worthy" treatment during his sixteen months' internment as an alien enemy in the United States. The noted musician has just returned to Berlin from Copenhagen, where he landed several weeks ago after leaving the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.

"I was directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the war broke out," Dr. Muck said to a reporter of the Berlin "Tageblatt." "For some time I was unmolested, even after America entered the conflict.

"In March, 1918, however, I was interned; my wife remained in our house in Boston, and I was sent to the prison camp, where I was confined with 4,500 other persons.

HIS TREATMENT WORTHY.

"The treatment and shelter were altogether worthy. The food was not to be complained of, especially as 120 people, including myself, had their own mess and their own cook. My wife was permitted to visit me once a week and spend two hours with me, naturally talking in English and in the presence of an officer."

Dr. Muck said he had not lost many of his friends in America and that his musicians had stood by him loyally. He attributed his imprisonment to "hysteria," which, he said, was due to "British propaganda."

"No conditions were imposed on the prisoners," said Dr. Muck, "but it was urgently suggested that any who wanted to leave America and return to Germany might have their liberty.

BANK ACCOUNT CONFISCATED.

"I did not want to comply with this stipulation, but my wife argued me into it and I finally agreed. And so one day I was free. My bank account and my house in Boston the American government has confiscated, and I do not know how things will come out."

Dr. Muck said he had made no plans for the future, but that under no circumstances would he remain in Berlin. He said it was possible he might go to Switzerland or to Gratz, Austria, where his wife's mother lives. On his first day in Berlin he led the rehearsal for the next Weingartner Symphony concert.

DAMAGED PAGE

Dr. Muck's Wife Very Active Propagandist

Continued From First Page

whole thing is very unsafe and uncertain and that it would be pure idiocy if we were to take a part in it in any way. Munsterburg intends to inform himself about it more closely the next time he goes to New York . . . ."

Another letter written by Mrs. Muck to her husband, March 18, 1915, shows that he was in close touch with Dr. Dernburg. It says: . . . . . "I hope that you will be able to see Dernburg and find out something with regard to the rumor about the six dreadnaughts; I cannot quite believe it. You might also try to get him telephonically. I wonder whether Hertling or Albrecht will appear on the scene? . . . ."

Further evidence of the pro-German activities of Dr. Muck was found through a receipt from the Trans-Atlantic Trust Company, which was found in his possession, and also one from the Deutsche Bank in Berlin for the purchase of 70,000 marks of the third German war loan.

INTIMACY WITH BERNSTORFF

Muck's close relationship with Count Bernstorff and the German embassy was shown by the following letters:

"June 23, 1916.

"My dear doctor:

"I would be very thankful to you for a friendly, severely confidential communication with regard to what experiences you have had with the French musician, Varese. As you know, he has lived for a long time in Germany, he likes to speak German, speaks the language well, and seems to be extraordinarily friendly to Germany, even though he was in the war. As I very often see Varese in the house of friends, and as he claims to have very good relations with you, I would like to ask you for a confirmation of my good impression of Varese. I do not know whether you have seen him here in America, and whether he has come to you. He hopes for a position in the Boston Opera.

"Dr. Munsterburg just told me that your wife has safely arrived in Germany, a fact that pleased me very much. I hope to see you in November in Washington, if not earlier. When are you going to Maine? With heartiest greetings, I remain, Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) "BERNSTORFF."

VON KLOCK'S ACTIVITIES

"Honored Dr. Muck:

"With regard to our last conversation, I include a reliable memorandum regarding the helpful activities of Messrs. Klock and Muhleder, for your confidential perusal. With many regards. Very sincerely yours,

"I. BERNSTORFF."

"Copy"

"Mr. Klock has, since the beginning of the war, worked indefatigably and very unselfishly as one of the leading Germans and as secretary for the 'Deutschen Hiefesussehusses fur Boston and Umgebung' (German auxilliary committee for Boston and surroundings.) In the main we must thank his activities for the fact that the war auxiliary work has not stopped in Boston, that it has had operatively noteworthy results—75,000—and that it has been possible to unite, although with the greatest difficulties, the German elements in Boston, so torn apart as they may be in all social classes, in the auxilliary work. Proof for this is given by the Popular Festival in September, in which 65 German societies and the German's ship officers took part with good success ($8000).

"When there were difficulties among the Germans and the German-Americans of Boston, Mr. Von Klock showed himself as an extremely perspicacious man, and as one who has been very helpful to the interests of the cause.

"Mr. Muhleder, too, is known as one of the most zealous and capable co-operators in the auxilliary work in Boston, and as a scrupulously exact treasurer. However, neither he nor Mr. Von Klock have been given, either by word of mouth or in writing, the exclusive privilege of receiving moneys for the German Red Cross."

(Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. The Boston Post.)

To be continued in tomorrow's Post.

2.75 BEER ADJUDGED HARMLESS

U. S. Judge Pollack Condemns Action of Congress

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 21.—On the ground that beer of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content is not intoxicating, Judge John C. Pollack of the United States District Court today handed down a decision granting a temporary injunction to restrain the United States District Attorney and the collector of internal revenue from interfering with the manufacture and sale of such beer by St. Louis brewers.

CONDEMNS ACT

Judge Pollack's decision, while confining itself to a ruling on 2.75 per cent beer, calls attention to the fact that war was being waged at the time the constitutional prohibition amendment was submitted by Congress to the State Legislatures, and that Congress at that time did not attempt to arrogate to itself the passage of a prohibition act as a war measure.

The State Legislatures voted on ratification, the decision said, on the promise of Congress that after the necessary umber of States had ratified the amendment a year should be permitted to lapse before it should be enforced by the government. Congress therein recognized the rights of the States, even in war times, the decision said, and it had not now the right to infringe on State powers with reference to prohibition enforcement.

In passing the enforcement act, the decision said, Congress attempted to re-exercise war powers when the war emergency no longer existed, and tried to justify by one section of the Constitution an act which was forbidden by another section.

The decision further points out that Congress in this instance has passed a law which "does not pretend to concur with the State laws of Missouri, but is in direct conflict with it."

It says that the laws of Missouri do not prohibit the manufacture of the brewers' product, and that the brewers have paid large sums into the State treasury from the proceeds of a business which was recognized by the State as legal.

The judge cited the words of President Wilson in his veto message on the prohibition enforcement act as proof that to all practical intent the war was over. He asserted that this act took away the police powers of the States and violated the 18th amendment to the Constitution.

The injunction was made effective at once, and will remain in force temporarily until a ruling on the entire question of the validity of the war-time prohibition act is handed down.

MANY ATTEND CHARITY BALL

Given for the Benefit of Hale House

Society was out in force last night at the first charity ball given for the benefit of the Hale Settlement House of Garland street in the Copley-Plaza last night. The affair was a tremendous success, fully 1000 couples attending.

The main ball room presented a beautiful sight with its decorations of bunting and garlands. Dancing began at 10 o'clock and ended at 4 o'clock this morning, after two 20-piece orchestras had furnished continuous music. So large was the attendance that several hundred couples were accommodated in the salon, where music was given by a jazz orchestra.

The visitors were received at the entrance of the main ball room by Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, 2d, Mrs. William A. Gaston, Mrs. Alfred Rodman Weld, Mrs. Stephen V. R. Crosby and Mrs. Richmond Fearing, members of the ball committee. The affair was directed by Thomas P. Beal, Jr., who is president of Hale House and Stephen V. R. Crosby, who acted as head usher.

HARVARD FUND $10,023,46

Seeking $6,000,000 Mar for Boston

The Harvard endowment fund reac the total of $10,023,461 last night, w Boston still in the lead of New Y with $3,984,387. New York's total st at $3,668,672, while the rest of the co try has rolled up a total of $2 460,40

The various classes are now ben their efforts to pile up the subscript to the fund to the $6,000,000 mark in ton. The class drive began Wednes and the first classes reported last n —20 reporting their organizations fected and some reporting their quota pledged.

OUR MARY WINS SU

Jury Finds Against P Broker

NEW YORK, Nov. 21.—Mrs. G Mary Moore, more widely know motion picture "fans" as Mary ford, was awarded a verdict by here today in a suit instituted Cora C. Wilkening, a play br alleged that she had obtai tract for Miss Pickford w mous Players Corporation of $1,080,000, and that a 10 mission was due her.

At a previous trial a in favor of Mrs. W appellate division s and ordered a new a star and there a star, ome lose their way.

DAMAGED PAGE

Here a mist ar
Afterwards

Paper
d

ENTS

The Boston

Established 1831

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1919 **

MUCK'S CLAIM TO BE A SWISS BOLDLY MADE

Secured Certificate of Citizenship in 1881 Setting Up Father Fled From Prussian Domination

Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post.)

Though the entire evidence in the possession of the Department of Justice shows without question Muck's citizenship, it is evident that he was clever enough to foresee it would be an advantage for him to claim Swiss citizenship, and this was granted to him by the Swiss legation at Washington on June 12, 1916, almost two years before he was interned.

The astonishment with which the Swiss legation at Washington viewed Muck's claims of Swiss citizenship is shown in the two following letters signed by the Swiss minister:

ASKS FOR MORE INFORMATION

"December 12, 1917.

"Dear Sir:

"During a few days' absence from Washington I read in the papers that in response to an inquiry the Swiss legation has stated that you are a citizen of Switzerland.

Continued on Page 22—Third Col.

RESCUES SICK WOMAN

DISTOL WITHIN

DEMOCR

Hi

OF

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

DAMAGED PAGE

Muck an Official Spy for Germany

Continued From First Page

agents whose relations were so friendly that it caused their dismissal. There is evidence to show that following the discharge of these agents by the Department of Justice, Dr. Muck became suspicious and destroyed many letters which he thought might implicate him.

Dr. Muck's apartment in Boston was a meeting place of German sympathizers. This is corroborated by the following letter written to an American girl at New York, postmarked March 27, 1916:

CONFERENCE AT HIS HOUSE

"It was again a regular Sunday for me, as usual. Until 6 I had a political conference at my house with gentlemen, among them the first secretary of the legation at Washington, the local German consul, captain of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, etc. At 1 o'clock we had a little lunch of three-quarters of an hour, the whole remaining hour devoted to documents, reports and records. You can hardly realize that I was more dead than alive after they had finally gone. I took a taxi and drove around outside for an hour; I was too tired to walk and, just imagine, I fell fast asleep during the ride. . . . .

"The whole day while the gentlemen were with me, two men, one of whom I know positively to be a detective, walked back and forth in front of my house, one from right to left and the other in the opposite direction.

"About 5 o'clock I went out and had some fun with them, and when the one of them whom I knew to be a detective sneaked up again, I said to him: 'You must be very tired and hungry; will you not take a seat in the hall and have something to eat and drink?' He stared at me, horribly embarrassed, muttered a few inaudible words and disappeared. The loafing bum. . . . KARL."

CONFERENCE WITH BERNSTORFF

When Dr. Muck was faced with the above letter he smiled and said that it was simply a nonsensical statement which he had written for the fun of it, but the department had the "goods" on him, and the following letters made it evident beyond any question of doubt that he was in very close touch with the German embassy in Washington. For instance, he writes under date of March 15, 1915:

"I have just had a very long and interesting conference with Count Bernstorff. KARL."

Again, on March 25, 1916, he wrote:

"How is it possible that a special delivery letter—an absolutely innocent, private letter from Count Bernstorff—took four days to come from Washington to Boston? . . . "KARL."

REFUSES MISSION ABROAD

While the agents of the Department of Justice found a number of letters from Count Bernstorff, they were practically all of a social nature, and it was evident that the relations between Dr. Muck and the German embassy were conducted orally and by messengers, but that there were official relations, and that Dr. Muck was engaged hand and glove with Bernstorff in propaganda was made evident in letters to a Boston girl. For instance, there is a letter dated Portland, Me., July 16, in which he writes:

"Today no letter from you. . . . Yesterday I fought a hard fight. Prince Hatzfeld came from the German embassy and urged me to go across on a very important mission. It was hard—very hard—but now it is over, I am remaining here. I will tell you more orally. . . . "Your KARL."

In a letter dated Feb. 13, 1917, he wrote:

"Until now (11 o'clock tonight) no news has come from you. . . . I have a very painful hour to go through tomorrow—the good-by of Bernstorff and two other old acquaintances in the embassy, but it means shutting my teeth together. . . ."

"MY REPORT HAS TO GO TO BERLIN"

The doctor's relations at the embassy were by no means restricted to the count, and he frequently wrote to Countess Bernstorff, also other members of the embassy, the local German consul, Captain Polack of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, which was then in Boston Harbor. The following letter shows the intimate nature of his relations with the German embassy, and how deeply involved he was in the German activities. It was written from Baltimore, Md., Nov. 29, 1916, and read as follows:

"At last I have today received news from you. . . . Mrs. Muck has to go to Washington to a meeting of the German Women's Society (which has no branch association, but only a single delegate). It so happens that this bazaar comes in between so that Mrs. Muck has nearly all the work to do alone, and now the matter is so pressing that Countess Bernstorff said to me today the meeting must take place at the latest by the next trip, because my reports and figures have to go to Berlin. I surmised this already for some time, and I saw also for some time that Mrs. Muck could not go away now on account of the bazaar and on account of a very important committee meeting which she had yesterday. Now today I have sought to persuade Countess Bernstorff to go to Boston with the Princess Hatzfeld and a few other ladies from New York and Philadelphia, but she received the proposal very coolly because she has a tremendous amount of social duties here in Washington. . . . . Your KARL."

He had frequent conferences of an official nature during this period with other captains of German ships interned at Boston, New York and other ports.

WORE THE KAISERIN'S GIFTS

The close relations which Dr. Muck enjoyed with the German court are established in various ways by the confidential reports to the Department of Justice. In a letter covering seven pages to a Boston girl and written from Hartford, Conn., on Nov. 13, 1916, Dr. Muck wrote at considerable length upon a book entitled "The Secrets of the German War Office," by Carl Armigdad Graves. He pointed out in great detail how the facsimiles of official seals represented in this book are false, and displays most intimate knowledge of German court life. In one letter he refers to the pearl cuff buttons given him by the Kaiserin:

"The pearl buttons which you on Saturday noticed for the first time I wore at your concert in New York. I remember that perfectly, because the common moonstone buttons which I at that time was packing dropped on the floor in my haste and the fastening broke, so I took the pearls with me which I had not worn for years. I received them from the Kaiserin at the wedding of the Crown Prince as a memento of a little experience I had with the Crown Prince when he was 9 years old. . . ."

CALLS W. W. ENGLAND'S VASSAL

That the doctor was in confidential communication with the German embassy and the German court is substantiated by the following extracts from his letters:

"Boston, May 10, 1916.

"The true vassal of England, W. W. (Woe Woe), appears absolutely determined to start a war with Germany. His reply note reads exactly like a declaration of war. . . . .

"Tuesday Night.

"This morning I was interrupted with a code telegram, mostly intentionally stricken out by censor, worried me physically and mentally all day, and it is all in vain. The English shoe shiner wants war. . . . . Your KARL."

KNEW OF THE DEUTSCHLAND

"Bluehill, July 12, 1916.

"Today two letters arrived from you. . . . A great worry has been lifted from me through the final arrival of the German submarine. I knew officially for several days that it was due to arrive, and it should have come on July 5 in Baltimore. As day and night passed without news, great anxiety came over me that it might have met with an accident or have been destroyed by an enemy. Now it has come out all right.

"As for the rest, a letter from Bernstorff addressed to me, sent on the 8th of July from Washington, has not yet arrived, and a registered letter I mailed to Bernstorff on the 28th of June was delivered at Washington on the 4th of July. Isn't this a fine situation with this English-American mail? Yes, it is so; the United States of America have become English colonies again, nothing more. And the shameless part of it is that they have become so voluntarily. . . . Your KARL."

KNEW GERMAN NOTE WAS COMING

"Boston, February 1, 1917.

"I can only tell you again today that —— and —— were full of praise for your inspired singing. . . . Now you will perhaps understand why the last few days, and particularly yesterday, I was so nervous. I have known for two weeks that this German note was coming, and yesterday morning before I left my house I received the official news. You can well imagine that this somewhat upset me. . . . . Your KARL."

DARE NOT SPEAK TO OWN BROTHER

"Boston, April 12, 1915.

"Today at last a letter. . . . When there are many things upon which I cannot and dare not inform you which are now claiming my thoughts and nerves, so it is not on account of any lack of news, but simply because there are things which can be discussed and taken up only by men. Women's advice cannot help in these matters, and with which women's happiness, particularly a young woman's, would only be uselessly burdened down. For us Germans it is war—and I am here in a hostile country, and about many things which are claiming my attention I dare not speak with even my own brother. Do not vex my heart with such reproofs. Your KARL.

"P. S. Forgive the hasty letter, but today I am overloaded with worry, and, furthermore, I have received very bad news from Germany regarding Austria. My head burns like an American cannon factory."

In this last letter it would appear that the doctor's association with the German embassy was for official purposes.

(To be Continued in Tomorrow's Sunday Post)

C. F. Hovey Co.

MERCHANDISE UP TO A STANDARD

URDAY—Ready to Put On

TS Priced As Low As Is Consistent With Hovey Standard of Quality result of a long-continued effort to present he best coat features in one great assemblage lowest price.

y Coats and Children $35 mer Street Elevators

Heavy Coats for Men
$35 to $60
Second Floor—Summer St. Elevators

y Coats
nd Juniors to $75
er Street Elevators

Heavy Coats for Misses
And Small Women
$25 to $275
Gray Shops—Second Floor

s for Boys 32.50
er St. Elevators

Heavy Coats for Women
$29.50 to $275
Second Floor—Avon Street Elevators

for Women and Children Floor—Summer Street Elevators

Posner's
QUALITY FIRST
Every Day Is Value Day at Posner's

IF you buy a pair of Posner's Imported Genuine Cape Gloves at $2.95 you get 100% value for your money—and if you buy one of Posner's wonderful Italian Twill Scarfs at $1.35 you actually get more than 100% value for your money. At 20c a Posner Collar gives you 100% value and saves you 20% on your collar bills—figure it out.

Underwear

The Most Complete Men's Underwear Department in N. E.

Medium Weight Merino, Natural Color Union Suits 2.50

Carter's Medium Weight Balbriggan Union Suits. Special 2.75

Heavy Weight Egyptian Ribbed Union Suits. Special value.. 2.00

Medium Weight Natural Wool Shirts and Drawers. Wonderful value. Per garment 1.85

SCHOOL ST. AND CITY HALL AVE.
Posner's 2 STORES
WASHINGTON ST. AND AVERY STREET

OPEN SATURDAY EVENING

DAMAGED PAGE

DR. KARL MUCK HAD PRUSSIAN VIEW ALWAYS

Entirely and Blindly Biassed With Attitude of Bitter Hostility to U. S. on All War Questions

Dr. Karl Muck was evidently so thoroughly Prussianized that he felt any criticism of his country, or any report derogatory toward it, must necessarily be false, regardless of its source, as the following letter, selected from several in similar vein, indicates:

"The visit of your father to V. E.'s puzzles me. . . . I have been watched by detectives more than ever since the traitor Goricar (you have perhaps read of him in the newspapers) has pointed me out in Washington as a ringleader in the plot to blow up munitions factories, etc. It is, of course, a miserable, cheap lie, but nevertheless, the whole mob are day and night on my trail, and I have to be ten times as careful on your account. On account of the scoundrel V. E. (V. E. is a German acquaintance whom Muck believed had betrayed him) we are both sitting on a powder keg. . . .

"Karl."

Another letter, indicating the contempt of Dr. Muck for the United States officials, addressed to a girl, reads:

"Today just a few words. . . . What do you think of the newest plot affair in New York? Madame Gadski's husband arrested. The officials here are idiots or lunatics, that, men without any brain or men with a sick brain. . . .

"Karl."

None of the letters in the possession of the government indicate any better the wholesale contempt which Dr. Muck had for America than one written from Cleveland, O., dated Jan. 26, 1917:

"Your letter of Monday arrived this morning early from Pittsburg. . . . You may believe me that the affair of the Lusitania is nowhere more regretted than in Germany. Of course, only on the ground of common sense and not on sentimentality.

"The Russians in East Prussia have slaughtered about 1800 children, from the age of 1 to 6 years, in the most brutal fashion, having slashed them to pieces with sabers and thrown them alive into burning houses, and have violated and mutilated 6000 women and children and have murdered hundreds. Have any of the humanitarian American gentlemen protested at that? Oh, no, Russia buys war material here. The good merchant is always humane and fights against the Huns for civilization.

"And England has been trying for two and one-half years to starve to death 50,000,000 million women and children. Has any of the humane Americans ever protested at that? Oh, no, England pays well—very well indeed.

"I can tell you that in the last two years Germany has fairly broken away from her chief failing in the last century—sentimentality—and the few dozen women and children who unfortunately went down on the Lusitania cannot, of course, play any part in the feelings of the German people against the horrible fate of the many thousands of German women and children in East Prussia, and against the daily fight for life of hundreds of thousands of children whom England wants to give a prey to hunger, and it is to be regretted that the Lusitania affair, no doubt, was tragical because it gives perfidious England such excellent material for agitation.

"Why, the Lusitania had to be sunk—that will be later clearly explained. Everything which could happen to safeguard the fate of the passengers was done on Germany's part. Three days before the departure of the ship there appeared the official warning of the Germany Embassy that nobody should travel on English ships. All the papers joked. The captain of the Lusitania publicly explained that his ship was perfectly safe, with its double bottoms, etc., and that he could be hit with a few dozen torpedoes without sinking.

"Furthermore, the ship was so fast, and could maneuvre so well, that a hit would be altogether out of question. Although the submarine had already been 14 hours within shooting range, the captain waited with his torpedoes until the Lusitania was quite near the coast, only so that the rescuing boats could quickly and easily reach the shore.

Also, experience has shown that ships which had only a fifth of the tonnage of the Lusitania could stay afloat at least a full hour, so that everybody could be rescued. The collision of the torpedo, and then in ten minutes the ship vanished; and why? Because it was loaded to the deck with explosive material—powder, dynamite, shells, etc., which all at once exploded as the torpedo hit and the ship tore apart."

"These American women and children were not destroyed by German torpedoes, but by American munition. There is in America a strong law that no ship which carries passengers can be loaded with powder, cartridges or explosive material. This law was so scrupulously heeded on Germany's side that, for example, as happened to me when I was coming to America for the first time in 1906, the harbor official in Bremen confiscated a box of cartridges for my hunting rifle; there were about 50 cartridges.

"The confiscation was made with especial reference to the American law, and here, because England pays well—very well—for munitions, the law simply did not exist. Hundreds of ships departed, and in the cargo was enough explosive material to blow whole cities to atoms, and even in the cabins of the passengers.

"In the case of the Lusitania, the collector of the Port of New York (his name is Malone, think—this scoundrel) had made out false clearance papers.

"I will have to tell you about that by word of mouth, and in the last moment the rascally captain took on board 300 cases of trinitrotoluol, one of the most frightful and dangerous of explosive materials (trinitrololuol is the newest and safest of all explosives. It can only be detonated by ignition, and then only under certain circumstances, so that Dr. Muck's representation is false), which explodes of itself at the least careless handling, and were a case of this exploded one-half of New York would be blown to the air in dust.

"It never occurred then to any of these humane Americans and Hun-baiters that Captain Turner, who commanded the Lusitania, before the court of inquiry in London denied his explanation and he explained that he could only give his detailed report of the complete circumstances of the catastrophe in a secret meeting, and only before members of the British Admiralty.

"No, ———, to a German who sees blood when he thinks of East Prussia or the little starving German children—to him nobody can speak of a Lusitania atrocity. The ship had to be destroyed, and on Germany's part everything happened to facilitate the rescuing of the passengers; that this was impossible, nowhere have regrets arisen more than in Germany, but it was not Germany's fault but the fault of England and America, on account of the English and American scoundrels.

"This I have forgotten, that at the taking of testimony before the court in London all the witnesses unanimously declared that after the shot a hardly preceptible explosion of the torpedo some seconds later, an earthquake-like explosion followed which broke the ship in two. That was the American muntion, but that is enough of this miserable stuff.

"Don't think for a minute that I would say to an American all that which I have said today to you about the Lusitania, and which is based on official German, English and American documents. I hold it beneath Germany's dignity; but to you I must try and make it clear to your eyes—mustn't I? . . . ."

Further vilification of America is contained in a letter postmarked April 3, 1916, which reads as follows:

"I am very nervous, because this morning early at 9 o'clock a special delivery letter was delivered from Saturday. . . . The very case of Tauscher, Madame Gadski's husband, is as drastic as it is grotesque—proof of the scoundrel-like frivolity of the English-American authorities.

"Mr. Tauscher went to Europe in May, 1914. He was there only when the war broke out. He came back on Aug. 27, on a Dutch ship, to New York. The dynamite plot referred to, according to the sworn testimony of the English detectives, was on the 4th of August planned for execution. Is it then not idiotic or criminal to draw this man into it?

"This whole country is ruled by a crowd of bums who are tainted with English money, who are not frightened back by any shameful deed, or stupidity, or absurdity, if it concerns bringing Germany under suspicion, and my only hope is that the American people will finally wake up again and hang the few dozen bums to the highest tree which grows in the country. I can only tell you that I have no longer had any feeling of anger, but simply of unlimited vexation when I behold conditions here. . . .

"Do not get excited over this political criminal—I mean the English-American government here in the country. My conscience is quite clear, and when the bums shall venture against me they will repent it bitterly—that I can assure you.

"Be calm and take good care of yourself.

"Karl."

Apparently, while giving a concert in Pittsburg, in January, 1917, Dr. Muck was unable to restrain his venom when his eyes met the picture of the great steel mills turning out cannon and munitions to be used against the Fatherland. In a letter written to a girl from this point he says:

"May the devil take this Pittsburg—a horrible day—Thank God, it is already 1 o'clock at night, and in eight hours I can leave this cursed munition mess. . . . You cannot imagine with what vexation and with what disgust I stood before this public, which teemed with diamonds.

"Karl."

As showing that he was in direct touch with the German Embassy at Washington, there is this letter, postmarked Boston, April 26, 1916, in which he said:

". . . On the general situation there is not much to say. Yesterday's report of a yielding on Germany's part was, as I have learned today, and as I immediately thought at the time, greatly exaggerated. The situtation is, as usual, very strained and uncertain, but for the U. S. A. there appears to be a very sad affair looming up in the far east. In any case, the munitions manufactutrers will earn millions more, and that, for this government, is the first and most important question. . . .

"Karl."

His bitterness against America was again most effectually displayed in a letter written from Bluehill, Me., on Aug. 1, 1916, in which he said:

"My Dear ———:

"My deep-sea fishing trip I have given up. I heard that of the five men who were to take part in it three belong to the largest shell deliverers to the allies and in the case of the fourth he is building here in this country submarines for England (that is, by the international treaty on neutrality, most positively forbidden, but of course, Wilson, Spring-Rice, British ambassador), and I think that would be most unpleasant company for me. "Karl."

His activities in aiding to sow dissension in this country and to organize citizens of German origin against America are shown in this letter:

"This evening out of a concert for the German Red Cross. . . . It is now fairly certain that Mrs. Muck will sail on the 31st of May, provided that before then some new Wilsonian stutpidity does not bob up. "Karl."

The following letter displays the lengths to which his bitterness extended in connection with members of the Symphony Orchestra, who had asked for an advance in salary and who chanced to be men devoted to the cause of the allies. He wrote:

"I thank you for your letter. . . . Now the disagreeable personal question starts up, and I have daily letters concerning orchestra members who have not renewed their contracts and desire higher salaries. I am very glad that among the people who seek shameless compensation there is not a single German. A Belgian, a Frenchman and an Englishman have the doubtful honor to stand at the head.

"Mr. ——— is a very zealous member of the most famous society for America and the allies, so he had better pay these allied musicians, and probably that is what these men think. . . . I am sending you the deepest, most hearty and most faithful greetings. "Karl."

The doctor waxes sarcastic in this letter at the raid made by Collector Billings when the German ships were seized in Boston. He writes:

". . . Today I received news that the first officer of the Cecelie, a splendid man, wife and two children in Germany, has died. He lay in bed with bronchitis and a high fever when the brave officials plundered the ship. In spite of the doctor's protest and the captain, the sick man was obliged to get up and leave the ship in the bitter cold weather. He got pneumonia and died.

"Karl."

The doctor's violent conviction with regard to the war are most explicitly shown in this letter, dated Cleveland, O., Jan. 28, 1916:

". . . Of course, Pittsburg is indeed the main centre for the manufacture of American neutrality murdering instruments. How easy could a German spy throw a little bomb into a factory. In this connection, several days ago I learned something which the German government has not published.

"Since November, 1914, when the first American shell was fired from an English cannon upon German soldiers, until Dec. 1, 1915, 220,000 German soldiers have been killed and about 400,000 wounded and maimed through American ammunition. Is this not terrible?

"The German government have kept these statistical figures secret because it fears that the people would not be able to control themselves and that in mad rage and revenge they would attack all the Americans who are now in Germany. These are terrible times, and sometimes I nearly perish from impotent bitterness. Forgive me if I write you such cruel details, but perhaps even you do not realize what terrible bloodshed this country is responsible for. God knows how much longer I can stand it.

"When, yesterday, I got onto the stage in Pittsburg in the sold-out house of Carnegie Hall, and saw the thousands sitting before me who through the murder of my people have earned and still earn millions, everything became red before my eyes. It required my full strength not to shriek out loud, but enough, there is a reckoning justice coming in the world history, that is my only comfort.

"Karl."

Dr. Muck sounded the German toxin of the war, "Der Tag," in a letter dated Oct. 15, 1915:

"The letter from St. Louis has still failed to arrive. I . . . I cannot tell you how cruel life appears to me here, surrounded by enemies, who hate me from the depths of their hearts because I am German, and who claim friendship in my presence. It requires my whole capacity (my Kultur the Kultur of barbarians) not to thrust ten times daily in the faces of these lying, hypocritical, corrupt, lip-artists—'Once the day will come' (Einst wird konmen der Tag)—that is my only comfort. Tomorrow I must step before the public again; it is hateful to me. "Karl."

Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post)

(To be Continued in Tomorrow's Post)

Advertisement.

BOSTON MAN LAUDS NEW REMEDY WELDONA IN PECULIAR RHEUMATISM

Pain, Stiffness and Numbness Quickly Leave After Taking Simple Remedy

Among the many statements made relative to the remarkable recoveries attributed to Weldona, the new rheumatic remedy, perhaps none are more interesting than that of Mr. Edwin Walton of 161 So. Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass., who said: "I suffered from a peculiar rheumatism. The pain would run down my leg from the hip to my ankle and only by taking opiates was I able to get relief. Finally the disease became so severe, especially from the knee to the ankle, that I had great difficulty in walking. It was impossible to go up or down stairs without the greatest agony and too much motion caused terrible stabbing pains.

"The pain also attacked my ankles and even my toes. My body felt cold and chilled and I couldn't seem to dress warm enough. My limbs would be numb and had a peculiar feeling of weakness. My feet were also weak and numb.

"I heard about the good work Weldona was doing and decided to give it a trial. After taking the treatment a few weeks all the pain left me—the sensation of numbness and coldness entirely disappeared and my feet are ever so much stronger. I am certainly glad to tell others how Weldona helped me after trying so many other treatments without success."

E. Walton Tells of Weldona—Wonder Worker for Rheumatism

$1000 is offered if these testimonials are other than genuine, or have been purchased.

Letters from all over New England are on file at the Boston office. The cases are near and easy to investigate.

Weldona is truly a "wonder worker" for rheumatics—one trial proves it. No dope—No alcohol—but a glad surprise in every package of Weldona for rheumatics.

The book, "Germs of Rheumatism,—muscle education—how the common pin helps rheumatism, etc.," sent free. Address the Weldona Co., 132 Boylston St., Boston, Mass. Get Weldona now—today—from your druggist. To druggists—Every wholesale druggist in New England can supply you with Weldona.

YALE GRADS PAY DEFICIT

Six Thousand Contributed to Alumni Fund

NEW HAVEN, Nov. 15.—Gifts from Yale graduates wiped out an apparent deficit of $304,294 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, according to the report of George Parmly Day, treasurer of Yale University, made public tonight. More than six thousand alumni contributed to the alumni university fund during the year, individual subscriptions ranging from 25 cents to $75,000. The total net receipts were $640,000, of which $333,000 was added to the principal of the fund.

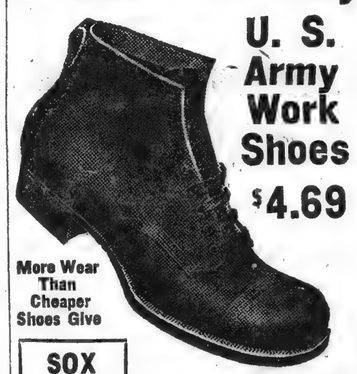
The report says that Yale University devoted $100,000 of its general income for the year to military and naval expenditures without expectation of or request for reimbursement from the government. In addition Yale expended in 1918-1919 "a total of over $275,000 for the work of the Students' Army Training Corps and Naval Unit and more than $10,000 for emergency hospitals for members of these organizations during the influenza epidemic, for which it has been reimbursed by the government."

The report makes an urgent recommendation that the Yale Corporation consider at the earliest possible moment the need of providing salaries so adequate as to assure the best possible teaching for Yale students. The total of the university's endowment on June 30 last is given as $23,283,121.

AUTHOR OF THE "FOUR HORSEMEN" TO LECTURE

"The America We Know," is the subject of the lecture to be given Monday evening, Nov. 24, at Tremont Temple by Vicente Blasco Ibanez, author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" and other novels. The lecture is to be under the auspices of El Club Espanol.

Send No Money



U. S. Army Work Shoes $4.69

More Wear Than Cheaper Shoes Give

SOX FREE! PAIR HIGH-GRADE HEAVY WOOL SOX WITH EACH ORDER.

Send your size and these high-grade Army Work Shoes will be sent to your home AT ONCE. Munson last, built for comfort, double waterproof soles, dirt-excluding tongue. Best shoe made for chauffeurs, letter carriers, farmers, machinists, teamsters, mill workers, etc. Every pair guaranteed. Mail coupon. We pay postage.

Eastern Mail Order House, Sta. A, Box 170, Boston, Mass. Send Army Work Shoes. On arrival I pay $4.69. My money back if not satisfied.

Name..... Size.....

Address .....

Advertisement

Changes Mind About Going Away

"Five years ago doctors told me I would have to move my wife to another climate, as she suffered so with stomach and liver trouble and bloating. Also, that she would have to have an operation for gall stones. Our mail carrier told me of Mayr's Wonderful Remedy, and, on his advice, she has taken it and is now as well as ever in her life." It is a simple, harmless preparation that removes the catarrhal mucus from the intestinal tract and allays the inflammation which causes practically all stomach, liver and intestinal ailments, including appendicitis. One dose will convince or money refunded.

Advertisement

Says His Prescription Has Powerful Influence Over Rheumatism

Discoverer Tells Druggists Not to Take a Cent of Anyone's Money Unless Allenrhu Completely Banishes All Rheumatic Pains and Twinges.

Mr. James H. Allen suffered for years with rheumatism. Many times this terrible disease left him helpless and unable to work.

He finally decided, after years of ceaseless study, that no one can be free from rheumatism until the accumulated impurities, commonly called uric acid deposits, were dissolved in the joints and muscles and expelled from the body.

With this idea in mind he consulted physicians, made experiments and finally compounded a prescription that quickly and completely banished every sign and symptom of rheumatism from his system.

He freely gave his discovery to others, who took it with what might be called marvellous success. After years of urging he decided to let sufferers everywhere know about his discovery through the newspapers. Your druggist has been appointed agent for Allenrhu in this vicinity, with the undehstanding that he will freely return the purchase money to all who state they received no benefit.

WHY SOCIETY WOMEN WASH THEIR OWN HAIR

They do, not because it is a fad, but because they wish to obtain the greatest possible hair beauty and be sure they are not using anything harmful. They have found that in washing the hair it is never wise to use a makeshift, but is always advisable to use a preparation made for shampooing only. Many of our friends say they get the best results from a simple home-made canthrox mixture. You can use this at a cost of about 3 cents a shampoo by getting some canthrox from your druggist and dissolving a teaspoonful in a cup of hot water. This makes enough shampoo liquid to apply to all the hair instead of just the top of the head, as with most preparations. Dandruff, excess oil and dirt are dissolved and entirely disappear in the rinsing water. Your hair will be so fluffy that it will look much heavier than it is. Its lustre and softness will also delight you. Advt.

DAMAGED PAGE

Dr. Muck Audacious in Use of Cipher Code

Continued From First Page

He speaks of his intimacy with Sir Edgar Speyer, and the fact that he was in close touch with the German consul at Boston is indicated in the following letter, written from Bluehill, Me., Aug. 4, 1916:

"I am sending you today second greeting, as I do not know whether I will have a chance to write you tomorrow or not. Sir Edgar Speyer came over this afternoon from Bar Harbor and spent the night with me and is taking me back in the morning in his car to lunch at Bar Harbor. Tomorrow afternoon his car is bringing me back again. Do you think that you could possibly arrange to meet me within the next week; that is, if you want to meet me.

"Your Karl."

During this period Dr. Muck was being sought for in Boston, and there is a letter telling about a luncheon with a famous American portrait painter, a Boston society woman and Lady Speyer at the Copley-Plaza Hotel.

There are in the possession of the government numerous letters showing that he was very intimate with the Munsterbergs at the time, and that he was obliged to forego an appointment with the Boston girl in order to keep an "important luncheon engagement" in Squantum with officials of the German ships, and in a letter written from Boston on April 10, 1916, he said:

IN CODE TO GERMAN EMBASSY

"About four days ago I sent a coded telegram to von Hamiel, the first secretary of the German Embassy. He received the telegram—completely changed. For example, instead of essetai hemer potan itand: taihe marct essep, etc. He showed it to me yesterday and there is nothing that can be done about it. I will make a complaint today with the president of the Postal Telegraph and then it's finished. One never gets a satisfactory reply. . . .

"Your Karl."

The extreme audacity with which Dr. Muck conducted his correspondence with the German Embassy is indicated in the above letter, when he speaks about making a complaint to the telegraph company.

The two following letters indicate that Dr. Muck's activitites extended even to the Austrian Embassy in Washington:

WITH AUSTRIAN AMBASSADOR

"——

"Baltimore, Md., March 14, 1917.

"In Washington I met today Count Tarnowski, the Austrian ambassador, who is not yet confirmed, and Dr. Ritter, the Swiss emissary who is now representing German business interests. We had lunch in the house of a strong American, who hates England and France even as much as he wants Germany to win, and after lunch we had a very exhaustive conference of an hour and a half, so that I entered the concert quite tired. . . .

"Your Karl."

"——

"Boston, April 12, 1916.

"My visit in the Copley-Plaza on Saturday was noteworthy for the fact that I had a secret meeting with the Austrian consul from Buffalo, who is under heavy suspicion and who arrived here Saturday, and had a room on the third floor. One more line in my guilty page. As for the rest, I don't know the man at all. I just received a report from the German consul here. . . .

"Karl."

SHUNNED AND HATED AMERICANS

In the above it will be noted that Dr. Muck definitely puts himself on record as having no social acquaintance with this Austrian official and who met him on confessedly secret business.

A survey of the voluminous correspondence of the doctor previous to the war shows that he wrote over 500 letters in a period of two years and this represented only a portion of his correspondence. In a number of these letters it is shown that he particularly shunned and hated Americans, and such Americans as he cultivated were for the purpose of contributing to his musical career.

In March, 1918, when we were at war with Germany, the doctor's letters show that he felt great regret that he was in America and that he wished to be in Germany, where he thought he could be of more service to the Fatherland. The following extracts demonstrated this fact:

BROUGHT HIM BY THE DEUTSCHLAND

"——

". . . I cannot help thinking during the last few days of the words of Prince von Beulow, the former imperial chancellor, who, in the year 1906, when I was seriously considering for the first time an appointment at Boston, said to me: 'Don't go to America. The day will come when you, as an artist, as well as a man, will most deeply regret it.'

"Karl."

"——

". . . I have had a very hard day today with conferences and interviews, and this will continue until Monday morning. You can well understand that the Deutschland brought me very much important matter, and that I now work day and night to take care of it. . . .

"Karl."

The doctor's interest in furthering German propaganda is shown in a letter in which he tells of being "trimmed" of $300, which he supposed he had subscribed to Veireck's "Fatherland." This letter, postmarked from Yosemite, California, May 31, 1915, reads as follows:

HAD BUT TWO INTERESTS

"——

"Last evening I finally left San Francisco after Mrs. Muck's condition was somewhat improved. I had at the last moment a rather exciting affair. A Jewish swindler from New York had in two visits in San Francisco cheated me out of money purporting to be for the support of the friendly-to-Germans New York newspaper, 'Fatherland.' The first time he received $100, the second time $200. Some remark which the fellow made just before he left me suddenly excited my suspicion. I telegraphed New York to the 'Fatherland' and learned that I was the victim of a swindler. . . .

"Karl."

All of the letters which the Secret Service agents seized and which were written between November, 1914, and March, 1917, show that the main things running in the doctor's head is his relations with girls and his political relations with the German Embassy. His musical life was hardly ever mentioned except in the most casual reference.

The following letter indicates an actual effort on his part to obtain details of a visit of this American girl to an American battleship:

"——

"San Francisco, May 20, 1915.

"Have you become, through your visit to a United States battleship, so thoroughly patriotic that you will no longer use the German language which is now so hated in America?

". . . Why don't you tell me a little more of your visit to the ship. Don't you think that every little detail interests me of what happens to you? I want to know everything; who invited you; who accompanied you to this ship.

"Karl."

So complete and so convincing is the evidence against Dr. Karl Muck that it stands out as one of the great triumphs of investigating skill during the troubled days of the war. Our heads of the battlefield have been rewarded, but the men who fought the fight against the sinister forces at home are unknown to their fellow-citizens.

It should be said in justice to men who deserve all praise that the Muck case was uncovered by George E. Kelleher, division superintendent for New England of the Department of Justice, and Captain Norman L. Gifford, assistant superintendent.

Both men have brilliant records and are not be be confused with the ordinary "gum shoe detective."

Mr. Kelleher is an A. B. of Brown University, graduating in 1904. He is also a graduate of the law school of Georgetown University, taking his LL.B. there. Mr. Kelleher is also a special United States district attorney and stands very high in the estimation of the Department of Justice.

Captain Gifford is a Harvard graduate of the class of 1905. He is a Plattsburg man and gained his commission as captain, later joining the Department of Justice forces, for which task he was particularly well fitted. Captain Gifford speaks German, French and Italian fluently.

(To be continued in tomorrow's Post.)

New E... Hold...

MISS MARGARET MAHANEY'S FLOCK OF PRIZE TUR...
Her flock, numbering nearly 200 birds, were exhibited during the turkey fair at Con... not up for prizes.

CONCC... nual tur... Turkey ... closed h... most suc... clation. ... continued ... barn at t... Miss Ma... the associ... and treas...

Seventy-... of New ... prizes and ... terday by ... ton, assis... Concord, ... awarded ... aged hen...

The nea... Mahaney ... prizes. ... birds and ... the 56-pou...

TYPO...

NEW... Union ... to wo... ing ... Em... res... wo... ... ...

TROLLEY HITS WAGON; DRIVER IS INJURED

Charles W. Brown, 62 years old, of 409 Harrison avenue, was injured last night, when a horse and carryall driven by him was in collision with an out-bound Ashmont-Milton car, at the junction of Savin Hill avenue and Dorchester avenue, Dorchester. He received cuts and bruises about the body. The carriage was demolished.

FAREWELL RECEPTION

Members of the medical department of the 10th Regiment, State Guard, yesterday tendered a farewell reception to their commanding officer, Major Edward T. Murphy, at the East Armory. He was presented with a silver cigarette case.

BEVERLEY FACES DESPAIR

Poor Beverley Sands faces despair in the coming instalment of that most fascinating of mystery stories, "The Lion's Mouse," by C. N. and A. M. Williamson, in next Boston Sunday Post Magazine. But faithful Clo finds a way out as usual and the thrilling tale goes on to fresh complications.

R. H. STEARNS CO.

Women's Suits

4th Floor

We will close out Monday about 60 suits from our stock of fine tailored and dress styles; models and regular stock numbers in sizes from 36 to 44. Many fur collar styles included. Sale price $85

Hand-Made Blouses

Fine, sheer, batiste, made up in an attractive selection of models. Entirely made by hand and perfect in every detail of fit and finish. Special value $5.75

Silk Hosiery

For Women

Women's Full-Fashioned Thread Silk Hosiery with deep lisle thread tops, and lisle soles built up over ball of the foot. Good medium weight and excellent wearing qualities. Black, Navy, Seal Brown and Cordovan. Special $1.65

Women's Coats

4th Floor

A group of about 50 coats will be offered Monday. Wrap styles, tailored and semi-dress styles. High-class models in the finest materials. Some with fur collars. Others are most attractive without fur trimming. Sale price $95

Misses' Knockabout Coats

Sixth Floor

For school wear, for skating or for any out-door wear requiring a warm serviceable short coat. Made of brown cotton covert with large opossum collar, lamb-lined body and leather-lined sleeves; sizes 14, 16, 18, 20. Price..... $35

Navy Blue Serge

Dress weight, 54 inches wide. Special sale of about 400 yards at $3.60

R. H. STEARNS CO.

OUR CHRISTMAS SERIES SAVINGS CLUB OPEN—JOIN NOW

50c saved each week for 50 weeks amounts to.... $25.25
$1.00 saved each week for 50 weeks amounts to.... $50.50
$2.00 saved each week for 50 weeks amounts to.... $101.00
$5.00 saved each week for 50 weeks amounts to.... $252.50

Call or write for folder TODAY. You can do your banking by mail

SUFFOLK SAVINGS BANK

For Seamen and Others

1 Tremont St., Boston

Open Daily 9 to 3. Monday Evenings, Deposits Only, 5 to 7

"Has a Scollay Square Location With a Service Reputation"

DAMAGED PAGE

How Dr. Muck Fooled Friends Here

Continued From First Page

the faintest idea of the character of the evidence against some German propagandists. It does not relate entirely to their activities against the American government.

That might be excused in some cases by attributing it to excessive zeal for the Fatherland. But there are phases of their lives in America so grimly sinister that it amazed the officials of the Department of Justice.

DROVE GIRL TO ATTEMPTED SUICIDE

Dr. Muck's activities have by no means been completely exposed. Nothing has been said about a poor deluded young woman, caught completely in the toils of Dr. Muck, who attempted suicide as the best way out of the difficulty. She did not succeed, but she will carry the traces of her attempt to her grave. And people in Boston who well knew the details continued to honor him.

Another young woman for whom the doctor vowed the most passionate love, whom he even attempted to use in his work for Germany here, awoke to her terrible danger the moment America entered the war. She knew the extent of Dr. Muck's anti-American activities and begged him to stop. Then too, she was madly in love with him and coupled with her feelings toward her own country she felt, too, that sooner or later the man she loved would be caught.

PUT LOVE OF PRUSSIA FIRST

She wrote to Dr. Muck and begged him to give up his secret machinations. The doctor returned a cold refusal couched in true Prussian style. It informed her that his love for Germany was greater than anything else on earth, inferring that his own honor took second place.

The young woman came to a realization of what it all meant and she wrote him a letter which fell into the hands of the government officials. It is one of the most appealing pitiful letters that ever woman wrote. It touched the hearts of the Department of Justice officials as nothing else in the case could. She reproached herself bitterly, took all the blame from Dr. Muck's shoulders and passionately concluded by declaring that she would seek out Mrs. Muck at once, throw herself on her knees before her, confess fully and completely and beg Mrs. Muck's forgiveness.

Hasty action by Dr. Muck prevented this. His letters show the fascination with which he discerned the fears of his feminine admirers. He effectually prevented the break.

READ OUT OF TAVERN CLUB

These feminine conquests of Dr. Muck were not unknown to many people in Boston. They did not interfere with his social activities. No one closed the doors of their homes to him. Practically every member of the orchestra knew the truth but all were silent.

Even after his arrest he was not dropped from the clubs. It may be that some time in the future the real story may be told of how Dr. Muck so long retained his membership in the Tavern Club and why he was dropped and who it was who led the movement to have him dropped. Sufficient to say it took a public reading of some letters of Dr. Muck's, of the nature of which it is not possible to speak, to secure his expulsion long after his arrest.

Not even his expulsion from the Tavern Club, his removal to a detention camp as an enemy of the United States, could affect some people's admiration for Dr. Muck.

20 SIGN CERTIFICATE OF LOYALTY

On Nov. 30, 1917, long after America entered the war, Dr. Muck secured a certificate of character from certain Boston citizens. At least 20 men figured in the list as declaring they believed Dr. Muck not disloyal to America.

These men are among the most prominent men in Boston. Many of them were very active in the cause of the allies before America entered the war. They are all fine loyal Americans. Yet they were so completely deceived about Dr. Muck that they vouched for him to the officials of the government.

The Department of Justice officials know who gave Dr. Muck cash to advance the German cause. It was given to him before America entered the war, but he received many thousands of dollars at a time when it became certain that America would declare war. At least one donor realized the position he was placing himself in when he wrote Dr. Muck to be sure and keep his contributions quiet.

GAVE NAME TO ALLIES, CASH TO GERMANS

One distinguished Bostonian who served on practically every large committee ever formed on behalf of the allies was a constant contributor to the German cause through Dr. Muck. He probably would desire greatly to have a copy of a certain letter now in the files of the government, wherein he explains to Dr. Muck why he prefers to advance the German cause by gifts of money. He gave his name to the allies and his cash to the Germans.

Dr. Muck had much more than social support in Boston. The newspapers could never find out much about what was going on in the local offices of the Department of Justice, but Dr. Muck could. He had "inside" information. It is apparent from reading the doctor's letters that someone was "tipping him off" as to what went on in the Department of Justice as far as he himself was concerned.

SHAKEUP IN BOSTON OFFICE

Finally the government grew suspicious. It seemed that certain officials in Boston were more eager to build up a case for Dr. Muck than against him. When the department in Washington asked for a report from Boston on Dr. Muck's "fake" Swiss citizenship, to the amazement of officials in Washington a report came from Boston sustaining it.

This was the last straw. The blow fell then and a shakeup was in order. Few people knew that of all the "danger spots" of German propaganda in America Boston was the worst. There were more hidden influences impeding the work of justice here than anywhere else. The Muck case was merely an incident in the whole course of events.

There is still an indictment pending against Dr. Muck in the United States courts. He could not be extradited from Germany, though it has nothing to do with the war, but he could be arrested on the indictment if he should appear in America in the future.

The officials had a perfectly good reason for not trying Dr. Muck on the indictment instead of sending him to an internment camp. The evidence against him could not have been made public. No newspaper would have printed it. The public would have been barred from the trial and the whole proceeding would have simply shown the depth of disgrace to which a man can fall.

Much mystery has been made of the Muck case by reason of the fact that the officials of the Department of Justice in Boston, Division Superintendent George E. Kelleher and Assistant Superintendent Norman L. Gifford, were under orders not to allow the facts to become public. Newspapers sought in vain to get the true story of the Muck case.

That the Post was enabled to pierce the mystery is due to Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer. Before Mr. Palmer assumed office it was the policy of the department not to allow the public to know the facts in these so-called "spy" cases.

PALMER REFUSES TO CONCEAL CASE

Mr. Palmer looked at the matter differently and he refused to be a party to the "hushing up" of the Muck case. He resisted a great deal of pressure in order that the public might be informed. One compelling reason for allowing the Muck case to become public property was the fact that a petition had been circulated among prominent people in Boston seeking to have Dr. Muck allowed to come back to America.

The facts about him put a sudden end to this activity.

Copyright, 1919, by Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post.)

DAMAGED PAGE

Dr. Muck's Disloyalty Bared by Own Letters

Continued From First Page

In a letter to a Boston woman, written from New York on March 12, 1918, he scathingly referred to two Boston bankers who were largely responsible for the organization of the Symphony Orchestra.

"I have long since lost all faith in these men," said Dr. Muck in his letter.

It was apparent then that he appreciated that he was getting near to the end of his rope, for he said in his letter:

"IN POSITION OF GUILTY ONE"

"Under the present circumstances I would not have been able to conduct another season, anyway. But that he merely compelled me to make the anthem sacrifice while he explained to me on his word of honor that he would immediately disband the orchestra if I refused, and he explained to me on the same word of honor that he would at my departure at the end of the season disband the orchestra; and that he is now setting heaven and earth in motion to find a Frenchman or a Belgian as my successor, and now the story goes calmly on only that my scalp shall hang upon the belt of Mr. ——— and his Boston friends. That is the whole point, for, of course, it places me in the position of a guilty one.

During this time much energy was expended by Dr. Muck's sponsors to show that he was a Swiss citizen. He did have Swiss citizenship papers, but had only resided in that country for a few months and his claim to Swiss citizenship was based on the fact that his father, a German, in order to own land in Switzerland, was obliged to become a Swiss citizen.

The evidence in the possession of the United States government further shows clearly that Dr. Muck was a German citizen and one of the ablest Germans in this country; furthermore, it is clear that for years he had been on extremely close terms with the imperial German family.

His deep interest in the German cause is indicated in various letters written to Boston people. These extracts, from letters written in 1915 and 1916, show that even then he was busily engaged in German propaganda; for instance, the following extract:

WORKS FOR "MY FATHERLAND"

"Dear ———:

". . . As time goes on there increases daily my burden of human obligations, cares, worries and works for my family, my people and my Fatherland. . . . Good night, be heartily greeted. "KARL."

In a letter written during May, 1915, he said:

"My Dear ———:

"How crazy life is. . . . I am working very hard here and am very tired, and in addition to that comes always new bad tidings from my Fatherland. Even now the perfidious, shrieking-to-heaven treason of Italy. My Germany is like a noble stag which only cowardly hyenas and jackals attack at once, but, God knows, it has sharp antlers. KARL."

. . .

A month before the United States declared war on Germany, in a letter written to a Boston woman, he said:

". . . I am already thinking that I can hardly keep up any longer this horrible life in a country full of fanatical enemies, far from my country which is struggling for its existence. . . . Your Karl."

BEMOANS PLIGHT OF FATHERLAND

Again, during the month of February, when the German activities were cropping up in every section of the country, he said in a letter to a young woman, written from New York:

". . . The train arrived promptly on time and from 9:30 to 12:30 I had a miserable, painful conference with gentlemen who Wednesday morning leave for Germany. Fatherland, Fatherland, if I could only help you. . . ."

If more evidence were necessary to prove the deep sympathy which Dr. Muck had for Germany and his hatred of America, there are a number of letters of similar character to prove this in the archives of the government.

CHUM AND CRONY OF BERNSTORFF

It was on April 1, 1917, that Dr. Muck was called into the office of the United States District Attorney in Boston, and he was asked to what corps he belonged at Heidelberg, where he was a chum and crony of Bernstorff, and he answered, "The Schwaben Corps."

Proof of the fact that the Swiss citizenship was merely camouflage is contained in a letter written on May 1, 1916, which said:

"My Dear ———:

". . . Would that the affair with Germany were settled either one way or the other—but a decision. This eternal sitting on a keg of powder is unendurable—and if Germany yields I will give up my German citizenship and become a citizen in Patagonia or Terra del Fuego. . . ."

ONE OF THREE "ONLY GERMANS LEFT"

His intense interest in the German cause in this country was expressed in a letter written just previous to the time when it was evident that America was sure to be precipitated in the war, in which he said:

". . . I, along with two other people, am the only German (I mean who is connected across the water) who is left, and the day ought to have not 24 but 48 hours for my work."

. . .

Secret Service agents at this time found at the residence of Dr. Muck in Boston a German passport. Of the several hundred letters examined by the agents of the government in Dr. Muck's apartment none of them had any reference to Switzerland.

Dr. Muck's duplicity with regard to his German citizenship was fully equalled in his attitude towards the American people. His deep hatred of America and Americans was repeatedly shown in his letters, in which he heaped abuse and insults upon the people of this country.

SUSPECTS MAIL IS READ

From Bluehill, Me., he wrote in 1916:

"My Dear ———: "Bluehill, Me.

"The devil again must be playing with our letters. . . . Are the pack of dogs playing already again with my mail? That can't happen here, for there is a little post clerk as stupid as twenty mules and so helpless and blundering that he would lend himself very badly to the aid of a Secret Service agent. It might happen in Boston, where my letters pass through but what is the use of raving, for England rules here and a German is without rights. I have already had my experience with the Postmaster-General. "Karl."

. . .

Muck Feared Massacre of Germans in Boston

Dr. Muck in the spring of 1916 feared an outbreak against Germans in Boston and wrote of his fears under date of April 28 as follows:

"My dear ———:

"I am waiting for Rogers, who is supposed to bring me your letter. . . . Yesterday a local attorney, strong American but of good family, confidentially informed me that I ought to leave Boston immediately in case war comes. There is right here in Boston an association for the inciting of riots against Germans. This association is financed partly with English and partly with American money. Mrs. Putnam (the noble lady who wrote some weeks ago an article in the Transcript to the effect that America should by all means stop the shipment of milk to Germany—for the more German babies who starved the better it was) is one of the patronesses of this riot association.

"The whole Italian and Serbian mob from East Boston is said to be already organized and assigned to the different quarters of the city where Germans dwell. I would, of course, only laugh at such a huge absurdity if we did not live in America and if the news did not come from such a good source. Furthermore, Mr. and Mrs. Higginson made last evening an official visit to me, 'very pressing and very superfluous,' and I asked him immediately if he had heard anything of the matter. At first he tried to draw out of the situation with a few stupid jokes. Then he admitted that he had heard of the nonsense, but that was quite out of the question that anything could happen—'We have the police, and in the extreme need, our militia.'

"Well, a fine country—just like Belgium and Russia, where the population in Brussels, Antwerp, Petersburg and Moscow in the first days after the outbreak of the war massacred German women and children by the hundreds in the most brutal and fiendish manner.

"It would be great sport to bar my house into a fortress, to lock the doors and windows. I have three guns—a rifle, a repeater and a six-shooter, and two Browning automatic pistols, each a seven-shooter, and a bunch of ammunition. With the help of my German valet and my strong, Irish, rabid anti-English janitor I could easily hold my house against a cowardly mob for a few hours until the police could come—that would be great sport.

"Mrs. Muck won't pay any attention to this and up to a certain point I can understand it, but New York will then suddenly see an immigration of a few thousand Massachusetts German fugitives, and among them perhaps will be I. Isn't that a grotesque dream? America, the country of free, human rights. Never in the histroy of the world was there a greater parody. . . . "KARL."

To be continued in Tomorrow's Post

The Traveler Shoe

TRADE MARK

This trade mark, stamped on every Traveler Shoe, is our guarantee to the wearer.

for 7.00

This Stylish Man's Shoe—

Traveler No. 999, in dark brown Russia Calf, looks like a much higher priced shoe—in fact it would be a higher priced shoe but for the Traveler Maker - direct - to - Wearer Method.

Traveler No. 999

Assortments are the best in Men's and Women's Traveler Shoes that sell for $6, $6.50, $7, $7.50, $8

Advertisement.

USES COMMON YELLOW MUSTARD FOR

Old Fashi... Much Us... for In... Aches

Mustard, kind you use... than ever to... and free ma... fering.

Not very lo... yellow musta... on a cloth a... the body whe... present.

It surely d... pected to do, ...ersome and o...

People still ... they got a c... pleurisy, lumba... swellings.

But nowaday... tard in conden... for something l... it much better, ... mustard plaste...

This yellow m... is known to mil...

SEIZE PAPER

Union

I. W. W...

SEATTLE... today raide... Union Reco... and arreste... Ault, the e... United Sta... ert C. Sau... raided on ... ton, D. C. ... terday said ... "the result ... acts by the ... Federal of... of the Equ... arrested Wa... Internationa... at the Equit... with violatin...

STATE ... SEL...

Alfred Ca... Guardsman ... 14th Regime... pan police ... City Hospita... wound in hi... the revolver ... guard room ... ally disch...

GILCHRIST'S BASEMENT STORE

Our Self-Acting Reduction Plan

DAMAGED PAGE

t would be required. Senators Nel- of Minnesota and McCumber, both mbers of the mild reservation group Republicans, said they would sup- t the latter proposal.

Hitchcock Sees Wilson

esident Tells Him Reservations Can Be Accepted, Provided They Do Not Nullify League of Na- ions and Simply Interpret Treaty Terms

ASHINGTON, Nov. 7.—President son today told Senator Hitchcock, braska, administration leader in the ate treaty fight, that he would be ely satisfied with any reservations porters of the treaty might feel jus- in accepting, provided they did nullify the League of Nations cov- t and were designed for the pur- of interpreting the terms of the ty.

e President, Senator Hitchcock said, essed "his very strong approval" what had been done to date, and ed that no compromise would be ed unless a deadlock was reached a resolution of ratification.

nator Hitchcock outlined his pro- mme as first an endeavor to defeat reservations reported by the foreign tions committee, and if that failed ote down the resolution of ratifica- containing them. His next move ld be to present a resolution of fication, and should a deadlock en- to attempt a compromise with Re- blican opponents.

nator Hitchcock was with the Presi- for half an hour. Mr. Wilson re- ed him propped up in bed. Senator hcock said the President showed h interest throughout the confer- and expressed his judgment and ions energetically.

e Senator outlined the plan to be owed in consideration of the com- tee reservations and the President e general approval. "He was lauda- y of the success we have achieved far," the Senator said, "and ex- ssed the hope that we would be able work out some settlement between e reservation Senators and those who vor unqualified acceptance of the eaty, whereby we could meet on com- on ground."

Senator Hitchcock explained to the esident the present status of the eaty and gave it as his opinion that e Republicans could secure adoption the committee reservations while the nate sat in the committee of the hole, as only a majority vote was re- ired. "Our intention then," the Sen- or said, "if the reservations still are their present form, is to oppose the olution of ratification. Some Demo- ats, of course, probably will not line with us on that, but I am confident have enough votes to defeat such a olution of ratification, because two- rds will be required.

We will then offer a resolution of ification ourselves which may be de- ated."

The Senator was asked what the next ve would be and replied that would the point at which compromise ght be effected.

Senator Hitchcock did not go over the mmittee reservations with the Presi- nt in detail, but will send a copy of em to Mr. Wilson, who will study em at his leisure.

The Nebraska Senator said he found e President much improved in health, t that the lines in his face showed at he had endured great suffering ring his illness.

The President, Mr Hitchcock said, op- sed the committee reservations and so the preamble under debate in the nate today as "destructive." The reamble, the President said, would be very embarrassing."

"He approved, heartily," said Senator itchcock, "the plans of the friends f the treaty to bring about a dead- ock to negotiate a compromise. The resident indicated that any compro- mise we thought necessary, which would not serve to destroy the treaty, would be satisfactory to him, even if he compromise reservations are em- odied in the resolution of ratification."

Should the treaty's friends be doubt- ul on any particular point in the compromise reservations, President Wil- son said he would be glad to discuss [illegible]

Senator Hitchcock said he advised the President that he expected "a great parliamentary battle" over voting on resolutions of ratification, but was con- fident that a majority of the Senate was against killing the treaty.

Press Court Action Till Strike Is Called Off

Continued From First Page

The aged president of the American Federation of Labor, fighting hard to have the government drop its injunction suit set for a hearing tomorrow, plainly showed that he was under a severe strain as he left the Department of Justice, flatly and bluntly refusing on his way out to say one word about the trio of conferences or hope of ending the strike of more than 400,000 miners before the United States could press its suit against officers of the miners' organization.

Attorney-General Palmer, to whom Mr. Gompers referred all requests for information, declined to see newspapermen.

"Mr. Palmer wishes me to say that he will have no statement tonight other than that he made as he left the cabinet meeting," his secretary announced.

There were only 12 words in the statement Mr. Palmer dictated to newspapermen as he left the White House after the cabinet meeting and an earlier brief conference with President Wilson.

"The injunction proceedings against the coal miners' leaders will be dismissed the instant the strike order is recalled," the Attorney-General said, "and his utterance stood tonight as the final word from the government on the eve of what may prove the beginning tomorrow of the greatest labor union litigation in the history of the country.

Insist on Stopping Strike

Through the day, although it was on the lip of all official Washington, that the government and the miners were considering new plans for ending the struggle without further resort to law, the feeling grew that hearings on the restraining order, set for tomorrow morning in the Federal Court before Judge Anderson at Indianapolis, would be postponed "without prejudice to either side."

The Department of Justice will not ask for a postponement, but whether it might oppose the request if miners asked for more time, not an unusual proceeding, officials declined to say.

"The only thing that can stop the proceeding started by the United States is for the miners to call off the strike," the Attorney-General reiterated time and again.

The persistency with which Mr. Gompers presented plea after plea to the Attorney-General indicated his earnest desire to bring peace to the coal fields before the battle is waged more heatedly in the federal courts. Accompanied by Matthew Woll, vice-president, and Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Gompers saw Mr. Palmer before the latter went to the White House for a word with the President, and to outline the strike situation to the Cabinet.

The second meeting took place immediately after the Cabinet session adjourned. It lasted an hour, and when the labor leaders departed they were far more cheerful than they seemed tonight. Mr. Gompers told the Attorney-General they would return later, and Mr. Palmer intimated that Mr. Gompers would talk meanwhile with Lewis.

Labor Leaders' Attitude

Somebody asked Mr. Gompers as he was entering the elevator after his third conference with the Attorney-General if he had talked with Lewis. He wheeled about and snapped out that he would not answer that, and would not say anything at all about any of the conferences or the coal strike.

Various theories were advanced as to the apparent difference in the attitude of the labor leaders after the second and third conferences. Returning to his office tonight, Mr. Gompers remained there for several hours and was in communication with labor officials here and elsewhere.

Not much came out of the talkfest [illegible] declined to say what was taken up, although Secretary Glass, a trifle more communicative, smilingly turned his questioners away by saying it was just an hour and a half wasted.

The stand pat policy of the government and its determination, as one official expressed it, "to go through with the injunction suit," still has the undivided support of the Cabinet, it was said, and the absolute approval of President Wilson. The widely current reports that Secretary of Labor Wilson, himself a miner, had strongly opposed court action were not denied, but it was emphasized that the Cabinet was unanimous against withdrawal of the restraining order unless the strike was called off.

No Word From Operators

There was no word from the operators, the other party to the struggle, and while reports from their agents indicated slight gains in the number of mines working in West Virginia, there was no change in the general situation. Director-General Hines and Fuel Administrator Garfield explained to the Cabinet what they had done to get coal to the districts where most needed, and detailed reports of production since the strike started a week ago tonight were presented, but not made public.

But in spite of the absence of this information, it was admitted that the nation's coal pile was decreasing, and officials scanned weather maps to find whether any real cold wave was on the way. No attempt was made to hide the feeling that the situation was serious and would quickly become critical unless some way was found to get the strikers back to the mines.

DENOUNCES DEMAND FOR 30-HOUR WEEK

WASHINGTON, Nov. 7.—Referring to the demand of striking coal miners in this country for a 30-hour week, F. M. Parsons of Canada, an employers' delegate, told the international labor conference today that there was greater need for a minimum limit of hours of work per week to ensure increased production than for a reduction in the maximum number of hours.

"The world is not suffering on account of long hours," he said. "It is suffering on account of lack of food and clothing. There are 100,000,000 people in the old world on the verge of starvation. Not one-third of the industries of the world are producing to full capacity. Since the introduction of the eight-hour day in France there has been a 20 per cent reduction in production."

CABINET CONSIDERS THE COAL STRIKE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 7.—The strike of bituminous coal miners in particular and the industrial situation in general were discussed by President Wilson's Cabinet today at a special meeting called by Secretary Lansing of the State Department. Fuel Administrator Garfield and Director-General Hines of the railroad administration were present.

Before the Cabinet assembled administration spokesmen reiterated that the government was unalterably opposed to the proposal of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, that the injunction suit against the United Mine Workers of America be withdrawn as a preliminary to the ending of the strike and the negotiation of a new agreement between the miners and operators.

Special Offer

PETTICOATS

Jersey—Taffeta—Messaline

Sketched—All-Jersey, 4.00

Sketched—Taffeta, 4.00

STREET Petticoats — a wide assortment of shades to make the desired contrast to the street suit.

Special

4.00

GREAT SAVINGS

THESE petticoats—in taffeta, jersey and messaline—are a real buy and a woman will appreciate the opportunity to obtain a petticoat such as she wants at a much lower price than is ordinarily put upon such fine quality. There are also jersey-top petticoats with taffeta or messaline flounce.

Smartly Designed in All Colors

No refunds—no credits.

E. T. SLATTERY CO.

Tremont Street, Opposite Boston Common

Legal Stamps NO CHARGE FOR ALTERATIONS

WOLF'S

Legal Stamps NO CHARGE FOR ALTERATIONS

PRICES THAT FIT YOUR PURSE

—And Give More Value for Your Dollars

Angora TEDDY BEAR Outfits $7.98

In these troublous times, a store that really sells worthy merchandise less than prevailing prices, stands out like a beacon in the gloom of your cost of living—lighting the way to money-saving—for you, and for all who trade at the store of satisfaction;—Legal Stamps given with every purchase.

Women's HANDKFS. Initialed. 6 for $1.25

50 FINE NEW COATS are to be $18.50

For this special sale. Divide your choice between 50 of the biggest sellers of the season — and at a lower price than hundreds like them have sold for! The styles call for high praise—the materials are choicest Silvertones, Kerseys, Velours, Tinseltones and Novelties. Loose and stylish belted models. Some with self, plush or fur collars. All sizes.

BEAVER PLUSH HATS $2.98

The cut shows only one of the many styles; in fact, there are no two alike; hard to choose which is the prettier. Made with contrasting silk velvet crowns, trimmed with ribbon, $4.50 values.

PETTICOATS

Black Sateen—all lengths. $1.98 Flounced and plain styles.

KIMONAS

Flannelette. Elastic around waist. $1.98 *Trimmed with satin ribbon.

SKIRTS

Serges, poplins, velours, checks and pleated plaids. Sizes to 40. $4.98 TO $12.98

60 SUPERB NEW SUITS $24.98

The price as pictured gives no idea of the beauty or value of these style-setters. Even better suits than we have sold this season at far higher prices—a lot of "samples," bought low. Poplins, serges, tweeds and velours—carefully tailored. In navy, black, oxford gray, all sizes. If any suit requires alteration to perfectly fit, there will be no charge for the work.

CHILDS' COATS

A very large assortment in all the desirable materials.

$8.98 to $25

Women's VESTS PANTS 79c —fleeced

COMFORTERS Good covering. $3.98 Well Filled.

"Your Money Back If You Want It"

WOLF'S

"MY CLOTHIER"

HANOVER AND PORTLAND STS. Just a Step from Washington Street

Women's UNION SUITS $1.49 Sizes 36 and 38

BLANKETS Plaid. Fleeced. $3.98 Full Size.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Music School Settlement Annual Concert

AEOLIAN HALL was all a-chatter with high voices and thoroughly decorated with hair bows on the afternoon of April 15 when the Music School Settlement forces under Melzar Chaffee gave their annual festival concert. The work of these enthusiastic musicians, ranging from six to sixteen, is always heart moving, and the results obtained are perennially surprising. Tiny piano soloists came out and attacked the huge concert piano with confidence and vigor. The stage became crowded with infant violin players, and they "put over" pieces by Haydn and Handel with spirit, and an unexpected degree of accuracy of attack and tone. The older string players gathered and performed an overture by Gluck, and accompanied a surprisingly competent young piano student in a movement from a Saint-Saens concerto, and string soloists as well as vocal ones showed a high degree of ability. Throughout the performance the good that these youngsters are doing for music and the good that it is doing to them was clearly evidenced, and one felt on leaving the concert as though rousing cheers should be delivered that so good a work is being carried on so well.

However, financial support is needed and THE MUSICIAN urges those who can to help.

Eugene Onégin

WHETHER forced by the competition of a rival company at the Lexington, or whether from motives of giving its subscribers a wealth of interesting operas, the management of the Metropolitan Opera House has provided its clientele with an unusual list of "novelties" this season. The last of these was Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onégin", which was given its New York première March 24. This work was the third of the composer's eight operas, and was written in his thirty-eighth year, after the finishing of the Fourth Symphony. It was first produced in St. Petersburg (or shall we say Petrograd?) in 1877, and has been popular in Russia ever since. New York first heard it in 1908, when Walter Damrosch presented it in concert form, but as an opera it has never before been produced in this country.

The libretto has been adapted from Pushkin's "novel in verse", and deals with the love affairs of the title character. In the beginning of the drama Tatjana is in love with Onégin and tells him of her affection for him. He does not reciprocate her passion and tells her so. In the second act Onégin flirts with Olga, the sister of Tatjana, and is challenged to a duel by Lenski, Olga's lover. Onégin kills Lenski and becomes an outcast. He returns years later and finds Tatjana married to Prince Gremin. Onégin then realizes that he loves her, and although she still loves him, she renounces her passion and bids him depart.

A very moral tale indeed, but not essentially dramatic, and as it is pieced together it makes rather a foolish libretto. Tschaikowsky himself realized this fact, and consequently called the work a succession of lyric scenes.

Those who contend that the worse the libretto the better the opera may find additional proof in Eugene Onégin, for its music is beautiful and the work as a whole inspiring. Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune points to the festival scene in the first act as one of the most characteristic Russian bits that New York has ever seen, but aside from a few folk scenes the opera is not Russian in the sense that those of Stravinsky, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff are Russian. The universality of Tschaikowsky is well shown by Eugene Onégin.

In the Metropolitan cast were de Luca as Onégin, Claudio Muzio as Tatjana, Frances Ingram as Olga, Martinelli as Lenski, and Adamo Didur as Prince Gremin. Bodansky conducted with his usual mastery. As is customary in Russian opera, an Italian translation was used. The scenery was by Joseph Urban.

American: Yet in spite of its episodical character, which the composer himself fully recognized, no doubt, when he denominated his work as "lyric scenes," "Eugene Onégin" is an opera of distinct merit and ought to prove a welcome addition to Signor Gatti-Casazza's repertory.

Symphony Society Bids Farewell for the Season

THE New York Symphony under Walter Damrosch gave, March 21st, in Aeolian Hall, the last concert of the season before departing for Europe. Jascha Heifetz was the soloist, and he played the Glazounov concerto for violin and orchestra Opus 82. This is a work seldom heard in this country, and has not been given in New York since Zimbalist played it several seasons ago. That Mr. Heifetz drew from the composition all that there was in it goes without saying, and he made the most of his opportunities in a work that makes such a magnificent start but disappoints as it progresses. Other numbers on the farewell program were the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, the Debussy "Nuages" and "Fêtes," and the "Perpetuum Mobile" from Moskowski's Suite Opus 39. Symbolizing the coming trip to France, and consequent friendly artistic relations, the orchestra played both the Star Spangled Banner and the Marseillaise.

New York is justly proud of the great orchestra which will represent her amongst our allies this spring, and the musical public will await with impatience the return of their concerts next season. The orchestra will give its first European concert in the Paris Grand Opera May 4th, and the program will include the Beethoven "Eroica," the Berlioz "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, the "Istar" Variations of D'Indy, and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Philharmonic Ends Season

NINETY-EIGHT concerts in twenty-five cities is the record of the seventy-eighth season of the Philharmonic Orchestra. The season started November 3, and lasted altogether 147 days, the final concert having been held in Carnegie Hall, March 28. Whether a season so filled with concerts is conducive to the best musical results or not is a question, but it must be said in justice to Mr. Stransky and his men that they gave their audiences a wealth of fine programs. And it may also be added that the strain of an over busy season was at no time notably distressing.

During the month of March there was much of interest. On March 11 the band played the Fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and devoted the balance of the program to Wagner. Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony was the "piece de resistance" of the March 12 program. Mr. Stransky did well to confine this work to its original four movements, and to omit the three extra movements that the composer added after the work had been performed on numerous occasions. This symphony has been on the Philharmonic repertoire since 1871, but has not been played for the last twelve years or so, since Satonoff was the conductor of the orchestra. Leopold Godowski was the soloist of March 14, when he played the A minor concerto of Liszt. The orchestra played the Brahms Second Symphony, the Sibelius "Finlandia" and the Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite.

An interesting feature of the March 25 program was an orchestral setting by Abent of a prelude from Bach's "Well Tempered Clavichord", and the G minor organ fugue. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist and played the Brahms violin concerto, which he repeated on the following day when the orchestra played the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony and Grieg's two "Elegiac Melodies". The final program on March 28 consisted of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" and excerpts from Wagner.

A Program of Bach

IT takes courage to give a concert devoted entirely to the works of John Sebastian, and for this reason, if for no other, Dai Buell, pianist, is to be congratulated for the program of Bach she gave with the assistance of W. H. Humiston, and an orchestra of strings from the Philharmonic in Aeolian Hall, March 31. The purposes of the concert were indeed worthy, and a great deal in the way of finish of execution may be overlooked because of the scholarliness of the works advanced. A pianist who plays a group of difficult works by the greatest of contrapuntists always lays herself open to criticism by those who feel they have heard the same works played better; but Miss Buell struck a high average in her interpretations, even though at times the inner voices were not as audible as they might have been, and the melodic elaborations occasionally blurred. The program opened with the Fugue in A minor arranged for string orchestra by Hellmesberger. Then came the concerto in F minor for piano and string orchestra. Miss Buell then played alone the Partita in B flat, the Sicilienne from the second piano and flute sonata, transcribed by Henseler, and the Prelude and Fugue in B flat from the first volume of the Well Tempered Clavichord. The orchestra followed with Mr. Humiston's transcriptions of the Sarabande from the Sixth Cello Suite, the Gavotte from the fifth and sixth French Suites, the E flat Adagio from the fourth violin and piano sonata, and the Minuet in G. Miss Buell then played alone the Aria and several of the Goldberg variations, which were originally written to cure Baron Keiserling of insomnia, Mr. Humiston's transcription of the Largo from the fifth violin sonata, and the C minor Fantasie.

A NEW contralto, Edna Mampell, made her debut in Aeolian Hall, March 23rd. Miss Mampell is an attractive singer, freed from mannerisms, who sings her songs in a straightforward way that is highly pleasing.

Penelope Davies, Mezzo Soprano

THE concert that Penelope Davies gave March 23 at the Princess Theatre seems to prove that we have too few mezzo-sopranos or not enough Penelope Davies's. Surfeited with pure soprani and quite well supplied with contraltos, the jaded New York public took with great kindness to this young lady, who certainly appears to be a highly competent artist in her class. As offered by her the mezzo-soprano voice seems to partake of the excellence of both soprano and contralto, and be almost completely satisfying; somewhat like viola, which string devotees claim is more effective than either violin or cello. Joining a charming manner to a voice of exquisite timbre under quite complete control, Miss Davies presented a program of varied character, including few hackneyed numbers, and offering novelties that were almost universally accepted with high appreciation by the audience.

New York American: Her grasp of the intentions of poet and composer and her success in conveying it to the listener, materially aided by excellent diction, stamped her as an artist far above the average.

Schmidt and Peavey Play Lazzari Sonata

THE Lazzari sonata for violin and piano was the opening number of the joint recital of Adolf Schmidt, violinist, and N. Val Peavey, pianist, in Aeolian Hall, March 19th. This sonata, dedicated to Ysaye, and played frequently by the dean of violinists, is too seldom heard in New York, for it is a colorful, inspiring work worthy of many repetitions. The Saint Saens sonata opus 75 was also given. Mr. Schmidt's solo numbers included pieces of Kreisler, MacMillen, Guiraud, and Wieniawski, while Mr. Peavey contributed the G minor Ballade, the F major Nocturne, and the C sharp minor Scherzo of Chopin.

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART of the City of New York
FRANK DAMROSCH, DIRECTOR

An Endowed School of Music

Conducted solely in the interests of higher musical education. It provides students of natural ability and earnest purpose a thorough, complete and comprehensive education in music without going abroad.

INDIVIDUAL INSTRUMENTAL AND VOCAL LESSONS COMPLETELY EQUIPPED OPERATIC DEPARTMENT

For catalogue and full information address Secretary, 120 Claremont Ave.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF APPLIED MUSIC

American Institute of Applied Music
SUMMER SESSION, June 21 to July 30th
Courses in Voice, Pianoforte, Violin, Harmony
35th Season—October 1st, 1920
Send for Circulars and Catalogue, Kate S. Chittenden, Dean
212 West 59th Street, N. Y. C.

NEW ENGLAND NEWS

Warren Storey Smith, Representative, 525 Tremont Temple, Boston

THE trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having held that the thirty-five members of that organization who "struck" on the evening of March 6, refusing to take part in the concert, had broken their contracts, these men were dismissed. And the orchestra gave another pair of concerts the following week and went on tour with the forces that remained—some sixty-five men. At the concerts of March 12 and 13 the programme, hastily changed from one one which had been announced, consisted of the Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Grieg Concerto for the piano, with Heinrich Gebhard as the soloist, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. Mr. Gebhard was to have played the piano part in Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and was at a great disadvantage when it became necessary to substitute a work less taxing orchestrally. But he acquitted himself nobly.

It seems that there were several musicians who had been under consideration as members of the orchestra; at the conclusion of the Southern trip they were enrolled, and the orchestra was further increased by the return to its ranks of certain players who were in partial retirement. Hence a band of seventy-nine men assembled for the concerts of March 26 and 27. Mr. Monteux had put together an interesting programme and the result was a concert of unusual brilliance with conductor, orchestra and audience all on their mettle.

Debussy's "Petite Suite," originally written for piano, four-hands, and arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser, was played for the first time in Boston. It is pretty but uncharacteristic music of the composer's earlier year; the first number, "En Bateau," is familiar. The rest of the programme was made up of well-liked works: Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Music" from "Siegfried," and the "Rakoczy" march of Berlioz. The years have been kind to Dvorak's Symphony; its melodies still charm, its rhythms stir the blood, its orchestration glows and sparkles. And in the years since it was written many a more pretentious symphony has fallen of its own weight.

With a band fully adequate, both in numbers and skill, to the music in hand, the twentieth pair of concerts on April 2 and 3 brought a programme of much interest. With many new members, particularly among the second violins, the string section contained fifty players, as against fifty-seven before the "strike." The first part of the concert was devoted to one of Handel's Concerti Grossi for strings alone, and the closing number, Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," is one of the most ticklish pieces for the strings, in the orchestral repertory. In both works the new players acquitted themselves splendidly, it might even be said that the present body of second violins is as fine as any in the history of the orchestra. Besides the stately music of Handel and the always refreshing Overture, the programme contained the Prelude to "Parsifal" and Saint-Saen's Third Concerto for the piano, played by Rudolf Ganz. Mr. Monteux gave a singularly eloquent and impressive reading of the "Parsifal" music, missing neither its anguish nor its elevation. Saint-Saen's Concerto received its second performance in the whole course of the Symphony Concerts; while it does not compare in either ideas or treatment to the popular Concerto in G minor, it is a work of much charm, and it is hard to understand its neglect by pianists. Mr. Ganz played it with rare brilliance and taste.

While the concerts of the orchestra have been pursuing their regular course the thirty-five "seceeders" as they are now termed have given two concerts of their own, with enough additions from the Union to make a workable orchestra. The concerts were given at the Colonial Theatre. Mr. Mollenhauer was the conductor and Mr. Fradkin the "assisting artist." The first was well attended, the second drew a scanty audience. Practically all of the seceeders' predictions regarding the orchestra's doom and their own success have proved to be erroneous and unfounded. The orchestra seems to have been revitalized by the shock it received; the strikers have failed in their attempt to secure popular sympathy of a practical and enduring character, and it is hinted that the "new jobs" are not as plentiful as they had supposed.

Concerts and Recitals

THE fourth concert of the Boston Musical Association, which took place on March 24, exceeded in interest all its predecessors. Because of the illness of Mr. Charles T. Griffes, and his consequent inability to forward the orchestra parts in time, his "Poëme for Flute and Orchestra" which was to have been played at the third concert was postponed and finally performed at the succeeding one, with Miss Marion Jordon as the solo flutist. Although it was not to be expected that a piece of this character would exhibit the same degree of inspiration as Mr. Griffes's remarkable "Kubla Kahn," the Poëme is nevertheless a work of great charm, suggesting a programme which the composer did not see fit to reveal. Besides Mr. Griffes's piece another work by an American composer was performed—three "Naive Landscapes" by John Beach for flute, oboe, clarinet and piano. Mr. Beach's ideas are none too definite and he failed to make use of the characteristic voice and color of his three wind instruments.

Mr. Rulon Y. Robinson, a Boston tenor, sang a striking song-cycle "On Wenlock Edge" by the Englishman, Vaughn Williams. The poems are taken from Housman's "A Shropshire Lad" and the music is a fitting counterpart to them. The Durrell String Quartet played three charming movements from a "Romantische Serenade" by Jan Brandts-Buys.

TWO pupils of Theodore Schroeder were heard in recital here in March: Mrs. Gertrude Breene Thompson, soprano, gave a concert in Steinert Hall on the 16th, assisted by the well-known pianist, Guy Maier. On the following evening Miss Dorothy Landers, also a soprano, made her debut in Jordan Hall. Mrs. Thompson has a pleasing voice and shows considerable skill. For a new and untried singer, Miss Landers's attainments are quite exceptional. She shows the need for further study, particularly in the matter of interpretation, but with her splendid voice and musical temperament she is already interesting to hear.

Another promising singer is Miss Lilian Prudden, a pupil of Mme. Caroline Hudson-Alexander, whose first public recital took place in Jordan Hall on March 23. As yet Miss Prudden's singing does not show any pronounced individuality, but she has a good voice which shows the effects of excellent training.

Although she has been for some time in New York, Miss Rachel Morton-Harris pursued her earlier studies in Boston, and she gave her first recital here on March 28 in Jordan Hall. Miss Harris is the possessor of a beautiful soprano voice, her personality is charming, her interpretations warm and convincing.

A programme of unusual worth was presented by Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, in Jordan Hall on March 30. Miss Frank has been studying with Mr. Georges Longy and it is likely that he sought out some of the novelties among her songs. In four of them she has the assistance of a small orchestra of Symphony men, under Mr. Longy's direction. These songs, which called for various small instrumental combinations, were by Defosse, Rhené-Baton and Erlanger, and proved of exceptional interest. The field of vocal chamber music is the latest to be cultivated, and judging from the success of Mme. Gauthier's recent recital in New York and the samples given by Miss Frank, it promises unusually well.

THE Handel and Haydn Society gave the third and last concert of the present season on April 4 with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The soloists were Florence Hinkle, soprano, Nevada van der Veer, contralto, Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone. For all its "modern improvements," "Elijah" stands the test of time less well than do the other two standbys of orartorio, "The Messiah" and "The Creation." It is dramatic, beautiful and impressive—in spots; but there is too much of Mendelssohn's sentimental melody, stereotyped harmony and general emptiness. However, judging from the size of the audience at this Easter performance, the work still has a hold on a certain part of the musical public.

THE annual spring concert of the MacDowell Club chorus and orchestra took place on April 7 at Jordan Hall. Except for some dozen members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who supplied the instruments almost never to be found among non-professional players, the orchestra was made up entirely of the club members, and under Mr. Longy's able direction they gave an excellent account of themselves in a taxing programme. The chorus—entirely of women's voices—was heard in a short cantata by Rimsky-Korsakov, "A Page from Homer" and in a "Chant Funèbre" by Chausson, both worthwhile and also novel pieces. Miss Carmela Ippolito, a pupil of Mr. Loeffler's, still in her early 'teens, played the solo part in a Mozart Concerto for the violin with considerable skill. Three songs by Richard Hageman were sung by Mrs. Marion Chapin with orchestal accompaniment. The purely orchestral numbers were three movements from the "Indian Suite" of MacDowell and Suite from the opera "Ramuntcho" by Pierne. But for Mr. Longy, much interesting music that does not fit in with the programme scheme of a symphony orchestra or large choral society would go unperformed here. With the MacDowell Club and the new Boston Musical Association he has a double chance to bring such music to our attention.

IN the vanished and lamented days of the Boston Ojera Company one of the foreign representatives, and directors of the company was Mr. Iridore Braggiotti, of Florence, Italy. Mr. Braggiotti was a recognized authority on singing and much sought after by pupils from all Europe, and America as well. Mr. Braggiotti is now residing in Boston, strictly speaking in Brookline, where he expects to remain for two or three years before his return to Italy. While not here primarily to teach, the demand for his services has been so great that he is devoting a large part of his time to instruction in singing, and will even teach through the summer.

With the Boston Opera House still standing and a larger and eager public for opera here, the interest in a permanent company has never wholly died out; and, prompted by the great success of the recent visit of the Chicago forces, it has sprung up anew. With his wide experience in operatic matters, and because of his connection with the former organization, it is natural that Mr. Braggiotti should have been appealed to as one who might engineer a new project. One meeting of a semi-public character has already taken place for the purpose of discussing ways and means, and a larger conference, to be open to any who may be interested, will be held in the near future. Besides Mr. Braggiotti, Mr. Agide Jacchia is actively interested in the scheme. Mr. Jacchia's various operatic experiences and responsibilities were related at some length in the April MUSICIAN. It is sufficient to say that he is supremely qualified to be the musical director of an opera company here. Moreover, the grand opera department of the new Boston Conservatory, of which Mr. Jacchia is the head, would serve as an excellent "feeder" for a local opera company. It is not extravagant to hope that in Boston may be realized the dream of an American opera company of the first rank, recruited in all its departments from American singers and instrumentalists.

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON GLOBE—FRI

AUGUST 22, 1919

DR MUCK LEAVES FOR COPENHAGEN

Secret Agent Sees Him to Ship in New York

Musician Sails in Bitter Mood—Has No Regrets, He Says

NEW YORK, Aug 21—Dr Karl Muck, former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Count James Minotto, son-in-law of Louis F. Swift, the Chicago packer, both of whom were interned during the war as enemy aliens, sailed from here today for Copenhagen on the Scandinavian-American Liner Frederick VIII.

Asserting that he was an American and not a German, but that he sailed for Denmark "a man without a flag or country," Dr Muck arrived at the pier with his wife only a short time before the hour of departure. He was accompanied by an agent of the Department of Justice, whose duty it was to see that the musician boarded the liner.

This done, the secret service agent warned Capt A. G. Thomsen, commanding the vessel, to make sure Dr Muck did not leave it within the three-mile limit. Then he took his station on the pier at the gangplank until the ship was warped out into the river.

On stepping aboard the Frederick VIII Dr Muck denied his identity until a fellow passenger with whom he was acquainted threw his arms around his neck and kissed him.

Dr Muck, whose lean figure, swaying gracefully as he directed his orchestra, had charmed so many audiences in pre-war days, was in a bitter mood as he took his departure from the land in which he had been applauded.

He left the United States, he declared, with no regrets, "as the country is being controlled by sentiment which closely borders on mob rule." He denounced bitterly newspapers which, he said, had attacked his Americanism on a story circulated by "jealous rivals," and praised "some big people in the musical world who stuck by me." These, he said, were the only persons he cared about.

The orchestra which once he had led was "a thing of the past," he declared. Twenty-nine German-born members had been interned, he said, and he doubted if the group of musicians could ever again be brought together. As for himself, he said, he did not know what plans he would make on arriving in Denmark.

Whereas, according to officials of the Department of Justice, Dr Muck was brought here from Fort Oglethorpe "a day or two ago," Count Minotto was released on Jan 16.

The Count was arrested in Chicago on Nov 28, 1917, charged with pro-German activities, which he denied. Held for investigation, he was taken in charge by the Department of Justice on a Presidential warrant on May 14, 1918. A few days later he was adjudged an enemy alien and interned, an appeal later being dismissed.

Dr Muck, whose name was written in lead pencil on a typewritten passenger list, kept to his cabin until the vessel sailed.

Dr Muck was held to be an enemy alien despite his claims to Swiss citizenship which were supported by the Swiss Legation at Washington. He was arrested on a Presidential warrant at Boston, March 25, 1918, and resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week later.

His internment followed an extensive investigation by the Department of Justice of his alleged pro-German sympathies and utterances, and his close association with State leaders of Germany before the war. The department held that it would be dangerous for him to be permitted to remain at large.

EVENING WORLD

MONDAY, AUG

UST 25, 1919

PRETTY BELGIAN HEROINE ARRIVES TO BE AMERICAN

(Continued from First Page.)

came in to-day on the French liner ready to become an American.

Pierre Monteaux, who was the ... of the Ballet Russe, was also ... passenger with his wife and two ... He came here to direct the ... Symphony Orchestra. The ... leader announced that he would ... in New York several days. He

New Leader Of Boston Symphony

PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his only daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, 6 years old.

July 27, 1919

BOSTON HERALD ROTOGRAV

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony ... his daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, who is six years old.

From NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

JUL 14 1919

The Forwarding Company, under ... enced steamship ...

EVENING MAIL

AUGUST 25 1919

MONTEAUX HERE, SUCCEEDS MUCK

New French Director of Boston Symphony Promises Music Americans Want.

Pierre Monteaux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his wife and two children, were among 570 cabin passengers on La Lorraine, which docked in New York to-day from Havre. He succeeds as conductor Dr Karl Muck, who was recently sent from the country by federal officials.

Prof. Monteaux comes from Paris, where he has been directing a Russian ballet. "I want to give Americans the kind of music they desire," he said. "I will remain in New York for a few days, and will interview American composers to feel the popular pulse. I have several new compositions which I believe you Americans will enjoy."

NEW YORK EVENING JOU

MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 191

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE ON LINER

Pierre Monteux, formerly conductor of the French repertoire at the Metropolitan Opera House and recently released by General Manager Giulio Gatti-Casazza to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from France to-day on La Lorraine, accompanied by his wife and two children. M. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud who in ... teux succeeds Henri Rabaud, who in ... raine passed the Frederick VIII last Saturday and the wireless informed M. Monteux that his predecessor was returning whence he came. M. Monteux had no comment to make on this. He said that he had determined to give Bostonians and New Yorkers the kind of music they wanted.

HE EVENING POST

W YORK, MONDA

AUGUST 25, 19

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR COMES ON LORRAINE TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux Talks on German Music

WILL PUT IT ON PROGRAMMES

Belgian Heroine and Many Other Notables Arrive Here on French Liner.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine. He was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and taken to the Savoy Hotel, where he will remain until midnight, when he will leave to take up his duties in Boston.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to take it as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House. He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, who was forced to leave the orchestra on account of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programmes of the symphony orchestra.

"French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said. "My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteaux were his wife and two children.

EVENING TELEGRAM—NEW

YORK, MONDAY, AUGUST 25,

Muck's French Successor Praises Music of Germans

Pierre Monteux, newly engaged director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck, the German leader, who is accused of having refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" when opening performances, will direct the rendition of German as well as other music, he announced today upon arriving from Havre on the French line steamship Lorraine with his wife and two children.

"The American people desire all kinds of music, I believe, and it is my intention to meet their needs," the French artist asserted. "German music will be a part of the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as before."

Dr. Muck, concerning whom there was a long and bitter controversy in Boston, returned to Germany last week.

"I expect to interpret considerable French music also," said M. Monteux, "for I fear the American people do not know French music as it really is, and do not hold it in its proper place. "The leader said he had brought with him a number of light operas, including some exceptional work by d'Indy.

"I will remain in New York to consult leading composers before taking up my work," said the Frenchman. He reiterated emphatically that certain German music is among the best.

THE EVENING SUN, MONDAY, AUGUS

GERMANS' VICTIM IN ON LORRAINE

Woman Passenger Was Condemned to Die.

DECORATED BY FRANCE

Pierre Monteux, Dr. Muck's Successor, Arrives on French Liner.

The French line steamship Lorraine arrived to-day from Havre with 579 passengers, of whom 187 were in the first cabin. Marie Louise Gombier, a pretty Belgian girl 20 years old, was met at the pier by Mrs. Louise Dowdy of Los Angeles, who has adopted the young woman.

Pierre Monteux, French musician and conductor, who will be the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, arrived to-day on the French liner Lorraine with Mme. Monteux and their two children.

Succeeds Carl Muck.

M. Monteux, who conducted several ... of the French and Italian operas at the Metropolitan last season, succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, former field marshal of the Boston musical forces, whose extensive interests in pan-Germania compelled him to return home recently, accompanied as far as the pier by an entertainment committee of United States marshals.

M. Monteux will remain in New York until it is necessary for him to go to Boston. He wishes to confer with various American composers who are summering here and who are not on strike.

M. Monteux said he did not think that French orchestral compositions had been adequately interpreted here, at least by the late Dr. Muck, and that he would endeavor to give the Back Bay music lovers an adequate rendition of ofe music of his native land. He has brought over several compositions by modern French writers which will be played during the season.

BOSTON GLOBE—FRI

AY AUGUST 22, 1919

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
JUL 14 191

DR MUCK LEAVES FOR COPENHAGEN

Secret Agent Sees Him to Ship in New York

Musician Sails in Bitter Mood—Has No Regrets, He Says

NEW YORK, Aug 21—Dr Karl Muck, former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Count James Minotto, son-in-law of Louis F. Swift, the Chicago packer, both of whom were interned during the war as enemy aliens, sailed from here today for Copenhagen on the Scandinavian-American Liner Frederick VIII.

Asserting that he was an American and not a German, but that he sailed for Denmark "a man without a flag or country," Dr Muck arrived at the pier with his wife only a short time before the hour of departure. He was accompanied by an agent of the Department of Justice, whose duty it was to see that the musician boarded the liner.

This done, the secret service agent warned Capt A. G. Thomsen, commanding the vessel, to make sure Dr Muck did not leave it within the three-mile limit. Then he took his station on the pier at the gangplank until the ship was warped out into the river.

On stepping aboard the Frederick VIII Dr Muck denied his identity until a fellow passenger with whom he was acquainted threw his arms around his neck and kissed him.

Dr Muck, whose lean figure, swaying gracefully as he directed his orchestra, had charmed so many audiences in prewar days, was in a bitter mood as he took his departure from the land in which he had been applauded.

He left the United States, he declared, with no regrets, "as the country is being controlled by sentiment which closely borders on mob rule." He denounced bitterly newspapers which, he said, had attacked his Americanism on a story circulated by "jealous rivals," and praised "some big people in the musical world who stuck by me." These, he said, were the only persons he cared about.

The orchestra which once he had led was "a thing of the past," he declared. Twenty-nine German-born members had been interned, he said, and he doubted if the group of musicians could ever again be brought together. As for himself, he said, he did not know what plans he would make on arriving in Denmark.

Whereas, according to officials of the Department of Justice. Dr Muck was brought here from Fort Oglethorpe "a day or two ago," Count Minotto was released on Jan 26.

The Count was arrested in Chicago on Nov 28, 1917, charged with pro-German activities, which he denied. Held for investigation, he was taken in charge by the Department of Justice on a Presidential warrant on May 14, 1918. A few days later he was adjudged an enemy alien and interned, an appeal later being dismissed.

Dr Muck, whose name was written in lead pencil on a typewritten passenger list, kept to his cabin until the vessel sailed.

Dr Muck was held to be an enemy alien despite his claims to Swiss citizenship which were supported by the Swiss Legation at Washington. He was arrested on a Presidential warrant at Boston, March 25, 1918, and resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week later.

His internment followed an extensive investigation by the Department of Justice of his alleged pro-German sympathies and utterances, and his close association with State leaders of Germany before the war. The department held that it would be dangerous for him to be permitted to remain at large.

New Leader Of Boston Symphony

PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his only daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, 6 years old.

July 27, 1919
BOSTON HERALD ROTOGRAV

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony [illegible] his daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, who is six years old.

The Forwarding Company, under [illegible] enced steamship

EVENING MAIL

AUGUST 25 1919

MONTEAUX HERE, SUCCEEDS MUCK

New French Director of Boston Symphony Promises Music Americans Want.

Pierre Monteaux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his wife and two children, were among 579 cabin passengers on La Lorraine, which docked in New York to-day from Havre. He succeeds as conductor Dr. Karl Muck, who was recently sent from the country by federal officials.

Prof. Monteaux comes from Paris, where he has been directing a Russian ballet. "I want to give Americans the kind of music they desire," he said. "I will remain in New York for a few days, and will interview American composers to feel the popular pulse. I have several new compositions which I believe you Americans will enjoy."

HE EVENING POST
W YORK. MONDAY
AUGUST 25, 19

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR COMES ON LORRAINE TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux Talks on German Music

WILL PUT IT ON PROGRAMMES

Belgian Heroine and Many Other Notables Arrive Here on French Liner.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine. He was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and taken to the Savoy Hotel, where he will remain until midnight, when he will leave to take up his duties in Boston.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to take it as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House. He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, who was forced to leave the orchestra on account of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programmes of the symphony orchestra.

"French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said. "My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteaux were his wife and two children.

EVENING TELEGRAM—NEW

YORK, MONDAY, AUGUST 25,

Muck's French Successor Praises Music of Germans

Pierre Monteux, newly engaged director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck, the German leader, who is accused of having refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" when opening performances, will direct the rendition of German as well as other music, he announced today upon arriving from Havre on the French line steamship Lorraine with his wife and two children.

"The American people desire all kinds of music, I believe, and it is my intention to meet their needs," the French artist asserted. "German music will be a part of the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as before."

Dr. Muck, concerning whom there was a long and bitter controversy in Boston, returned to Germany last week.

"I expect to interpret considerable French music also," said M. Monteux, "for I fear the American people do not know French music as it really is, and do not hold it in its proper place. "The leader said he had brought with him a number of light operas, including some exceptional work by d'Indy.

"I will remain in New York to consult leading composers before taking up my work," said the Frenchman. He reiterated emphatically that certain German music is among the best.

THE EVENING SUN, MONDAY, AUGUS

GERMANS' VICTIM IN ON LORRAINE

Woman Passenger Was Condemned to Die.

DECORATED BY FRANCE

Pierre Monteux, Dr. Muck's Successor, Arrives on French Liner.

The French line steamship Lorraine arrived to-day from Havre with 579 passengers, of whom 187 were in the first cabin. Marie Louise Gombier, a pretty Belgian girl 20 years old, was met at the pier by Mrs. Louise Dowdy of Los Angeles, who has adopted the young woman.

Pierre Monteux, French musician and conductor, who will be the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, arrived today on the French liner Lorraine with Mme. Monteux and their two children.

Succeeds Carl Muck.

M. Monteux, who conducted several [illegible] of the French and Italian operas at the Metropolitan last season, succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, former field marshal of the Boston musical forces, whose extensive interests in pan-Germania compelled him to return home recently, accompanied as far as the pier by an entertainment committee of United States marshals.

M. Monteux will remain in New York until it is necessary for him to go to Boston. He wishes to confer with various American composers who are summering here and who are not on strike.

M. Monteux said he did not think that French orchestral compositions had been adequately interpreted here, at least by the late Dr. Muck, and that he would endeavor to give the Back Bay music lovers an adequate rendition of ofe music of his native land. He has brought over several compositions by modern French writers which will be played during the season.

EVENING WORLD

MONDAY, AUG

UST 25, 1919

PRETTY BELGIAN HEROINE ARRIVES TO BE AMERICAN

(Continued from First Page.)

[illegible] came in to-day on the French liner [illegible] ready to become an American.

Pierre Monteaux, who was the leader of the Ballet Russe, was also a passenger with his wife and two [illegible]. He came here to direct the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra. The [illegible]ector announced that he would [illegible] in New York several days. He [illegible]

NEW YORK EVENING JOU

MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 191

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE ON LINER

Pierre Monteux, formerly conductor of the French repertoire at the Metropolitan Opera House and recently released by General Manager Giulio Gatti-Casazza to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from France today on La Lorraine, accompanied by his wife and two children. M. Montuex succeeds Henri Rabaud who in [illegible]teux succeeds Henri Rabaud, who in [illegible]raine passed the Frederick VIII last Saturday and the wireless informed M. Monteux that his predecessor was returning whence he came. M. Monteux had no comment to make on this. He said that he had determined to give Bostonians and New Yorkers the kind of music they wanted.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON GLOBE—FRI

AY AUGUST 22, 1919

DR MUCK LEAVES FOR COPENHAGEN

Secret Agent Sees Him to Ship in New York

Musician Sails in Bitter Mood—Has No Regrets, He Says

NEW YORK, Aug 21—Dr Karl Muck, former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Count James Minotto, son-in-law of Louis F. Swift, the Chicago packer, both of whom were interned during the war as enemy aliens, sailed from here today for Copenhagen on the Scandinavian-American Liner Frederick VIII.

Asserting that he was an American and not a German, but that he sailed for Denmark "a man without a flag or country," Dr Muck arrived at the pier with his wife only a short time before the hour of departure. He was accompanied by an agent of the Department of Justice, whose duty it was to see that the musician boarded the liner.

This done, the secret service agent warned Capt A. G. Thomsen, commanding the vessel, to make sure Dr Muck did not leave it within the three-mile limit. Then he took his station on the pier at the gangplank until the ship was warped out into the river.

On stepping aboard the Frederick VIII Dr Muck denied his identity until a fellow passenger with whom he was acquainted threw his arms around his neck and kissed him.

Dr Muck, whose lean figure, swaying gracefully as he directed his orchestra, had charmed so many audiences in pre-war days, was in a bitter mood as he took his departure from the land in which he had been applauded.

He left the United States, he declared, with no regrets, "as the country is being controlled by sentiment which closely borders on mob rule." He denounced bitterly newspapers which, he said, had attacked his Americanism on a story circulated by "jealous rivals," and praised "some big people in the musical world who stuck by me." These, he said, were the only persons he cared about.

The orchestra which once he had led was "a thing of the past," he declared. Twenty-nine German-born members had been interned, he said, and he doubted if the group of musicians could ever again be brought together. As for himself, he said, he did not know what plans he would make on arriving in Denmark.

Whereas, according to officials of the Department of Justice. Dr Muck was brought here from Fort Oglethorpe "a day or two ago," Count Minotto was released on Jan 26.

The Count was arrested in Chicago on Nov 28, 1917, charged with pro-German activities, which he denied. Held for investigation, he was taken in charge by the Department of Justice on a Presidential warrant on May 14, 1918. A few days later he was adjudged an enemy alien and interned, an appeal later being dismissed.

Dr Muck, whose name was written in lead pencil on a typewritten passenger list, kept to his cabin until the vessel sailed.

Dr Muck was held to be an enemy alien despite his claims to Swiss citizenship which were supported by the Swiss Legation at Washington. He was arrested on a Presidential warrant at Boston, March 25, 1918, and resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week later.

His internment followed an extensive investigation by the Department of Justice of his alleged pro-German sympathies and utterances, and his close association with State leaders of Germany before the war. The department held that it would be dangerous for him to be permitted to remain at large.

New Leader Of Boston Symphony

PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his only daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, 6 years old.

July 27 1919

BOSTON HERALD ROTOGRAV

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony ... his daughter, Mademoiselle Benise, who is six years old.

The Forwarding Company, under ... enced steamship ...

EVENING MAIL

AUGUST 25 1919

MONTEAUX HERE, SUCCEEDS MUCK

New French Director of Boston Symphony Promises Music Americans Want.

Pierre Monteaux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his wife and two children, were among 579 cabin passengers on La Lorraine, which docked in New York to-day from Havre. He succeeds as conductor Dr. Karl Muck, who was recently sent from the country by federal officials.

Prof. Monteaux comes from Paris, where he has been directing a Russian ballet. "I want to give Americans the kind of music they desire," he said. "I will remain in New York for a few days, and will interview American composers to feel the popular pulse. I have several new compositions which I believe you Americans will enjoy."

IE EVENING POST
W YORK. MONDAY
AUGUST 25, 19

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR COMES ON LORRAINE TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux Talks on German Music

WILL PUT IT ON PROGRAMMES

Belgian Heroine and Many Other Notables Arrive Here on French Liner.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine. He was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and taken to the Savoy Hotel, where he will remain until midnight, when he will leave to take up his duties in Boston.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to take it as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House. He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, who was forced to leave the orchestra on account of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programmes of the symphony orchestra.

"French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said. "My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteux were his wife and two children.

EVENING TELEGRAM—NEW

YORK, MONDAY, AUGUST 25,

Muck's French Successor Praises Music of Germans

Pierre Monteux, newly engaged director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck, the German leader, who is accused of having refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" when opening performances, will direct the rendition of German as well as other music, he announced today upon arriving from Havre on the French line steamship Lorraine with his wife and two children.

"The American people desire all kinds of music, I believe, and it is my intention to meet their needs," the French artist asserted. "German music will be a part of the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra hereafter."

... Monteux, concerning w... there was ... and bitter controversy in Boston, ... of Germany's ...

"... considerable French music also," said M. Monteux, "for I fear the American people do not know French music as it really is, and do ... proper place. "The leader ... brought with him a number ... operas, including some excep... by ... study.

... in New York to consult ... before taking up my ... the Frenchman. He reiter... that certain German ... best.

THE EVENING SUN, MONDAY, AUGUS

GERMANS' VICTIM IN ON LORRAINE

Woman Passenger Was Condemned to Die.

DECORATED BY FRANCE

Pierre Monteux, Dr. Muck's Successor, Arrives on French Liner.

The French line steamship Lorraine arrived to-day from Havre with 579 passengers, of whom 187 were in the first cabin. Marie Louise Gombier, a pretty Belgian girl 20 years old, was met at the pier by Mrs. Louise Dowdy of Los Angeles, who has adopted the young woman.

Pierre Monteux, French musician and conductor, who will be the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, arrived to-day on the French liner Lorraine with Mme. Monteux and their two children.

Succeeds Carl Muck.

M. Monteux, who conducted several ... French and Italian operas at the Metropolitan last season, succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, former field marshal of the Boston musical forces, whose extensive interests in pan-Germania compelled him to return home recently, accompanied as far as the pier by an entertainment committee of United States marshals.

M. Monteux will remain in New York until it is necessary for him to go to Boston. He wishes to confer with various American composers who are sojourning here and who are not on strike.

M. Monteux said he did not think that French orchestral compositions had been adequately interpreted here, at least by the late Dr. Muck, and that he would endeavor to give the Back Bay music lovers an adequate rendition of ofe music of his native land. He has brought over several compositions by modern French writers which will be played during the season.

EVENING WORLD

MONDAY, AUG

UST 25, 1919

PRETTY BELGIAN HEROINE ARRIVES TO BE AMERICAN

(Continued from First Page.)

... came in to-day on the French liner ... ready to become an American.

Pierre Monteaux, who was the leader of the Ballet Russe, was also ... passenger with his wife and two ... He came here to direct the ... Symphony Orchestra. The ... ector announced that he would ... in New York several days ... He ...

NEW YORK EVENING JOU

MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 1919

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE ON LINER

Pierre Monteux, formerly conductor of the French repertoire at the Metropolitan Opera House and recently released by General Manager Giulio Gatti-Casazza to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from France today on La Lorraine, accompanied by his wife and two children. M. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud who in ... teux succeeds Henri Rabaud, who in ... raine passed the Frederick VIII last Saturday and the wireless informed M. Monteux that his predecessor was returning whence he came. M. Monteux had no comment to make on this. He said that he had determined to give Bostonians and New Yorkers the kind of music they wanted.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1919

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR DUE TODAY

Monteux to Arrive in New York With New Works

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season, and who is expected to arrive in New York tonight.

Pierre Monteux, conductor for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York this evening or Sunday morning. He will have about a month's intermission between his summer preparation of scores for the coming Symphony season and the opening of that season, early in October, before commencing rehearsals with the men.

PERSONNEL IMPROVED

Exceptional interest in Mr. Monteux's work with the orchestra is felt, particularly in view of the statement of the departing Karl Muck, day before yesterday, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orcestra would never be again what it was when Dr. Muck conducted it, because of the discharge of 29 German players, of whom Dr. Muck said he doubted if they could ever be reassembled.

It is safe to say that Mr. Monteux will not make any particular effort to reassemble the German players. In view of the wonderful work Mr. Monteux did early last season in rehearsing the Boston Symphony, and the results from an orchestra minus 29 Germans, it is certain that the Boston orchestra will not be the same band that Muck conducted in several important particulars. First of all it will be a better one, with, as everyone, quite aside from international politics, acknowledges, a more artistic personnel.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux, then with the Metropolitan Opera Company, undertook preliminary rehearsals of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra (minus 29 German players) at the beginning of last season, and also conducted, with brilliant success, two of the Boston Symphony concerts, until it was possible for Mr. Henri Rabaud to get here from France. It was because of Mr. Monteux's showing at those two concerts that he was engaged for the coming season, when it became known that Mr. Rabaud could not return to Boston. Mr. Monteux has with him a number of new and interesting works, and it is certain that Symphony lovers in Boston are to enjoy a very interesting season.

From American
Baltimore, Md.
AUG 26

PIERRE MONTEUX ARRIVES.

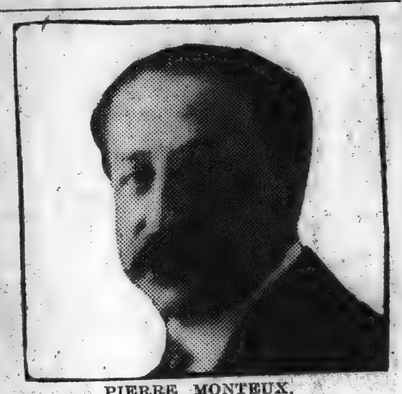
New York, August 25.—Pierre Monteux, successor to Karl Muck as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here today on the Lorraine from Havre. He brought works of several new French composers, but said that German music would have its place on his programs. Muck, who had been interned for Germany last week.

BOSTON GLOBE—AUGUST 25, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER ARRIVES

Pierre Monteux in New York Brings New French Works

NEW YORK, Aug 25—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, formerly conducted by Karl Muck, interned for alleged pro-German activities, and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here today on the French liner Lorraine from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children.



PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He brought with him the works of several new French composers which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programs. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

BOSTON AMERICAN
AUGUST 26, 1919

Monteux Will Not Cut German Music From Symphony

New York, Aug. 26.—German music will have its place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to Pierre Monteux, former conductor at the Metropolitan, now leader of the orchestra, who arrived here on the Lorraine from Paris.

He succeeded Henri Rabaud, noted French leader and composer, who served last season following the arrest and internment of Karl Muck.

There was some irony in the fact that Mr. Monteux and his predecessor passed each other on the high seas, Muck aboard the Frederick VII.

"German music," said Mr. Monteux, "should have a place in opera and concert programs, like the music of all other nations, and racial prejudice should not be allowed to enter into the matter."

BOSTON HERALD, AUGUST 28, 1919.

PIERRE MONTEUX REACHES BOSTON

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston from New York last night, accompanied by his wife and daughter and William H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra. On his arrival he was met by friends and taken to their home for the night.

The new conductor, who is known in this city for his able leadership of the orchestra in several concerts at Symphony hall last season, pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, has brought an assortment of new scores with him from Paris and the operas will be heard in this city for the first time in this country.

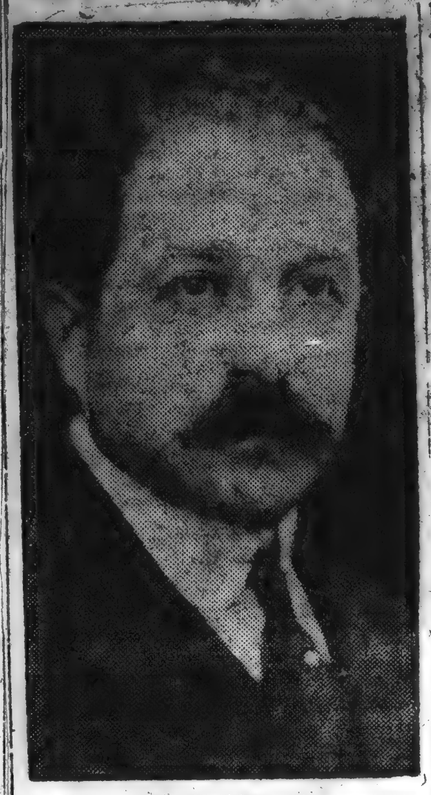
Mr. Monteux was director of French operas at the Metropolitan last year, when he was offered the leadership of the Symphony to succeed Dr. Karl Muck after the latter was interned. Because of his contract in New York he was unable to accept the position, except for the few concerts before the arrival of Conductor Rabaud.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date 16

Why Mengelberg Did Not Come

THE ridiculous rumor that Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor, had been offered a salary of $75,000 to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had refused it is punctured by César Saerchinger in the Musical Courier. The only offer made to him was, as he attested, some years ago, and the sum was not large enough to tempt him to leave Europe. "With nearly a hundred concerts in Holland," he said, "a great series in Frankfurt, and 'guest' engagements in all the neighboring countries I have a most interesting

BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1919. THE



PIERRE MONTEUX
New Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Back from France.

NEW SYMPHONY HEAD DUE TODAY

Pierre Monteux Lands in New York and Takes Train for Boston

WILL GIVE SEVERAL NEW WORKS HERE

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

NEW YORK, Aug. 25—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine, and was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra. They left New York tonight on the midnight train.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to take it, as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House, but conducted the orchestra until the arrival of Henri Rabaud. He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned because of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

Will Have Its Place

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programs of the orchestra. "French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said.

"My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteux were his wife and two children.

Mr. Monteux, on arrival in Boston will immediately begin to arrange his programs for the winter concerts. He has with him an assortment of new scores that he has brought from Paris.

He purposes to have Wagner on his first program. He has three letters from Camille Saint-Saens, containing scores which the French composer has mentioned as among his works available for giving before Boston audiences. Mr. Monteux will also give in Boston the first performance in America of D'Indy's third symphony, a work inspired by the war.

Another feature of the season will be the first performance at a Boston Symphony concert of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure. Two other first productions in America will be of the early "Fantasie for Piano and Orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and one of the same composer's latest important compositions, the score of "Jeux" (plays) which he wrote for a ballet for Nijinsky, the Russian dancer. Other modern works produced will be by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducasse and Albert Roussel.

Two symphonies—at least—of Beethoven, the fourth and the ninth, with chorus; symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn and Cesar Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus, will be given.

Among the Slavic composers represented will be Dvorak, Tschaikowsky and Strawinsky, the latter probably by a suite from "The Bird of Fire."

BOSTON TRAVELER. WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27,

SYMPHONY NOT TO BAR GERMAN MUSIC

Word comes from New York that Pierre Monteux, who has just returned from Paris on his way to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not exclude German music from the repertoire of his organization.

The decision seems to us entirely wise. Nothing but prejudice could cause a continuance of the ban on all things German that naturally was maintained during the war. Products of German factories will, perhaps, be readmitted but slowly to our markets, because the articles can in most instances be duplicated in our own workrooms or in those of some friendlier nation. But with works of art, the condition is different. A painting, a piece of sculpture, or a musical composition, is the product of individual genius. It cannot be duplicated. It is created wherever the producer chances, or chooses, to do his work. The works of artists everywhere are the heritage of all mankind. Permanently to deprive ourselves of the enjoyment of whatever is best in German music, would be to spite ourselves without even the pitiful satisfaction of spiting the Germans.

To discard the contributions of German genius merely because of a dislike for Germany, would be a good deal like the deliberate efforts of German military leaders to destroy Rheims Cathedral and other monuments of French art.

At the same time, it will be well to re-examine every specimen of German brain-work before accepting it. Much of German art and German philosophy has false ideals woven into its fabric. Now that the results of such ideals have been so graphically and so tragically exhibited in the Teuton assault upon civilization, we should be extremely vigilant against every form of German doctrine, however carefully disguised.

MONITOR, BOSTON, AUGUST 26,

MR. MONTEUX IN AMERICA

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday on the S. S. Lorraine, accompanied by Mrs. Monteux. They have been spending some time with relatives and friends in France. Mr. Monteux told a representative of The Christian Science Monitor that he expects to present the works of the familiar masters, including Wagner. He brings with him Joan Bedetti, first 'cellist, and Frederic Denayer, first viola. He also has two new works, a symphony by D'Indy and Rabaud and a new work for organ and orchestra by Saint-Saëns. Mr. and Mrs. Monteux, Mr. Bedetti, and Mr. Denayer leave for Boston Wednesday.

BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, AUGUST 26,

INTENDS TO GIVE MUSIC ASKED FOR

Monteux Arrives and Talks of Symphony Programs

Special Dispatch to the Globe

NEW YORK, Aug 25—Pierre Monteux the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine. He was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra. Mr Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year and received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to take it as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House.

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL

Pierre Monteux, well known to New York music lovers, recently returned from Paris to assume direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The s. s. Lorraine, on which M. Monteux sailed to America, passed in mid-ocean the Frederik VIII, bound for Denmark, and numbering among its passengers the deported Dr. Karl Muck, former of the Bos[illegible] Symphony.

HERALD
ess New York City
AUG

German Music Not Barred in Boston, Says Mr. Monteux

French Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Passes Deported Doktor Muck on Ocean.

German music will have its place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to Pierre Monteux, formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan, now the new leader of the orchestra, who arrived here yesterday on board the Lorraine from Paris. He succeeds Henri Rabau, noted French leader and composer, who was appointed conductor, and served last season after the arrest and internment of Karl Muck, who declined to play "The Star Spangled Banner."

By a strange turn of fate Muck and his successor, Mr. Monteux, passed each other on the ocean. Muck was on board the Frederick VIII., that left here last Thursday for Copenhagen. "I am not German," said the deported musician going away. "I am without a flag or a country. I am going now to Denmark." He always has maintained that he is Swiss. But if there are any persons willing to wager large amounts that the Doktor's address presently will not be somewhere in Germany they have not arisen up to date.

Mr. Monteux does not go to Boston unknown as a leader, for he conducted several concerts for the Boston orchestra as a guest before the arrival of Mr. Rabaud. When the position of permanent conductor was offered to him late last season the Metropolitan Opera management at his request willingly cancelled his contract there, which still had some years to run.

During his trip abroad Mr. Monteux said he procured some new symphonies by French composers, notably one by Vincent d'Indy, and that he would give a good deal of attention to the interpretation of French music, which he thinks is not often done correctly here. He will confer with musicians here before going to his new post.

There is no reason, according to Mr. Monteux, for German music to be barred. "German music," he said, "should have a place in opera and concert programmes just like the music of all other nations, and racial prejudice should not be allowed to enter into the matter."

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, AUGUST 25,

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LEADER ARRIVES

PIERRE MONTEUX AND FAMILY NOW IN NEW YORK—MET AT PIER BY DELEGATION OF PLAYERS

New York, Aug. 25—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chosen to succeed Karl Muck interned for alleged pro-German activities and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here today on the French liner Lorraine from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children. He brought with him the works of several new French composers which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programmes. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He takes charge of the Boston orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr Karl Muck, who was interned during the war as a dangerous enemy and who left last week for Europe.

When Mr Monteux was asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. "French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he added. "My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr Monteux were his wife [illegible] two children. They will leave for B[illegible] ton on the midnight train.

PRIMARY NOMINATIONS

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1919

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR DUE TODAY

Monteux to Arrive in New York With New Works

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season, and who is expected to arrive in New York tonight.

Pierre Monteux, conductor for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York this evening or Sunday morning. He will have about a month's intermission between his summer preparation of scores for the coming Symphony season and the opening of that season, early in October, before commencing rehearsals with the men.

PERSONNEL IMPROVED

Exceptional interest in Mr. Monteux's work with the orchestra is felt, particularly in view of the statement of the departing Karl Muck, day before yesterday, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would never be again what it was when Dr. Muck conducted it, because of the discharge of 29 German players, of whom Dr. Muck said he doubted if they could ever be reassembled.

It is safe to say that Mr. Monteux will not make any particular effort to reassemble the German players. In view of the wonderful work Mr. Monteux did early last season in rehearsing the Boston Symphony, and the results from an orchestra minus 29 Germans, it is certain that the Boston orchestra will not be the same band that Muck conducted in several important particulars. First of all it will be a better one, with, as everyone, quite aside from international politics, acknowledges, a more artistic personnel.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux, then with the Metropolitan Opera Company, undertook preliminary rehearsals of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra (minus 29 German players) at the beginning of last season, and also conducted, with brilliant success, two of the Boston Symphony concerts, until it was possible for Mr. Henri Rabaud to get here from France. It was because of Mr. Monteux's showing at those two concerts that he was engaged for the coming season, when it became known that Mr. Rabaud could not return to Boston. Mr. Monteux has with him a number of new and interesting works, and it is certain that Symphony lovers in Boston are to enjoy a very interesting season.

From American
Baltimore, Md.
AUG 26

PIERRE MONTEUX ARRIVES.

New York, August 25.—Pierre Monteux, successor to Karl Muck as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here today on the Lorraine from Havre. He brought works of several new French composers, but said that German music would have its place on his programs. Muck, who had been interned for Germany last week,

BOSTON GLOBE— AUGUST 25, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER ARRIVES

Pierre Monteux in New York Brings New French Works

NEW YORK, Aug 25—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, formerly conducted by Karl Muck, interned for alleged pro-German activities, and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here today on the French liner Lorraine from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children.

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He brought with him the works of several new French composers which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programs. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

BOSTON AMERICAN
AUGUST 26, 1919

Monteux Will Not Cut German Music From Symphony

New York, Aug. 26.—German music will have its place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to Pierre Monteux, former conductor at the Metropolitan, now leader of the orchestra, who arrived here on the Lorraine from Paris.

He succeeded Henri Rabaud, noted French leader and composer, who served last season following the arrest and internment of Karl Muck.

There was some irony in the fact that Mr. Monteux and his predecessor passed each other on the high seas, Muck aboard the Frederick VII.

"German music," said Mr. Monteux, "should have a place in opera and concert programs, like the music of all other nations, and racial prejudice should not be allowed to enter into the matter."

BOSTON HERALD, AUGUST 28, 1919.

PIERRE MONTEUX REACHES BOSTON

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston from New York last night, accompanied by his wife and daughter and William H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra. On his arrival he was met by friends and taken to their home for the night.

The new conductor, who is known in this city for his able leadership of the orchestra in several concerts at Symphony hall last season, pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, has brought an assortment of new scores with him from Paris and the operas will be heard in this city for the first time in this country.

Mr. Monteux was director of French operas at the Metropolitan last year, when he was offered the leadership of the Symphony to succeed Dr. Karl Muck after the latter was interned. Because of his contract in New York he was unable to accept the position, except for the few concerts before the arrival of Conductor Rabaud.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Why Mengelberg Did Not Come

THE ridiculous rumor that Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor, had been offered a salary of $75,000 to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had refused it is punctured by César Saerchinger in the Musical Courier. The only offer made to him was, as he attested, some years ago, and the sum was not large enough to tempt him to leave Europe. "With nearly a hundred concerts in Holland," he said, "a great series in Frankfurt, and 'guest' engagements in all the neighboring countries, I have a most interesting

BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1919. THE

PIERRE MONTEUX
New Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Back from France.

NEW SYMPHONY HEAD DUE TODAY

Pierre Monteux Lands in New York and Takes Train for Boston

WILL GIVE SEVERAL NEW WORKS HERE

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

NEW YORK, Aug. 25—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine, and was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra. They left New York tonight on the midnight train.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to take it, as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House, but conducted the orchestra until the arrival of Henri Rabaud. He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned because of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

Will Have Its Place

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programs of the orchestra. "French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said.

"My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteux were his wife and two children.

Mr. Monteux, on arrival in Boston will immediately begin to arrange his programs for the winter concerts. He has with him an assortment of new scores that he has brought from Paris.

He purposes to have Wagner on his first program. He has three letters from Camille Saint-Saens, containing scores which the French composer has mentioned as among his works available for giving before Boston audiences. Mr. Monteux will also give in Boston the first performance in America of D'Indy's third symphony, a work inspired by the war.

Another feature of the season will be the first performance at a Boston Symphony concert of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure. Two other first productions in America will be of the early "Fantasie for Piano and Orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and one of the same composer's latest important compositions, the score of "Jeux" (plays) which he wrote for a ballet for Nijinsky, the Russian dancer. Other modern works produced will be by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducassé and Albert Roussel.

Two symphonies—at least—of Beethoven, the fourth and the ninth, with chorus; symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn and César Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus, will be given.

Among the Slavic composers represented will be Dvorak, Tschaikowsky and Strawinsky, the latter probably by a suite from "The Bird of Fire."

COLDING OF

BOSTON TRAVELER. WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27,

SYMPHONY NOT TO BAR GERMAN MUSIC

Word comes from New York that Pierre Monteux, who has just returned from Paris on his way to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not exclude German music from the repertoire of his organization.

The decision seems to us entirely wise. Nothing but prejudice could cause a continuance of the ban on all things German that naturally was maintained during the war. Products of German factories will, perhaps, be readmitted but slowly to our markets, because the articles can in most instances be duplicated in our own workrooms or in those of some friendlier nation. But with works of art, the condition is different. A painting, a piece of sculpture, or a musical composition, is the product of individual genius. It cannot be duplicated. It is created wherever the producer chances, or chooses, to do his work. The works of artists everywhere are the heritage of all mankind. Permanently to deprive ourselves of the enjoyment of whatever is best in German music, would be to spite ourselves without even the pitiful satisfaction of spiting the Germans.

To discard the contributions of German genius merely because of a dislike for Germany, would be a good deal like the deliberate efforts of German military leaders to destroy Rheims Cathedral and other monuments of French art.

At the same time, it will be well to re-examine every specimen of German brain-work before accepting it. Much of German art and German philosophy has false ideals woven into its fabric. Now that the results of such idea's have been so graphically and so tragically exhibited in the Teuton assault upon civilization, we should be extremely vigilant against every form of German doctrine, however carefully disguised.

MONITOR, BOSTON, AUGUST 26,

MR. MONTEUX IN AMERICA

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York — Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday on the S. S. Lorraine, accompanied by Mrs. Monteux. They have been spending some time with relatives and friends in France. Mr. Monteux told a representative of The Christian Science Monitor that he expects to present the works of the familiar masters, including Wagner. He brings with him Joan Bedetti, first 'cellist, and Frederic Denayer, first viola. He also has two new works, a symphony by D'Indy and Rabaud and a new work for organ and orchestra by Saint-Saëns. Mr. and Mrs. Monteux, Mr. Bedetti, and Mr. Denayer leave for Boston Wednesday.

BOSTON GLOBE— TUESDAY, AUGUST 26,

INTENDS TO GIVE MUSIC ASKED FOR

Monteux Arrives and Talks of Symphony Programs

Special Dispatch to the Globe

NEW YORK, Aug 25—Pierre Monteux the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine. He was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra. Mr Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year and received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to take it as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House.

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL

Pierre Monteux, well known to New York music lovers, recently returned from Paris to assume direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The s. s. Lorraine, on which M. Monteux sailed to America, passed in mid-ocean the Frederik VIII, bound for Denmark, and numbering among its passengers the deported Dr. Karl Muck, former [illegible] the Boston Symphony.

HERALD
ess New York City
AUG 26 1919

German Music Not Barred in Boston, Says Mr. Monteux

French Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Passes Deported Doktor Muck on Ocean.

German music will have its place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to Pierre Monteux, formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan, now the new leader of the orchestra, who arrived here yesterday on board the Lorraine from Paris. He succeeds Henri Rabau, noted French leader and composer, who was appointed conductor, and served last season after the arrest and internment of Karl Muck, who declined to play "The Star Spangled Banner."

By a strange turn of fate Muck and his successor, Mr. Monteux, passed each other on the ocean. Muck was on board the Frederick VIII., that left here last Thursday for Copenhagen. "I am not German," said the deported musician going away. "I am without a flag or a country. I am going now to Denmark." He always has maintained that he is Swiss. But if there are any persons willing to wager large amounts that the Doktor's address presently will not be somewhere in Germany they have not arisen up to date.

Mr. Monteux does not go to Boston unknown as a leader, for he conducted several concerts for the Boston orchestra as a guest before the arrival of Mr. Rabaud. When the position of permanent conductor was offered to him late last season the Metropolitan Opera management at his request willingly cancelled his contract there, which still had some years to run.

During his trip abroad Mr. Monteux said he procured some new symphonies by French composers, notably one by Vincent d'Indy, and that he would give a good deal of attention to the interpretation of French music, which he thinks is not often done correctly here. He will confer with musicians here before going to his new post.

There is no reason, according to Mr. Monteux,, for German music to be barred. "German music," he said, "should have a place in opera and concert programmes just like the music of all other nations, and racial prejudice should not be allowed to enter into the matter."

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, AUGUST 25,

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LEADER ARRIVES

PIERRE MONTEUX AND FAMILY NOW IN NEW YORK—MET AT PIER BY DELEGATION OF PLAYERS

New York, Aug. 25—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chosen to succeed Karl Muck interned for alleged pro-German activities and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here today on the French liner Lorraine from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children. He brought with him the works of several new French composers which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programmes. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

PIERRE MONTEUX.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He takes charge of the Boston orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr Karl Muck, who was interned during the war as a dangerous enemy and who left last week for Europe.

When Mr Monteux was asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. "French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he added. "My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr Monteux were his wife and two children. They will leave for Boston on the midnight train.

PRIMARY NOMINATIONS

Boston Traveler

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1919. SIXTE

Monteaux, New Boston Symphony Conductor, Opens Brookline Home

Pierre Monteaux, Boston's new Symphony orchestra conductor, Mrs. Monteaux and their little daughter, Denise.

BY CHARLES A. PARKER
Traveler Staff Reporter

Pierre Monteaux, Boston's new Symphony Orchestra conductor, today opened his new home at randBon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteaux and little Miss Denise Monteaux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteaux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

(Continued on Page Four, Column 4.)

ONTEAUX OPENS BROOKLINE HOME

Continued from First Page

He was in Boston eight days in November, 1916, at the time of the presentation of the Russian Ballet here at the Boston Opera House and again last year for six weeks as leader of the Symphony Orchestra previous to the arrival of Rabaud.

He has appointments to meet a large group of New York composers and a group of the leading Boston composers.

Today he will begin the arrangement of the program for this winter.

Perhaps no conductor is better qualified to arrange a musical program for the edification and delectation of music-lovers in America than is Mr. Monteaux.

Already it has been announced he will inculcate German symphonies into the winter's program.

Mr. Monteaux comes to Boston with a wholly open-minded and refreshing viewpoint regarding the musical desires of Boston and of America.

"Now that the war is over, let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs." That is his attitude as regards musical standards from the point of view of what happened during the war.

It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteaux lived with the soldiers of France—as one of them in the trenches.

"I had my violin with me," he related. "When it was possible I played. I played in the French churches on Sundays with an organist and a solo singer accompanying. Sometimes when there was no singer and no organ I played by my lonesome.

"I watched the shells flying overhead in Rheims, Verdun, Soissons, and later in Argonne."

In 1916 Mr. Monteaux was released from military duties and came to this country.

"Neither America nor any of the rest of the world has lost its love for music as a result of the war," he said today.

"In fact, the same old love exists and will always exist in the hearts of those with a true love of music. We shall have symphonies and music of a new character perhaps here and there. Of course, that is inevitable. But the time will not come when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. That will remain and endure—just as some of our best in literature and in poetry remains and always will be dear to us.

"You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music. Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer.

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the "dance spirit" which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American.

Will Be Original

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

Mr. Monteaux referred to the Boston composer Gilbert as one who has written themes having the originality and the true "color" of American music.

He is to confer with Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Foote and others here with a view to learning what the American music-lovers desire as American compositions.

Mr. Monteaux indeed is ready to present fully and generously all American scores that can be best presented by orchestration and which seems likely to find favor with Americons.

"Americans want the classics in music," he said. "That means German compositions."

"Hitherto Italian music has failed for the concert. There have been no symphonies. Today, Casella and four or five other young Italians have written musical poems and ballads which seem worthy of production.

"Some of these will be given by the Symphony Orchestra this winter. I cannot say how these will be received. Personally I like them. It is another question as to what audiences will say.

D'Indy Symphony

"A new symphony written by D'Indy will perhaps prove of interest here. He is an old man—a spectator to the things that have been transpiring in France for the past four terrible years, but he seems to have translated the spirit of the war into his scores.

"Boston has a different spirit of musical appreciation from New York. Here we are, to a very praiseworthy degree, looking for the good, the appreciable in our music. The New Yorker, it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something that he has heard before.

"He is what you might call a pessimist, while we here are optimists. He finds out the bad. We find out the good in our music.

"It must be remembered that none of us is perfect."

MEANS TO PLAY GERMAN MUSIC

Leader Monteux Says War Rancors Have No Place in Symphony Programs

EXPECTS AMERICAN TYPE TO DEVELOPE

Pierre Monteux, Boston's new Symphony orchestra conductor, yesterday opened his new home at Brandon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteux and little Miss Denise Monteux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

He was in Boston eight days in November, 1916, at the time of the presentation of the Russian Ballet here at the Boston Opera House and again last year for six weeks as leader of the Symphony Orchestra previous to the arrival of Rabaud.

He has appointments to meet a large group of New York composers and a group of the leading Boston composers.

Today he will begin the arrangement of the program for this winter.

Perhaps no conductor is better qualified to arrange a musical program for the edification and delectation of music-lovers in America than is Mr. Monteux.

Already it has been announced he will inculcate German symphonies into the winter's program.

Mr. Monteux comes to Boston with a wholly open-minded and refreshing viewpoint regarding the musical desires of Boston and of America.

"Now that the war is over, let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs." That is his attitude as regards musical standards from the point of view of what happened during the war.

It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France—as one of them in the trenches.

"I had my violin with me," he related. [illegible] was possible I played.

Sundays with an organist and a solo singer accompanying. Sometimes when there was no singer and no organ I played by my lonesome.

"I watched the shells flying overhead in Rheims, Verdun, Soissons, and later in Argonne."

In 1916 Mr. Monteux was released from military duties and came to this country.

"Neither America nor any of the rest of the world has lost its love for music as a result of the war," he said yesterday.

"In fact, the same old love exists and will always exist in the hearts of those with a true love of music. We shall have symphonies and music of a new character perhaps here and there. Of course, that is inevitable. But the time will not come when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. That will remain and endure—just as some of our best in literature and in poetry remains and always will be dear to us.

"You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music. Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer.

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the "dance spirit" which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American.

Will Be Original

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

Mr. Monteux referred to the Boston composer Gilbert as one who has written themes having the originality and the true "color" of American music.

He is to confer with Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Foote and others here with a view to learning what the American music-lovers desire as American compositions.

Mr. Monteux indeed is ready to present fully and generously all American scores that can be best presented by orchestration and which seem likely to find favor with Americans.

"Americans want the classics in music," he said. "That means German compositions.

"Hitherto Italian music has failed for the concert. There have been no symphonies. Today, Casella and four or five other young Italians have written musical poems and ballads which seem worthy of production.

"Some of these will be given by the Symphony Orchestra this winter. I cannot say how these will be received. Personally I like them. It is another question as to what audiences will say.

D'Indy Symphony

"A new symphony written by D'Indy will perhaps prove of interest here. He is an old man—a spectator to the things that have been transpiring in France for the past four terrible years, but he seems to have translated the spirit of the war into his scores.

"Boston has a different spirit of musical appreciation from New York. Here we are, to a very praiseworthy degree, looking for the good, the appreciable in our music. The New Yorker, it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something that he has heard before.

"He is what you might call a pessimist, while we here are optimists. He finds out the bad. We find out the good in our music.

"It must be remembered that none of us is perfect."

THE BOSTON HERALD,
FRIDAY, AUGUST 29, 1919

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER AND FAMILY

Pierre Monteux, Mrs. Monteux and Their Six-Year-Old Daughter, Denise, Who Have Established Their Home in Brookline for the Present.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
AUG 27 1919

A MUSICIAN'S SANITY.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," are the words attributed to Pierre Monteux, who is about to step into the symphonic shoes of the recently departed Dr. Muck, once leader of the famous Boston Band.

Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly right. In token of his declaration, he can now prove his breadth of mind by incorporating in the noted orchestra's programs some German music. The ban on Wagner in war-times, silly though it was, did indeed have some basis in patriotic fact. But the continuance of this policy will reduce lovers of music to hearing all sorts of second class stuff, when they might be getting the cream of genius.

Let us have Wagner, Bethoven, Brahms and Liszt to the full. The war is over and nothing is to be gained for art by tabooing these men and substituting for them their copyists and "sedulous apes."

Boston Traveler

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1919. SIXTE

Monteaux, New Boston Symphony Conductor, Opens Brookline Home

Pierre Monteaux, Boston's new Symphony orchestra conductor, Mrs. Monteaux and their little daughter, Denise.

BY CHARLES A. PARKER
Traveler Staff Reporter

Pierre Monteaux, Boston's new Symphony Orchestra conductor, today opened his new home at randBon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteaux and little Miss Denise Monteaux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteaux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

(Continued on Page Four, Column 4.)

ONTEAUX OPENS BROOKLINE HOME

Continued from First Page

e was in Boston eight days in No-nber, 1916, at the time of the presenta-n of the Russian Ballet here at the ton Opera House and again last r for six weeks as leader of the phony Orchestra previous to the ar-l of Rabaud.

has appointments to meet a large p of New York composers and a p of the leading Boston composers. morrow he will begin the arrange-t of the program for this winter.

rhaps no conductor is better quali-o arrange a musical program for ification and delectation of music-in America than is Mr. Monteaux. dy it has been announced he will ts German symphonies into the 's program.

Mr. Monteaux comes to Boston with wholly open-minded and refreshing wpoint regarding the musical desires Boston and of America.

"Now that the war is over, let us rget the war. It has no part in the lection of our musical programs." at is his attitude as regards musical standards from the point of view of what happened during the war.

It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France—as one of them in the trenches.

"I had my violin with me," he rel-d. "When it was possible I played. ayed in the French churches on ys with an organist and a solo ccompanying. Sometimes when s no singer and no organ I my lonesome.

d the shells flying overhead rdun, Soissons, and later

Monteux was released duties and came to this

s of the dark type—with ust as are the long, wavy little daughter; his own ined to be wavy—and deep

Music to Live

"Neither America nor any of the rest of the world has lost its love for music as a result of the war," he said today.

"In fact, the same old love exists and will always exist in the hearts of those with a true love of music. We shall have symphonies and music of a new character perhaps here and there. Of course, that is inevitable. But the time will not come when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. That will remain and endure—just as some of our best in literature and in poetry remains and always will be dear to us.

"You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music. Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer.

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the "dance spirit" which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American.

Will Be Original

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

Mr. Monteaux referred to the Boston composer Gilbert as one who has written themes having the originality and the true "color" of American music.

He is to confer with Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Foote and others here with a view to learning what the American music-lovers desire as American compositions.

Mr. Monteaux indeed is ready to present fully and generously all American scores that can be best presented by orchestration and which seems likely to find favor with Americons.

"Americans want the classics in music," he said. "That means German compositions."

"Hitherto Italian music has failed for the concert. There have been no symphonies. Today, Casella and four or five other young Italians have written musical poems and ballads which seem

MEANS TO PLAY GERMAN MUSIC

Leader Monteux Says War Rancors Have No Place in Symphony Programs

EXPECTS AMERICAN TYPE TO DEVELOPE

Pierre Monteux, Boston's new Symphony orchestra conductor, yesterday opened his new home at Brandon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteux and little Miss Denise Monteux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

He was in Boston eight days in November, 1916, at the time of the presentation of the Russian Ballet here at the Boston Opera House and again last year for six weeks as leader of the Symphony Orchestra previous to the arrival of Rabaud.

He has appointments to meet a large group of New York composers and a group of the leading Boston composers.

Today he will begin the arrangement of the program for this winter.

Perhaps no conductor is better qualified to arrange a musical program for the edification and delectation of music-lovers in America than is Mr. Monteux.

Already it has been announced he will inculcate German symphonies into the winter's program.

Mr. Monteux comes to Boston with a wholly open-minded and refreshing viewpoint regarding the musical desires of Boston and of America.

"Now that the war is over, let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs." That is his attitude as regards musical standards from the point of view of what happened during the war.

It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France—as one of them in the trenches.

"I had my violin with me," he related. "When it was possible I played.

THE BOSTON HERALD,
FRIDAY, AUGUST 29, 1919

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER AND FAMILY

Pierre Monteux, Mrs. Monteux and Their Six-Year-Old Daughter, Denise, Who Have Established Their Home in Brookline for the Present.

Sundays with an organist and a solo singer accompanying. Sometimes when there was no singer and no organ I played by my lonesome.

"I watched the shells flying overhead in Rheims, Verdun, Soissons, and later in Argonne."

In 1916 Mr. Monteux was released from military duties and came to this country.

"Neither America nor any of the rest of the world has lost its love for music as a result of the war," he said yesterday.

"In fact, the same old love exists and will always exist in the hearts of those with a true love of music. We shall have symphonies and music of a new character perhaps here and there. Of course, that is inevitable. But the time will not come when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. That will remain and endure—just as some of our best in literature and in poetry remains and always will be dear to us.

"You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music. Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer.

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the "dance spirit" which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American.

Will Be Original

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

Mr. Monteux referred to the Boston composer Gilbert as one who has written themes having the originality and the true "color" of American music.

He is to confer with Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Foote and others here with a view to learning what the American music-lovers desire as American compositions.

Mr. Monteux indeed is ready to present fully and generously all American scores that can be best presented by orchestration and which seem likely to find favor with Americans.

"Americans want the classics in music," he said. "That means German compositions.

"Hitherto Italian music has failed for the concert. There have been no symphonies. Today, Casella and four or five other young Italians have written musical poems and ballads which seem worthy of production.

"Some of these will be given by the Symphony Orchestra this winter. I cannot say how these will be received. Personally I like them. It is another question as to what audiences will say.

D'Indy Symphony

"A new symphony written by D'Indy will perhaps prove of interest here. He is an old man—a spectator to the things that have been transpiring in France for the past four terrible years, but he seems to have translated the spirit of the war into his scores.

"Boston has a different spirit of musical appreciation from New York. Here we are, to a very praiseworthy degree, looking for the good, the appreciable in our music. The New Yorker, it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something that he has heard before.

"He is what you might call a pessimist, while we here are optimists. He finds out the bad. We find out the good in our music.

"It must be remembered that none of us is perfect."

PRESS
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
AUG 27 1919

A MUSICIAN'S SANITY.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," are the words attributed to Pierre Monteux, who is about to step into the symphonic shoes of the recently departed Dr. Muck, once leader of the famous Boston Band.

Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly right. In token of his declaration, he can now prove his breadth of mind by incorporating in the noted orchestra's programs some German music. The ban on Wagner in war-times, silly though it was, did indeed have some basis in patriotic fact. But the continuance of this policy will reduce lovers of music to hearing all sorts of second class stuff, when they might be getting the cream of genius.

Let us have Wagner, Bethoven, Brahms and Liszt to the full. The war is over and nothing is to be gained for art by tabooing these men and substituting for them their copyists and "sedulous apes."

MONITOR, BOSTON,
SATURDAY, AUGUST 30,

MR. MONTEUX ON THE NEW ERA

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—"My plans for the most part are yet to be made," said Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, talking here with a representative of The Christian Science Monitor. "I have done no musical labor while I have been away this summer. I went to Paris to see my father and mother, and thought of nothing but having a family visit. I have done very little toward getting my concert season ready. In fact, I have come back early so that I can attend wholly to preparations. While in Paris I paid little attention to what was going on, though of course there were a number of doings which I could not help observing.

"For one thing, I could not fail to see that music there has yet to pick itself up from the prostration of war. At the same time, I could not help feeling assured that things would presently be regular again. At the Opéra and the Opéra Comique, the repertory is rather conservative and stationary; yet the attendance at the Opéra Comique, with bills like 'Manon' and 'Butterfly' continually recurring, is large. What one misses is the production of new works. But I am sure that by October nearly every institution will have recovered its former initiative. The orchestras, especially, I expect to hear of as returning to the old basis. During the war, the Colonne Orchestra and the Lamoureux Orchestra were combined into one body; but now they are to be resolved back into their normal state, with Pierné conducting the Colonne and Chevillard the Lamoureux.

"Wagner in Paris? Oh, not for a good while yet. Too much hostility to him there for conductors to think of putting his works on their programs. But in time, I think, the opposition will grow less and will ultimately disappear. Strauss? Probably not for years. A great composer, and his works will be missed; but I see no likelihood of his getting back into favor soon in France. I expect to present certain Wagnerian pieces myself in Boston this season, more particularly the preludes and things which are purely orchestral. As for Strauss, his works must wait some time yet, I believe, in America as well as in France, before they can have a welcome."

To an inquiry whether the musical radicals of Paris had tried anything on the town of late, Mr. Monteux replied: "They have; and I happened to attend a performance of one of their works. The composer was Darius Milhaud. The work was a symphonic poem for orchestra, chorus, and solo singer. In the scherzo of this work, the players didn't play and the singers didn't sing; all you heard from the orchestra was the rumble of drums, while all you heard from the chorus and soloist was shouting and calling. The piece bore the Greek title, 'Chorephores d'Eschyle.' I have no intention of producing it in Boston, you may be sure, interested as I am in new ideas. But a rather modern thing which I do hope to present is the music of Stravinsky's 'Pétrouchka.'

"I have already decided upon three novelties for my programs, at least one of which will be heard in Boston for the first time. To name them, there is d'Indy's third symphony, which has been performed in France, though I have little notion of how it sounds myself, having looked at it only in the manuscript. The music is now in the press. Then there is Saint-Saën's new symphony for organ and orchestra, which has been performed only once, and then at Ostend, Belgium, with the composer himself taking part. Lastly there is Rabaud's new symphonic poem, written especially to be produced at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

For another novelty, Mr. Monteux mentioned the possibility of a piece by Prokofieff. New players for the orchestra whom he named as coming from France to take important positions are Jean Bedetti, first violoncellist; and Frédéric Denayer, first viola player. For his choral concerts he referred to Franck's "Beatitude" and Beethoven's ninth symphony as quite certainly decided upon.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

... the bayonet.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1919

"Boston Is Wonderful Place," Says Monteux

Charming Wife and Daughter of Symphony Leader Also Happy in "Modern Athens"

"Boston is a wonderful place, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is second to none in the world." Thus spoke Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra, who has just arrived in Boston from New York, accompanied by his beautiful wife and charming little daughter.

"I am delighted to get back to Boston again and especially glad that you are having such wonderful weather here," continued the popular conductor.

"And you may take that as my sentiment exactly," said Madame Monteux, coming forward with smiling face and characteristic bow. "I love Boston," she said, "and the charming Bostonians, they are so cordial and lovely to us, and we feel very much at home in your beautiful city. We are looking forward with much anticipation to our work with you, and are certain that the orchestra will have the loyal support of the good people here."

M. Monteux and family have taken up their residence in a beautiful apartment in Brandon Hall, Brookline.

IT WAS MOVING DAY

"This is moving day for us, as you can see," remarked M. Monteux, as he assisted the porter in bringing a large trunk into his apartment, "but we hope to get entirely settled in a day or two and then we shall enjoy living."

The conductor stated that he had brought a number of new selections with him from Paris, including a new Symphony from Dindy and also one from Saint Seans, and that he hoped to present to Boston music lovers some entirely new brilliant numbers during the season.

brave and keep back the tears for the sake of others."

This is the philosophy of one of the prominent daughteres of France.

SEEKS LITTLE PLAYMATE

Little Mlle. Monteux, the charming five-year-old daughter of M. and Mme. Monteux, who speaks beautifully in both French and English, said she, too, was happy to be in Boston, and she hoped before long that she would find a nice little girl with whom she might play. She said her name was Denise, and that she was five years old. Her large black eyes beamed with delight as she spoke, and once she shook her black curls with apparent impatience when she thought her conversation was not being heard.

M. Monteux was director of French operas at the Metropolitan last year when he was offered the leadership of the Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, after the latter was interned. But because of his contract in New York he was unable to accept the position, except for a limited number of concerts, prior to the coming of Conductor Rabaud.

Madame Monteux spoke interestingly concerning the life in Paris during the past year.

"You would hardly know that France had suffered at all when you travel through Paris," she said, "everything seems to have taken on the old-time brilliancy, and life is apparently just as gay as ever. But, of course, down deep in the heart of France there is agonizing sorrow; we must not show it, however, we must be

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Monteux Chats With Elson on Music

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

IN a sunshiny room in Brandon Hall, where our new symphonic director is domiciled with his family, I first met M. Pierre Monteux, for I had not encountered him personally during his former short Boston seasons. A striking contrast with M. Rabaud is this genial Frenchman. Rabaud, long, thin, ascetic-looking (although he was very kindly under all his seriousness), while M. Monteux is short, chunky, bright, vivacious and thoroughly Parisian in manner, his 44 years sitting very lightly upon him. I promised him that the interview should not be painful enough to require anaesthetics, and he was evidently pleased that it was to be in French.

Naturally, he spoke first of program makeup. He believes in giving Wagner, but draws the line at the living Germans. "As a Frenchman," he said, "I cannot be in sympathy with Richard Strauss, Humperdinck, or any of the others who have aligned themselves against my country." But he was very broad in his tastes in every other direction, and is not likely to give us an overdose of the music of any single nation, not even of his own.

When we spoke of Russian music, he showed himself quite steeped in Stravinsky, as was but natural, since he conducted the world's premiers of "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" (both ballets) and of the opera "Le Rossignol." With the modern English school he was not so familiar. He intends to give some works by Liszt this season (we had nothing last year), but told me that Paris does not produce much Liszt music.

* * *

As regards American music, he was honestly outspoken. He feels it both a duty and a pleasure to give American works. He considers them worthy of performance in any concert in any country. He complimented the American composers upon the skill and ingenuity which was in many of their works, and he said that most of the native orchestral works were eminently interesting. But he seldom found an original or new school displayed in them. In common with much of the modern music, they are derived from some preceding models.

M. Monteux is going to give many novelties to keep us abreast of the latest musical progress, but "the classical must always be the foundation," he added.

There are not to be many changes in the personnel of the orchestra, the most notable one being the arrival of M. Jean Bedetti as first violoncellist, Mr. Schroeder being second. Denayer is to be first viola, and is likely to be a recrudescence of M. Ferir, who has in former days been the best violinist that Boston has heard. The viola is too often slurred over as being an unimportant instrument, but well-played it is the most expressive instrument in the world in its own particular field of melancholy and dreaminess.

M. Monteux has good ideas about the length of programs. "Not too long," he said; "never over two hours and better under." He believes that many otherwise good programs are ruined by over-length.

* * *

I, of course, asked him about his opinion of the effect of the war upon music. Here he did not express any very decided opinion, but he told me that he was not a great believer of war pictured in music. War symphonies, or pictures like the battle-scenes of Strauss and other composers he is not in much sympathy with. "But," I said, "you are going to give us the first American performance of D'Indy's third symphony, which is founded upon the war?" He thereupon explained to me that although inspired by war it was not in the blatant military style. It is evidently more subjective than objective.

As M. Monteux has made so many successes in the field of opera direction I ventured to ask him which he thought the higher school, opera or symphony? He was very emphatic in his reply. "Symphony," cried he. "Opera is not a single art. There is the music, but there are also the decorations, the costumes, the scenery, the poetry, the action, while symphony is music alone. Symphony is music, pure and alone. Symphony is therefore immeasurably the higher musical expression."

Then I asked him as to what he thought of the rank of our Boston orchestra at present. "It is difficult to say that this or that orchestra is the best in the world," replied he, "but one can very safely say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the very best in existence." He seemed very proud of the organization and of his position as its director.

At the end of this interview I was impressed with the fact that in M. Monteux we have a conductor who will be more piquant and aggressive in his programs than was M. Rabaud. He is likely to be as versatile a program-maker as Mr. Fiedler was, who became a great favorite in Boston because of his interesting musical lists. As a man, he is altogether charming, free from any trace of pompousness, chatty, smiling and with most expressive eyes that sparkle when he becomes especially interested in any subject. His Gallic politeness may be judged from the fact that he thanked me for having the interview in French and assured me that my French was far superior to his own English, which was decidedely an awful exaggeration.

* * *

The art of making up an effective program is far more subtle than the average reader imagines. Of our past symphony conductors, Messrs. Henschel, Nikisch, Paur and Fiedler were excellent in this field, while Messrs. Gericke and Muck were not nearly as successful program-makers as conductors. The points to be considered are chiefly these: Good contrast. This contrast must be not only in style, but in key and mode, too much major or minor in succession must be avoided.

M. PIERRE MONTEUX, new director of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An earnest piece should not be succeeded by a very light one. Pieces of one school should not follow each other. Pieces of one style of orchestration should likewise not succeed each other. Mr. Gericke held that the symphony, giving the most serious and developed thought of the concert, should always come last, so that nothing should disturb its impression upon the mind of the auditor, and this idea is a good one.

M. Rabaud followed out the above ideals but was hampered in another direction. He felt compelled to avoid much of the German music. This is an unnecessary and illogical result of a very logical dislike of the nation. For a school to ostracize the German language, or an orchestra to put German music under the ban, is like biting one's nose off to spite one's face. It has been well said that "he who knows but one language, knows none," and our English Bible (the King James) is very largely upon a Saxon foundation. Without a knowledge of French and German, no man can thoroughly understand English. There is something again to this in the musical field. Dvorak derives much from Germany; so does Tschaikowsky; so do Wolf-Ferrari, Grieg and musical representatives of many other nations. Cut out several of the German composers from a whole season's programs and the result will be tepidity and dulness. Recent Boston symphony programs have vibrated too much between Cesar Franck and St. Saens, with an occasional change to Berlioz.

This is a subject which is very easily misunderstood. I certainly am opposed to becoming as ultra-Teutonic in a musical program as Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke were. But the pendulum has now swung to the other extreme. Every concert-goer knows that the programs have recently lost something of flavor and spice, and it would be perilous to continue this weakened effect over another season. Let us hear something of all schools and nations during the coming season, including every notorious novelty (good or bad) and something of American creation also, the last named being chosen with especial care and discrimination.

MONITOR, BOSTON

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30,

MR. MONTEUX ON THE NEW ERA

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—"My plans for the most part are yet to be made," said Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, talking here with a representative of The Christian Science Monitor. "I have done no musical labor while I have been away this summer. I went to Paris to see my father and mother, and thought of nothing but having a family visit. I have done very little toward getting my concert season ready. In fact, I have come back early so that I can attend wholly to preparations. While in Paris I paid little attention to what was going on, though of course there were a number of doings which I could not help observing.

"For one thing, I could not fail to see that music there has yet to pick itself up from the prostration of war. At the same time, I could not help feeling assured that things would presently be regular again. At the Opéra and the Opéra Comique, the repertory is rather conservative and stationary; yet the attendance at the Opéra Comique, with bills like 'Manon' and 'Butterfly' continually recurring, is large. What one misses is the production of new works. But I am sure that by October nearly every institution will have recovered its former initiative. The orchestras, especially, I expect to hear of as returning to the old basis. During the war, the Colonne Orchestra and the Lamoureux Orchestra were combined into one body; but now they are to be resolved back into their normal state, with Pierné conducting the Colonne and Chevillard the Lamoureux.

"Wagner in Paris? Oh, not for a good while yet. Too much hostility to him there for conductors to think of putting his works on their programs. But in time, I think, the opposition will grow less and will ultimately disappear. Strauss? Probably not for years. A great composer, and his works will be missed; but I see no likelihood of his getting back into favor soon in France. I expect to present certain Wagnerian pieces myself in Boston this season, more particularly the preludes and things which are purely orchestral. As for Strauss, his works must wait some time yet, I believe, in America as well as in France, before they can have a welcome."

To an inquiry whether the musical radicals of Paris had tried anything on the town of late, Mr. Monteux replied: "They have; and I happened to attend a performance of one of their works. The composer was Darius Milhaud. The work was a symphonic poem for orchestra, chorus, and solo singer. In the scherzo of this work, the players didn't play and the singers didn't sing; all you heard from the orchestra was the rumble of drums, while all you heard from the chorus and soloist was shouting and calling. The piece bore the Greek title, 'Chorephores d'Eschyle.' I have no intention of producing it in Boston, you may be sure, interested as I am in new ideas. But a rather modern thing which I do hope to present is the music of Stravinsky's 'Pétrouchka.'

"I have already decided upon three novelties for my programs, at least one of which will be heard in Boston for the first time. To name them, there is d'Indy's third symphony, which has been performed in France, though I have little notion of how it sounds myself, having looked at it only in the manuscript. The music is now in the press. Then there is Saint-Saën's new symphony for organ and orchestra, which has been performed only once, and then at Ostend, Belgium, with the composer himself taking part. Lastly there is Rabaud's new symphonic poem, written especially to be produced at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

For another novelty, Mr. Monteux mentioned the possibility of a piece by Prokofieff. New players for the orchestra whom he named as coming from France to take important positions are Jean Bedetti, first violoncellist; and Frédéric Denayer, first viola player. For his choral concerts he referred to Franck's "Beatitude" and Beethoven's ninth symphony as quite certainly decided upon.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1919

"Boston Is Wonderful Place," Says Monteux

Charming Wife and Daughter of Symphony Leader Also Happy in "Modern Athens"

"Boston is a wonderful place, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is second to none in the world." Thus spoke Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra, who has just arrived in Boston from New York, accompanied by his beautiful wife and charming little daughter.

"I am delighted to get back to Boston again and especially glad that you are having such wonderful weather here," continued the popular conductor.

"And you may take that as my sentiment exactly," said Madame Monteux, coming forward with smiling face and characteristic bow. "I love Boston," she said, "and the charming Bostonians, they are so cordial and lovely to us, and we feel very much at home in your beautiful city. We are looking forward with much anticipation to our work with you, and are certain that the orchestra will have the loyal support of the good people here."

M. Monteux and family have taken up their residence in a beautiful apartment in Brandon Hall, Brookline.

IT WAS MOVING DAY

"This is moving day for us, as you can see," remarked M. Monteux, as he assisted the porter in bringing a large trunk into his apartment," but we hope to get entirely settled in a day or two and then we shall enjoy living."

The conductor stated that he had brought a number of new selections with him from Paris, including a new Symphony from Dindy and also one from Saint Seans, and that he hoped to present to Boston music lovers some entirely new brilliant numbers during the season.

M. Monteux was director of French operas at the Metropolitan last year when he was offered the leadership of the Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, after the latter was interned. But because of his contract in New York he was unable to accept the position, except for a limited number of concerts, prior to the coming of Conductor Rabaud.

Madame Monteux spoke interestingly concerning the life in Paris during the past year.

"You would hardly know that France had suffered at all when you travel through Paris," she said, "everything seems to have taken on the old-time brilliancy, and life is apparently just as gay as ever. But, of course, down deep in the heart of France there is agonizing sorrow; we must not show it, however, we must be brave and keep back the tears for the sake of others."

This is the philosophy of one of the prominent daughteres of France.

SEEKS LITTLE PLAYMATE

Little Mlle. Monteux, the charming five-year-old daughter of M. and Mme. Monteux, who speaks beautifully in both French and English, said she, too, was happy to be in Boston, and she hoped before long that she would find a nice little girl with whom she might play. She said her name was Denise, and that she was five years old. Her large black eyes beamed with delight as she spoke, and once she shook her black curls with apparent impatience when she thought her conversation was not being heard.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Monteux Chats With Elson on Music

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

IN a sunshiny room in Brandon Hall, where our new symphonic director is domiciled with his family, I first met M. Pierre Monteux, for I had not encountered him personally during his former short Boston seasons. A striking contrast with M. Rabaud is this genial Frenchman. Rabaud, long, thin, ascetic-looking (although he was very kindly under all his seriousness), while M. Monteux is short, chunky, bright, vivacious and thoroughly Parisian in manner, his 44 years sitting very lightly upon him. I promised him that the interview should not be painful enough to require anaesthetics, and he was evidently pleased that it was to be in French.

Naturally, he spoke first of program makeup. He believes in giving Wagner, but draws the line at the living Germans. "As a Frenchman," he said, "I cannot be in sympathy with Richard Strauss, Humperdinck, or any of the others who have aligned themselves against my country." But he was very broad in his tastes in every other direction, and is not likely to give us an overdose of the music of any single nation, not even of his own.

When we spoke of Russian music, he showed himself quite steeped in Stravinsky, as was but natural, since he conducted the world's premiers of "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" (both ballets) and of the opera "Le Rossignol." With the modern English school he was not so familiar. He intends to give some works by Liszt this season (we had nothing last year), but told me that Paris does not produce much Liszt music.

* * *

As regards American music, he was honestly outspoken. He feels it both a duty and a pleasure to give American works. He considers them worthy of performance in any concert in any country. He complimented the American composers upon the skill and ingenuity which was in many of their works, and he said that most of the native orchestral works were eminently interesting. But he seldom found an original or new school displayed in them. In common with much of the modern music, they are derived from some preceding models.

M. Monteux is going to give many novelties to keep us abreast of the latest musical progress, but "the classical must always be the foundation," he added.

There are not to be many changes in the personnel of the orchestra, the most notable one being the arrival of M. Jean Bedetti as first violoncellist, Mr. Schroeder being second. Denayer is to be first viola, and is likely to be a recrudescence of M. Ferir, who has in former days been the best violinist that Boston has heard. The viola is too often slurred over as being an unimportant instrument, but well-played it is the most expressive instrument in the world in its own particular field of melancholy and dreaminess.

M. Monteux has good ideas about the length of programs. "Not too long," he said; "never over two hours and better under." He believes that many otherwise good programs are ruined by over-length.

* * *

I, of course, asked him about his opinion of the effect of the war upon music. Here he did not express any very decided opinion, but he told me that he was not a great believer of war pictured in music. War symphonies, or pictures like the battle-scènes of Strauss and other composers he is not in much sympathy with. "But," I said, "you are going to give us the first American performance of D'Indy's third symphony, which is founded upon the war?" He thereupon explained to me that although inspired by war it was not in the blatant military style. It is evidently more subjective than objective.

As M. Monteux has made so many successes in the field of opera direction I ventured to ask him which he thought the higher school, opera or symphony? He was very emphatic in his reply. "Symphony," cried he. "Opera is not a single art. There is the music, but there are also the decorations, the costumes, the scenery, the poetry, the action, while symphony is music alone. Symphony is music, pure and alone. Symphony is therefore immeasurably the higher musical expression."

Then I asked him as to what he thought of the rank of our Boston orchestra at present. "It is difficult to say that this or that orchestra is the best in the world," replied he, "but one can very safely say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the very best in existence." He seemed very proud of the organization and of his position as its director.

At the end of this interview I was impressed with the fact that in M. Monteux we have a conductor who will be more piquant and aggressive in his programs than was M. Rabaud. He is likely to be as versatile a program-maker as Mr. Fiedler was, who became a great favorite in Boston because of his interesting musical lists. As a man, he is altogether charming, free from any trace of pompousness, chatty, smiling and with most expressive eyes that sparkle when he becomes especially interested in any subject. His Gallic politeness may be judged from the fact that he thanked me for having the interview in French and assured me that my French was far superior to his own English, which was decidedely an awful exaggeration.

* * *

The art of making up an effective program is far more subtle than the average reader imagines. Of our past symphony conductors, Messrs. Henschel, Nikisch, Paur and Fiedler were excellent in this field, while Messrs. Gericke and Muck were not nearly as successful program-makers as conductors. The points to be considered are chiefly these: Good contrast. This contrast must be not only in style, but in key and mode, too much major or minor in succession must be avoided.

An earnest piece should not be succeeded by a very light one. Pieces of one school should not follow each other. Pieces of one style of orchestration should likewise not succeed each other. Mr. Gericke held that the symphony, giving the most serious and developed thought of the concert, should always come last, so that nothing should disturb its impression upon the mind of the auditor, and this idea is a good one.

M. Rabaud followed out the above ideals but was hampered in another direction. He felt compelled to avoid much of the German music. This is an unnecessary and illogical result of a very logical dislike of the nation. For a school to ostracize the German language, or an orchestra to put German music under the ban, is like biting one's nose off to spite one's face. It has been well said that "he who knows but one language, knows none," and our English Bible (the King James) is very largely upon a Saxon foundation. Without a knowledge of French and German, no man can thoroughly understand English. There is something again to this in the musical field. Dvorak derives much from Germany; so does Tschaikowsky; so do Wolf-Ferrari, Grieg and musical representatives of many other nations. Cut out several of the German composers from a whole season's programs and the result will be tepidity and dulness. Recent Boston symphony programs have vibrated too much between Cesar Franck and St. Saens, with an occasional change to Berlioz.

This is a subject which is very easily misunderstood. I certainly am opposed to becoming as ultra-Teutonic in a musical program as Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke were. But the pendulum has now swung to the other extreme. Every concert-goer knows that the programs have recently lost something of flavor and spice, and it would be perilous to continue this weakened effect over another season. Let us hear something of all schools and nations during the coming season, including every notorious novelty (good or bad) and something of American creation also, the last named being chosen with especial care and discrimination.

M. PIERRE MONTEUX, new director of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MANY NEW WORKS FOR SYMPHONY

Monteux Brings Compositions New to Musical World for First Performance—Will Play Wagner

BY OLIN DOWNES

NEW YORK, Aug. 25.—The uncommonly frank and direct regard of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at least two seasons to come, was tinged with a fine Gallic irony when the writer told him of the departing pronouncement of Dr. Karl Muck, who left America a few days ago, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could never again be the band that Muck had conducted, since the discharge of 29 German players.

NOT THE SAME, BUT BETTER

Mr. Monteux, who is a trifle fleshier than when last seen in Boston and looking very fit indeed after his summer vacation, raised his eyebrows a little and said in a thoughtful manner: "No! no! I don't suppose it can be the same. But"—as though pondering over some Euclidean mystery—"I don't speak of the conductor, but of the orchestra itself—may it not be, this band, even—a little better?"

Mr. Monteux debarked in the morning from an incoming steamer and stood smiling happily back of a fence which separated him from William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra. The two men did not kiss, in the proverbial French style, when they met, but the cordiality of the meeting was unmistakable. Mr. Monteux was accompanied by Mrs. Monteux and his six-year-old daughter, who has already commenced to study music.

Mr. Monteux will come to Boston Wednesday and will set immediately to work arranging his programmes for the winter and studying in detail an extremely interesting assortment of new scores which he has brought with him from Paris.

He spent six weeks in Paris and six more weeks at the seashore with his family. He gradually collected scores and in a number of instances had friendly conferences with their composers, some of them old friends of the conductor. Mr. Monteux's talk about these men was a word picture of a number of composers of today who may be encountered in the course of a visit to Paris, France.

Saint-Saens a Wagner Hater

Camille Saint-Saens, that amazing compound of composer, essayist, scientist, globe-trotter, metaphysician and cordial hater of Germany, in his youth a Wagnerite and now a passionate declaimer—you might think Saint-Saens in his twenties to hear the vigor of his arraignment — confronted Mr. Monteux with eagle nose and flashing eyes, and inveighed against coming productions of Wagner at the Paris Opera.

"They need new scenery there," shouted Saint-Saens, "but they won't get it when they produce Wagner."

Will Open With Wagner

"But I do not agree with that," said Mr. Monteux. "I plan to have Wagner on my first programme. And at Paris they will like it, too. There will be some trouble in the streets, probably, when they give Wagner, but"—he laughed—"I have known of trouble in the streets of Paris over smaller things than that. It will do the Opera no harm, and they will make money giving Wagner."

Mr. Monteux said to Saint-Saens, who, since he toured as pianist-composer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1906-07, has particularly vivid recollections of this organization:

Suggests Own Works

"I want to play some of your music

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived from France yesterday.

in Boston, but they are very familiar with your scores, of which my friend and colleague, M. Rabaud, has just given many brilliant performances."

Saint-Saens has not the reputation of a wit for nothing. His eye twinkled as he said—this composer of infinite productiveness and facility—"O, but they can't have heard all of them!" And that week Monteux received from Saint-Saens three letters, closely written, in a fine hand, of four pages each, of compositions which Saint-Saens mentioned as available for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

D'Indy's Third Symphony

Mr. Monteux talked with D'Indy and will give in Boston the first performance in America of that distinguished composer's third symphony, a long work, with a furiously triumphant finale, inspired by the war. In this there will be poetic justice. In his last season in Boston Dr. Muck refused to perform any work by the Frenchman, D'Indy, because of the very frank utterances that D'Indy was making at the time, in Paris, regarding Germany's part in the war. The genius of D'Indy is perhaps more profoundly spiritual than the finished and cosmopolitan art of Saint-Saens, a great artist, but also a man of the world. And as with the music of D'Indy, the composer, who, though younger than Saint-Saens, is no longer young, so with the bearing of D'Indy, the man: He lives today more an inner than an outer life. He seems to be meditating profoundly on things not of this world.

First Hearing of Hure Symphony

A first production in the world of a symphonic importance will be the premiere, at a Boston Symphony concert, of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure, who also, with this vast work completed, is succumbing gradually to a lung disease.

Two other first productions of great interest will be the first performances in America of an early and until now practically unknown "Fantasie for piano and orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and per contra, one of Debussy's last important compositions. This will be the score of "Jeux" ("Play") which Debussy wrote for performance as a ballet, for the Russian dancer, Nijinsky.

Played It in 1913

"I particularly want to do this," said Mr. Monteux, "because I felt when I conducted the first performances of 'Jeux' in Paris and in London in 1913, that Nijinsky" (who appeared as a tennis player, with his racket on the stage) "adopted rather silly and unrelated action to some really charming music. Nijinsky is the great male dancer of the world. But the stage genius of the Russian ballet was not Nijinsky, but Fokine, who never came to America, and of whom Nijinsky was jealous.

Other modern works to be produced will be compositions by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducasse, Albert Roussel. But Mr. Monteux is also a worshipper of the classics.

Give Ninth With Chorus

There will be played at least two symphonies of Beethoven—the fourth, and the ninth, with chorus—symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms Mendelssohn, whom Mr. Monteux thinks it is the custom today to a little underrate, and, as Mr. Monteux hopes, for the last concert of the season, a production of Cesar Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus.

Mr. Monteux will also give attention to music by Slavic composers, among them Dvorak, Tschaikowsky, Strawinsky, the latter to be represented, probably, by a suite from the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Bird of Fire."

It will be observed that the foregoing list of composers has practically a prewar percentage of German names, with the exception of one or two modern German composers, such as Richard Strauss. When I asked Mr. Monteux if he would play Strauss, his answer was particularly interesting, in view of his refusal, during war time, to conduct a performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" for the Russian ballet. "I would like to play him very much," he said. "I think that it is time to think of music and war as two different things. During the conflict it seemed to me wrong to conduct a performance of a work which would send a substantial royalty to a composer whose nation had outraged justice, while my own countrymen and comrades were dying in the trenches. But Strauss' music was not composed by the war, and the war is over. On the other hand, it would be as inhuman as it would be academic to expect the nations of the earth to forget in a day the frightful orgy of injury and suffering through which they have passed.

"Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but also only fair, to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programmes. Not to have him on one's programme is a loss to a conductor, because even Strauss' poorer music is so brilliantly orchestrated that it is certain to make a big effect. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory: The state, following the cataclysm, of the nerves of the world."

TRANSCRIPT, TUES[DAY] [find] is so ignificantly small and the final price so
DAY, AUGUST 26,

M. MONTEUX RETURNS

By contrast to the grievous uncertainties which hung about Symphony Hall one year ago at this time, it is a situation far more harmonious and assured which M. Pierre Monteaux will find there today as he returns to Boston to take up his duties as leader. Gratefulness may well be felt for this, and it may be felt without any forgetting that the very nature and number of the perplexities confronting the Symphony Orchestra one year ago were the measure of the credit due to M. Rabaud for his mastery of them and to the new board of trustees for making this mastery possible. The foundations of reconstruction laid then, when many a mainstay of the orchestra seemed to be slipping, would not have been good foundations at all had they not endured. It is their presence today, as a basis ready to the hand of M. Monteux for his fresh building, which testifies to the soundness of last year's achievement.

Contrary reports notwithstanding, the personnel established for the orchestra before the close of the season of 1918 remains without substantial change. The rumors of defections to Detroit and Philadelphia have been grossly exaggerated, probably for reasons best known to the musicians' union which helped engineer them. A few men go, but their number scarcely exceeds the percentage of change which has been found normal from season to season. This small group aside, there have been also some little shiftings among the strings. These are not of consequence, certainly not as against the many string-players who, with the excellent Fradkin still concert-master, all remain at their accustomed desks. In the brass choir the same first quartette of horns stands intact. M. Monteux, it has been truly announced, is bringing with him a new first cellist and a new first viola—the sole changes among section-leaders. Here is only further contribution—both of these players are French—to the homogeneity and essential unison gained for the orchestra last year despite the croaking of many ravens.

Given his material, there need be no questioning the result which the artistry and the musicianly craftsmanship of M. Monteux will work out of it. Boston has had one experience of him, be it remembered, and critics here know him for the extraordinarily competent leader of rehearsals, drillmaster at once of infinite exactitudes and of infinite subtleties, which he then proved himself. They know the vigor and warmth and the novel interest of the finished product as he brought it to the opening concert of the season of 1918 after weeks of such painstaking preparation as delights in. With this memory happy inspection, and with taste keen for of good things in prospect, Bos- meets M. Monteux at the moment turn and says sincerely "Thank ming."

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

SEP 11 1919

Edited by Chas. D. Isaac

Boston Symphony's Conductor Prefers the People's Concerts

This interview was in the earlier days of Pierre Monteux's sojourn in America. He had but recently been appointed to the conductor's stand at the Metropolitan Opera House. He had finished his work at the Civic concerts and had only recently put away his memories of the Russian Ballet tour. Now that he holds the honor of conducting America's premier orchestra, the Boston Symphony, I doubt that his sentiments have changed. Rather do I think that it is partly because of his early ideas that he has won so hearty a recognition from critics and public.

I put away my notes after that interview and I meant to write soon of what he said. Other subjects, more timely, crowded in, and the Monteux interview remained to be recorded. It is well, however, for now that Pierre Monteux is the cynosure of all eyes, the matter will be all the more significant.

I can remember the meeting as clearly as if I just came from it.

There he was standing in his sunny room. On a table was a large score which he was studying. He was smiling, a clean-shaven face with a moustache of silken texture, and all rosy and polished a Parisian his finger tips.

We talked a while and then Monteux mentioned what is a favorite topic with him.

"What kind of music should we give the people? One kind, just one kind. That is the best, the very best! Not always do the people know what is the best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to win out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?

"Ah, my friend, I would rather conduct for a popular concert than a formal one. I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience that doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners."

Monteux's face wrinkled in a smile as he recalled a story which this brought to his mind.

"One time in Paris I decided to bring out the music of Stravinsky. It was new to the people and they were very enthusiastic—against the music. They were crying and throwing things. The second performance it was the same. The third it was the same, only then we had given up the use of the scenery. Stravinsky was spied in the audience and they went for him. They ran at him, and Stravinsky ran away. It happened to be election day, and what do you think? A few blocks away the crowds thought the fleeing composer was elected—and they greeted him with "Vive la Deputy"!

"Talk about noise. The only other music where there was ever so much racket was at a rehearsal in my school. I was rather mischievous, I would have you understand. I had tied a string to the bass drum, and in the very middle of a sad part in the clarionets, I pulled the string. Down went the drum clattering."

These stories I mention because it is necessary that you understand the human side of the musician. Many have declared Monteux cold, unsentimental. But this is not so. He told me that once on tour with the Russian Ballet it was announced that the Kaiser would attend. Instantly Monteux handed over his baton to his assistant.

Despite Monteux's interest in a popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman there are two kinds of conductors, gallery and orchestra. The "gallery" conductor is concerned with making catchy effects. The orchestra conductor is too much occupied with the music to try for superficialities.

"It is the duty of a conductor," said Monteux, "to win the love of his men. Once he has that, he can almost be a bad conductor, for they will respond with sincerity. You can tell when a conductor is loved by his men. It is in the heart of the music they play. I have been a member of an orchestra, and I know what the men are and want. I have been against conductors we did not like.

As a matter of fact, I did my first conducting at twelve years of age. I have played violin and viola. I don't play the piano. A pianist-conductor can't know orchestral work. When I stand here at home before my score I hear everything playing to me, as if the instruments were all sounding. (Only they make no mistakes, as sometimes happens at rehearsals!) Here is where I do my main work—at this table. When I am through I know my score thoroughly. To show you how much this is true, I will tell you that once in London I conducted "Coq d'Or" without a rehearsal—it was the first time I had performed it."

Monteux sketched for me his career, especially from the time he organized his own orchestra in Paris, after which he became famous. The young conductor, as he was then, wanted Debussy to give him some of his orchestral scores to perform, but Debussy was very hesitant. But with the spread of the fame of Monteux's orchestra, Debussy finally came to him and said: "I want you to perform these numbers."

What is the conductor going to do now for American music? What is he going to do to bring the symphonic works nearer to the people? We look to him to institute some marked changes. Perhaps Monteux will give rein to his liking for popular concerts and give some this season in New York City.

EVENING
om SUN
ddress New York City ate AUG 25

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEAD HERE

P. Montoux, French Musician, Arrives on Board Liner Lorraine.

P. Monteux of Paris, one of the most eminent of French musicians, who has been selected as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived to-day on the French line steamship Lorraine. Mr. Monteux went on to Boston as soon as he got ashore to take up the work of rehearsals for the symphony concert season.

MANY NEW WORKS FOR SYMPHONY

Monteux Brings Compositions New to Musical World for First Performance—Will Play Wagner

BY OLIN DOWNES

NEW YORK, Aug. 25.—The uncommonly frank and direct regard of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at least two seasons to come, was tinged with a fine Gallic irony when the writer told him of the departing pronouncement of Dr. Karl Muck, who left America a few days ago, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could never again be the band that Muck had conducted, since the discharge of 29 German players.

NOT THE SAME, BUT BETTER

Mr. Monteux, who is a trifle fleshier than when last seen in Boston and looking very fit indeed after his summer vacation, raised his eyebrows a little and said in a thoughtful manner; "No! no! I don't suppose it can be the same. But"—as though pondering over some Euclidean mystery—"I don't speak of the conductor, but of the orchestra itself—may it not be, this band, even—a little better?"

Mr. Monteux debarked in the morning from an incoming steamer and stood smiling happily back of a fence which separated him from William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra. The two men did not kiss, in the proverbial French style, when they met, but the cordiality of the meeting was unmistakable. Mr. Monteux was accompanied by Mrs. Monteux and his six-year-old daughter, who has already commenced to study music.

Mr. Monteux will come to Boston Wednesday and will set immediately to work arranging his programmes for the winter and studying in detail an extremely interesting assortment of new scores which he has brought with him from Paris.

He spent six weeks in Paris and six more weeks at the seashore with his family. He gradually collected scores and in a number of instances had friendly conferences with their composers, some of them old friends of the conductor. Mr. Monteux's talk about these men was a word picture of a number of composers of today who may be encountered in the course of a visit to Paris, France.

Saint-Saens a Wagner Hater

Camille Saint-Saens, that amazing compound of composer, essayist, scientist, globe-trotter, metaphysician and cordial hater of Germany, in his youth a Wagnerite and now a passionate declaimer—you might think Saint-Saens in his twenties to hear the vigor of his arraignment — confronted Mr. Monteux with eagle nose and flashing eyes, and inveighed against coming productions of Wagner at the Paris Opera.

"They need new scenery there," shouted Saint-Saens, "but they won't get it when they produce Wagner."

Will Open With Wagner

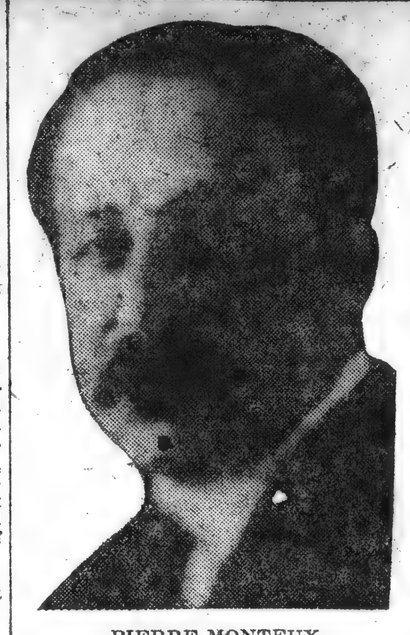
"But I do not agree with that," said Mr. Monteux. "I plan to have Wagner on my first programme. And at Paris they will like it, too. There will be some trouble in the streets, probably, when they give Wagner, but"—he laughed—"I have known of trouble in the streets of Paris over smaller things than that. It will do the Opera no harm, and they will make money giving Wagner."

Mr. Monteux said to Saint-Saens, who, since he toured as pianist-composer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1906-07, has particularly vivid recollections of this organization:

Suggests Own Works

"I want to play some of your music in Boston, but they are very familiar with your scores, of which my friend and colleague, M. Rabaud, has just given many brilliant performances."

Saint-Saens has not the reputation of a wit for nothing. His eye twinkled as he said—this composer of infinite productiveness and facility—"O, but they can't have heard all of them!" And that week Monteux received from Saint-Saens three letters, closely written, in a fine hand, of four pages each, of compositions which Saint-Saens mentioned as available for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra!



PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived from France yesterday.

D'Indy's Third Symphony

Mr. Monteux talked with D'Indy and will give in Boston the first performance in America of that distinguished composer's third symphony, a long work, with a furiously triumphant finale, inspired by the war. In this there will be poetic justice. In his last season in Boston Dr. Muck refused to perform any work by the Frenchman, D'Indy, because of the very frank utterances that D'Indy was making at the time, in Paris, regarding Germany's part in the war. The genius of D'Indy is perhaps more profoundly spiritual than the finished and cosmopolitan art of Saint-Saens, a great artist, but also a man of the world. And as with the music of D'Indy, the composer, who, though younger than Saint-Saens, is no longer young, so with the bearing of D'Indy, the man: He lives today more an inner than an outer life. He seems to be meditating profoundly on things not of this world.

First Hearing of Hure Symphony

A first production in the world of a symphonic importance will be the premiere, at a Boston Symphony concert, of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure, who alas, with this vast work completed, is succumbing gradually to a lung disease.

Two other first productions of great interest will be the first performances in America of an early and until now practically unknown "Fantasie for piano and orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and per contra, one of Debussy's last important compositions. This will be the score of "Jeux" ("Play") which Debussy wrote for performance as a ballet, for the Russian dancer, Nijinsky.

Played It in 1913

"I particularly want to do this," said Mr. Monteux, "because I felt when I conducted the first performances of 'Jeux' in Paris and in London in 1913, that Nijinsky" (who appeared as a tennis player, with his racket on the stage) "adopted rather silly and unrelated action to some really charming music. Nijinsky is the great male dancer of the world. But the stage genius of the Russian ballet was not Nijinsky, but Fokine, who never came to America, and of whom Nijinsky was jealous.

Other modern works to be produced will be compositions by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducasse, Albert Roussel. But Mr. Monteux is also a worshipper of the classics.

Give Ninth With Chorus

There will be played at least two symphonies of Beethoven—the fourth, and the ninth, with chorus—symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms Mendelssohn, whom Mr. Monteux thinks it is the custom today to a little underrate, and, as Mr. Monteux hopes, for the last concert of the season, a production of Cesar Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus.

Mr. Monteux will also give attention to music by Slavic composers, among them Dvorak, Tschaikowsky, Strawinsky, the latter to be represented, probably, by a suite from the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Bird of Fire."

It will be observed that the foregoing list of composers has practically a prewar percentage of German names, with the exception of one or two modern German composers, such as Richard Strauss. When I asked Mr. Monteux if he would play Strauss, his answer was particularly interesting, in view of his refusal, during war time, to conduct a performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" for the Russian ballet. "I would like to play him very much," he said. "I think that it is time to think of music and war as two different things. During the conflict it seemed to me wrong to conduct a performance of a work which would send a substantial royalty to a composer whose nation had outraged justice, while my own countrymen and comrades were dying in the trenches. But Strauss' music was not composed by the war, and the war is over. On the other hand, it would be as inhuman as it would be academic to expect the nations of the earth to forget in a day the frightful orgy of injury and suffering through which they have passed.

"Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but also only fair, to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programmes. Not to have him on one's programme is a loss to a conductor, because even Strauss' poorer music is so brilliantly orchestrated that it is certain to make a big effect. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory: The state, following the cataclysm, of the nerves of the world."

TRANSCRIPT, TUES[DAY] find[s] ignificantly small and the final price so
DAY, AUGUST 26,

M. MONTEUX RETURNS

By contrast to the grievous uncertainties which hung about Symphony Hall one year ago at this time, it is a situation far more harmonious and assured which M. Pierre Monteaux will find there today as he returns to Boston to take up his duties as leader. Gratefulness may well be felt for this, and it may be felt without any forgetting that the very nature and number of the perplexities confronting the Symphony Orchestra one year ago were the measure of the credit due to M. Rabaud for his mastery of them and to the new board of trustees for making this mastery possible. The foundations of reconstruction laid then, when many a mainstay of the orchestra seemed to be slipping, would not have been good foundations at all had they not endured. It is their presence today, as a basis ready to the hand of M. Monteux for his fresh building, which testifies to the soundness of last year's achievement.

Contrary reports notwithstanding, the personnel established for the orchestra before the close of the season of 1918 remains without substantial change. The rumors of defections to Detroit and Philadelphia have been grossly exaggerated, probably for reasons best known to the musicians' union which helped engineer them. A few men go, but their number scarcely exceeds the percentage of change which has been found normal from season to season. This small group aside, there have been also some little shiftings among the strings. These are not of consequence, certainly not as against the many string-players who, with the excellent Fradkin still concert-master, all remain at their accustomed desks. In the brass choir the same first quartette of horns stands intact. M. Monteux, it has been truly announced, is bringing with him a new first cellist and a new first viola—the sole changes among section-leaders. Here is only further contribution—both of these players are French—to the homogeneity and essential unison gained for the orchestra last year despite the croaking of many ravens.

Given his material, there need be no questioning the result which the artistry and the musicianly craftsmanship of M. Monteux will work out of it. Boston has had one experience of him, be it remembered, and critics here know him for the extraordinarily competent leader of rehearsals, drillmaster at once of infinite exactitudes and of infinite subtleties, which he then proved himself. They know the vigor and warmth and the novel interest of the finished product as he brought it to the opening concert of the season of 1918 after weeks of such painstaking preparation as he delights in. With this memory happy in prospection, and with taste keen for the feast of good things in prospect, Boston welcomes M. Monteux at the moment of his return and says sincerely "Thank you for coming."

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

SEP 11 1919 E.

Called by Chas. U. Isaacs

Boston Symphony's Conductor Prefers the People's Concerts

This interview was in the earlier days of Pierre Monteux's sojourn in America. He had but recently been appointed to the conductor's stand at the Metropolitan Opera House. He had finished his work at the Civic concerts and had only recently put away his memories of the Russian Ballet tour. Now that he holds the honor of conducting America's premier orchestra, the Boston Symphony, I doubt that his sentiments have changed. Rather do I think that it is partly because of his early ideas that he has won so hearty a recognition from critics and public.

I put away my notes after that interview and I meant to write soon of what he said. Other subjects, more timely, crowded in, and the Monteux interview remained to be recorded. It is well, however, for now that Pierre Monteux is the cynosure of all eyes, the matter will be all the more significant.

I can remember the meeting as clearly as if I just came from it.

There he was standing in his sunny room. On a table was a large score which he was studying. He was smiling, a clean-shaven face with a moustache of silken texture, and all rosy and polished a Parisian his finger tips.

We talked a while and then Monteux mentioned what is a favorite topic with him.

"What kind of music should we give the people? One kind, just one kind. That is the best, the very best! Not always do the people know what is the best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to win out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?

"Ah, my friend, I would rather conduct for a popular concert than a formal one. I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience that doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners."

Monteux's face wrinkled in a smile as he recalled a story which this brought to his mind.

"One time in Paris I decided to bring out the music of Stravinsky. It was new to the people and they were very enthusiastic—against the music. They were crying and throwing things. The second performance it was the same. The third it was the same, only then we had given up the use of the scenery. Stravinsky was spied in the audience and they went for him. They ran at him, and Stravinsky ran away. It happened to be election day, and what do you think? A few blocks away the crowds thought the fleeing composer was elected—and they greeted him with "Vive la Deputy"!

"Talk about noise. The only other music where there was ever so much racket was at a rehearsal in my school. I was rather mischievous, I would have you understand. I had tied a string to the bass drum, and in the very middle of a sad part in the clarionets, I pulled the string. Down went the drum clattering."

These stories I mention because it is necessary that you understand the human side of the musician. Many have declared Monteux cold, unsentimental. But this is not so. He told me that once on tour with the Russian Ballet it was announced that the Kaiser would attend. Instantly Monteux handed over his baton to his assistant.

Despite Monteux's interest in a popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman there are two kinds of conductors, gallery and orchestra. The "gallery" conductor is concerned with making catchy effects. The orchestra conductor is too much occupied with the music to try for superficialities.

"It is the duty of a conductor," said Monteux, "to win the love of his men. Once he has that, he can almost be a bad conductor, for they will respond with sincerity. You can tell when a conductor is loved by his men. It is in the heart of the music they play. I have been a member of an orchestra, and I know what the men are and want. I have been against conductors we did not like.

As a matter of fact, I did my first conducting at twelve years of age. I have played violin and viola. I don't play the piano. A pianist-conductor can't know orchestral work. When I stand here at home before my score I hear everything playing to me, as if the instruments were all sounding. (Only they make no mistakes, as sometimes happens at rehearsals!) Here is where I do my main work—at this table. When I am through I know my score thoroughly. To show you how much this is true, I will tell you that once in London I conducted "Coq d'Or" without a rehearsal—it was the first time I had performed it."

Monteux sketched for me his career, especially from the time he organized his own orchestra in Paris, after which he became famous. The young conductor, as he was then, wanted Debussy to give him some of his orchestral scores to perform, but Debussy was very hesitant. But with the spread of the fame of Monteux's orchestra, Debussy finally came to him and said: "I want you to perform these numbers."

What is the conductor going to do now for American music? What is he going to do to bring the symphonic works nearer to the people? We look to him to institute some marked changes. Perhaps Monteux will give rein to his liking for popular concerts and give some this season in New York City.

EVENING
om SUN

ddress New York City

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEAD HERE

P. Montoux, French Musician, Arrives on Board Liner Lorraine.

P. Monteux of Paris, one of the most eminent of French musicians, who has been selected as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived to-day on the French line steamship Lorraine. Mr. Monteux went on to Boston as soon as he got ashore to take up the work of rehearsals for the symphony concert season.

14 FAMOUS SOLOISTS ENGAGED FOR COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

By OLIN DOWNES

It is evident from subscriptions already received at Symphony Hall that the coming season of the Boston Symphony will be the most successful, for a number of years, in its history. Subscriptions taken now exceed the total of the subscriptions of last winter, which, in turn, exceeded those of the winter previous. The orchestra is regaining rapidly the patronage and whole-hearted support of the public which, for various reasons, were somewhat curtailed during the years of the war.

For the season of 1919-20 14 soloists have been engaged. In this direction also there is advance, inasmuch as this list contains no names of artists who are in any way in an experimental or merely formative stage of their career. The newcomers to the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming winter are artists of whom it may confidently be expected in advance that their appearances as soloists will give additional interest and distinction to the concerts.

Povla Frijsch, the Danish soprano, will be one of these. She is without doubt one of the most individual and significant song interpreters of the day. Leo Ornstein, the young American composer-pianist, will appear. Mr. Ornstein's compositions are considered by many of us eccentric, to say the least, but he is a well-schooled virtuoso who can offer either a futuristic composition of his own or interpret a classic or modern masterpiece in a brilliant and authoritative way. And he is a composer who, whatever one may think or say of his compositions, has forced himself on the public and the critics of America and Europe. What a transcription for piano and orchestra of Mr. Ornstein's "Wild Men's Dance" would sound like the pen hesitates even to imagine. But he is a figure to be noticed in the musical world.

Two other soloists of the younger generation will be Albert Spalding, the violinist, back from his service at the front, and Frederick Fradkin, also violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master and an admirable musician, and Fritz Kreisler, whose return to the stage will be welcomed with great enthusiasm, will complete the list of fiddlers.

The pianist will be Sergei Rachmanioff, the Russian composer-pianist whose tour of America was a sensation of last season; Alfred Cortot, the French virtuoso, who, with Mr. Rabaud, gave a memorable performance of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air" last winter, and Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss pianist, who has not appeared for some seasons with the Boston Symphony.

For singers there will be, in addition to Mme. Frijsch, Emmy Destinn, imprisoned in Bohemia during the war, and now enjoying exceptional success in opera in London; Margaret Matzenauer, greater today than ever before in his career; Louis Homer, John McCormack.

These are all soloists, some of them interesting new figures, all of them representative of the rank and the traditions of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It has been said by some that this orchestra is national rather than local in its policies and interests, that local musicians and young soloists comparatively seldom find an opportunity to appear before its audiences. This is quite true, and quite right. Other organizations can and should give as much opportunity as possible to young players, particularly Americans. But it is the distinction of the Boston Symphony, as it is of America herself in her art standards and ideas, that its audiences are not concerned with indulgences to local or national musical interests. The Boston Symphony orchestra stands for the highest achievements, regardless of nationality or community, in music. It is this standard and this ideal which has given it its rank and its significance, not merely in the city, or the country, but in the world. Neither its management nor its audiences would be content with less, and so long as these traditions are maintained, so long will Boston be the home of one of the greatest musical institutions in existence.

Upper—Emmy Destinn, soprano.
Lower—Leo Ornstein, pianist.

Upper—Joseph Bonnet.
Lower—Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist.

Margaret Matzenauer, the prima donna contralto, and her daughter Adrienne.

Upper—Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano. (C) Und. & Und.
Lower—Albert Spalding, violinist.

Upper—Alfred Cortot, pianist. (C) Rembrant.
Centre—Rudolph Ganz, pianist.
Lower—Fritz Kreisler, violinist.

TRIBUNE
New York City
AUG 26 19

...ssor of Muck Arrives From France

Monteux, on Reaching Here, Says He Will Include German Music in Programme

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from France yesterday on the Lorraine and left for Boston at midnight. He was accompanied by Mme. Monteux and their two children. W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, met the conductor at the dock.

M. Monteux, who conducted French opera at the Metropolitan last year, will appear for the second time as conductor of the famous Boston organization. The post was offered him last season, immediately following the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, but his contract with the Metropolitan prevented him from accepting the engagement. At the beginning of the season, however, pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, who had been engaged to succeed the German musician, M. Monteux directed several concerts by the orchestra, both in Boston and on tour.

M. Monteux announced yesterday his intention to include German music in his programme.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," he said, "and my aim will be to give the American people the music their taste demands."

14 FAMOUS SOLOISTS ENGAGED FOR COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

By OLIN DOWNES

It is evident from subscriptions already received at Symphony Hall that the coming season of the Boston Symphony will be the most successful, for a number of years, in its history. Subscriptions taken now exceed the total of the subscriptions of last winter, which, in turn, exceeded those of the winter previous. The orchestra is regaining rapidly the patronage and whole-hearted support of the public which, for various reasons, were somewhat curtailed during the years of the war.

For the season of 1919-20 14 soloists have been engaged. In this direction also there is advance, inasmuch as this list contains no names of artists who are in any way in an experimental or merely formative stage of their career. The newcomers to the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming winter are artists of whom it may confidently be expected in advance that their appearances as soloists will give additional interest and distinction to the concerts.

Povla Frijsch, the Danish soprano, will be one of these. She is without doubt one of the most individual and significant song interpreters of the day. Leo Ornstein, the young American composer-pianist, will appear. Mr. Ornstein's compositions are considered by many of us eccentric, to say the least, but he is a well-schooled virtuoso who can offer either a futuristic composition of his own or interpret a classic or modern masterpiece in a brilliant and authoritative way. And he is a composer who, whatever one may think or say of his compositions, has forced himself on the public and the critics of America and Europe. What a transcription for piano and orchestra of Mr. Ornstein's "Wild Men's Dance" would sound like the pen hesitates even to imagine. But he is a figure to be noticed in the musical world.

Two other soloists of the younger generation will be Albert Spalding, the violinist, back from his service at the front, and Frederick Fradkin, also violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master and an admirable musician, and Fritz Kreisler, whose return to the stage will be welcomed with great enthusiasm, will complete the list of fiddlers.

The pianist will be Sergei Rachmanioff, the Russian composer-pianist whose tour of America was a sensation of last season; Alfred Cortot, the French virtuoso, who, with Mr. Rabaud, gave a memorable performance of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air" last winter, and Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss pianist, who has not appeared for some seasons with the Boston Symphony.

For singers there will be, in addition to Mme. Frijsch, Emmy Destinn, imprisoned in Bohemia during the war, and now enjoying exceptional success in opera in London; Margaret Matzenauer, greater today than ever before in his career; Louis Homer, John McCormack.

These are all soloists, some of them interesting new figures, all of them representative of the rank and the traditions of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It has been said by some that this orchestra is national rather than local in its policies and interests, that local musicians and young soloists comparatively seldom find an opportunity to appear before its audiences. This is quite true, and quite right. Other organizations can and should give as much opportunity as possible to young players, particularly Americans. But it is the distinction of the Boston Symphony, as it is of America herself in her art standards and ideas, that its audiences are not concerned with indulgences to local or national musical interests. The Boston Symphony orchestra stands for the highest achievements, regardless of nationality or community, in music. It is this standard and this ideal which has given it its rank and its significance, not merely in the city, or the country, but in the world. Neither its management nor its audiences would be content with less, and so long as these traditions are maintained, so long will Boston be the home of one of the greatest musical institutions in existence.

Upper—Emmy Destinn, soprano.
Lower—Leo Ornstein, pianist.

Upper—Joseph Bonnet.
Lower—Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist.

Margaret Matzenauer, the prima donna contralto, and her daughter Adrienne.

Upper—Alfred Cortot, pianist. (C) Rembrant.
Centre—Rudolph Ganz, pianist.
Lower—Fritz Kreisler, violinist.

Upper—Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano. (C) Und. & Und.
Lower—Albert Spalding, violinist.

Successor of Muck Arrives From France

Monteux, on Reaching Here, Says He Will Include German Music in Programme

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from France yesterday on the Lorraine and left for Boston at midnight. He was accompanied by Mme. Monteux and their two children. W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, met the conductor at the dock.

M. Monteux, who conducted French opera at the Metropolitan last year, will appear for the second time as conductor of the famous Boston organization. The post was offered him last season, immediately following the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, but his contract with the Metropolitan prevented him from accepting the engagement. At the beginning of the season, however, pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, who had been engaged to succeed the German musician, M. Monteux directed several concerts by the orchestra, both in Boston and on tour.

M. Monteux announced yesterday his intention to include German music in his programme.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," he said, "and my aim will be to give the American people the music their taste demands."

TRIBUNE
New York City

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT PLANS FOR THE COMING SEASON

Prospects Are Bright for Unusually Brilliant Year

FAMOUS NAMES IN LIST OF SOLOISTS

The coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra promises to be an unusually brilliant one.

The orchestra, whose performance under Mr. Rabaud gloriously maintained the standard that has given this organization international reputation, will be strengthened, if this is possible, by the addition of several players, first violoncello and first viola among them, from Paris and elsewhere, men of the very first rank. There is no need of dwelling upon the supreme merits of this orchestra, which has for years been the pride, not only of Boston, but of musical America.

LEO ORNSTEIN
Pianist

Mr. Monteux was not a stranger when he conducted the first concerts of the orchestra last season. He had shown his authority, taste and imagination as a conductor of the visiting Metropolitan Opera House Company. As conductor of the Symphony orchestra he had the severe task of reshaping it after the departure of Dr. Muck. How successful he was in this is known to all. Mr. Rabaud found a well-disciplined, plastic instrument on which he could play at will.

He was the first, and not merely from courtesy, to recognize and proclaim the fact; and when, much to the regret of the trustees and the audience, he felt obliged to refuse the offer of a second term early last spring, he most strongly advised the selection of Mr. Monteux as his successor.

Mr. Monteux as a disciplinarian reminds one of Mr. Gericke in certain ways, especially in his insistence on tonal beauty and sense of proportion; add to these desirable, necessary qualities, warmth, dash, poetic vision. A man of catholic taste, not a sworn member of any particular musical chapel, he will surely arrange varied programs, irrespective of the nationality of the composer, taking care, however, that the compositions will be worthy of the orchestra's and the audience's attention. The public has already learned through Mr. Rabaud's masterly interpretation of works by Bach, Handel,

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor

ALFRED CORTOT
Pianist

Beethoven, Mozart, that a commanding and sympathetic conductor of the classics need not neseccarily be a German. Nor need one fear that there will be any attempt this season to Germanize the taste of the Boston public, to persuade the audience that music was invented by Germans, is cultivated only by Germans, and can be performed only by German musicians and singers.

The prospects for the season of the Boston Symphony concerts are now taking definite shape. Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor, has already returned from France and is in Boston preparing for a busy winter of 48 concerts in Boston and 54 in other cities. The first concerts will take place Oct. 10 and 11 in Boston. With tomorrow (Sept. 1) as the last date for the renewal of the subscription seats, a crowded attendance may now be predicted with assurance. It is more than probable that no single seats will be left for sale for Friday afternoons, and for Saturday evenings from week to week there will be very few, as the balconies are nearly sold out already.

In the early years of the orchestra, a symphony concert without a soloist was unheard of. Gradually, the concerts became more distinctly and purely orchestral, until a minimum number of soloists in a season was reached. Still, the number was varied. For the season of 1919-20 an average of 13 has been engaged. There will be four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, besides Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack of the orchestra; four singers, Margaret Matzeneuer, Emmy Destinn, Povla Frijsh and John McCormack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

Soloists Released by the Peace

Three musicians, each one a favorite Boston Symphony soloist of the past, have been recently prevented from musical activity in this country by the war. Their return is the matter of the keener interest. Fritz Kreisler, about to emerge from retirement, is eagerly awaited. Mme. Emmy Destinn, formerly prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been bottled up in her native Bohemia and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the west, where she has her more devoted public and her stronger affiliations. When the channel of travel opened she immediately went to London, where she was received with open arms, first as a wonderful soprano, secondly as a veritable Czecho-Slovak. She enjoyed an unprecedented success in the leading role at the Covent Garden opera.

Also claimed by the war was the young American violinist, Albert Spalding. His musical career had reached a fine stage of brilliance when the war

MARGARET MATZENAUER
Contralto

Pierre Monteux, Newly Engaged Conductor, Here from France

48 CONCERTS HERE, 54 ELSEWHERE

came. He immediately enlisted as a private in the United States army, forfeiting many and lucrative engagements for the season of 1917-18. In France he was given the commission of lieutenant, and assigned to the aviation corps in Italy, where he did valiant service. He subsequently was enthusiastically applauded in Rome for his playing.

Soloists Heard Last Year

Three of the soloists who played at these concerts last year were so favorably received that they have been re-engaged—Sergei Rachmaninoff and Alfred Cortot, foremost pianists of Russia and France, respectively, and Joseph Bonnet, the superlatively praised organist of the Church of St. Eustache, Paris. Mr. Rachmaninoff, famous as a composer of orchestral and piano music, and songs wherever music is heard, landed unexpectedly in New York last winter, virtually an exile from the land of the Bolsheviki. He took musical America by surprise with his phenomenal powers as a concert pianist. A remarkable master of the orchestra and piano both, he made his strongest impression by playing his own concertos in orchestral concerts.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF
Pianist

Alfred Cortot came likewise little known from the country where, not only as a pianist, but as a conductor of opera and concert and as an organizer of choral festivals, his eminence was undisputed. In the United States he won recognition and acclaim quickly enough.

The name of Joseph Bonnet has become a matter almost of reverence among the organists of our various cities. His performance at a Symphony concert was a leading feature of last season.

A singer like Mme. Matzenauer and

POVLA FRIJSH
Soprano

Comedy Company will give "Dan Dooley's Double." There will also be photo plays. Sunday night concert.

the Boston Symphony Orchestra are two institutions which were almost bound to come together sooner or later. She is a singer of marked dramatic intensity, and the range of her superbly sonorous voice is so wide that she has sung both principal soprano and contralto parts with ease in the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mme. Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano, will be surely welcomed at the Symphony concerts by all who have come to admire highly at recitals her rare dramatic and interpretive power.

Among the younger pianists of the day, Leo Ornstein has also a large and growing public of his own. Particular interest naturally attaches to his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although he has long disturbed the conservatives by his topsy-turvy readings and his exceedingly "different" original compositions, nevertheless he has persistently won and

EMMY DESTINN
Soprano

ALBERT SPALDING
Violinist

MONITOR, BOSTON,
SEPTEMBER 6, 1919

Boston Symphony Plans

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — With Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and the soloists engaged, the character of the season of Symphony concerts to come may already be outlined, although the first concerts will not take place until Oct. 10 and 11. Forty-eight concerts are listed for Boston as usual, and for other cities at least 54, including eight in Cambridge, five in Providence, 10 in New York, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore; also single concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Toronto, Montreal, Worcester, Northampton, Springfield, and other New England cities.

In addition to hints of new works by Saint-Saëns and Rabaud which the new conductor revealed to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor, a short while ago, he has made several more definite announcements. The new symphony which d'Indy has just completed will certainly have its first American presentation under Mr. Monteux's baton—also a new symphony by Jean Huré. He will put Wagner on his first program, and consult American public opinion later on the subject of Strauss. He hopes to give two choral works, if practical obstacles may be overcome—Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's ninth symphony. Debussy's "Play," and Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" or his "Bird of Fire" he expects to give in form divorced from the ballet for which they were written. He mentioned particularly among the older symphonic composers, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn, and among other composers, Liszt, Dvorák, and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists engaged for the season in Boston number 14. There will be five singers: Emmy Destinn who has been in her native Bohemia during the war and only recently has been able to cross the lines and sing at the Covent Garden Opera in London; Margaret Matzenauer, the opulent-voiced contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Louise Homer of the same company; Povla Frijsh, the dramatic Danish soprano, and John McCormack. The violinists number three; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and Fredric Fradkin, the concert master of the orchestra. The pianists will number four, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz, and Leo Ornstein. There is to be also the Parisian organist, Joseph Bonnet, who has come to be considered as the greatest of his kind, and the 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, who is coming from France to lead the 'cello section in the orchestra.

FRITZ KREISLER
Violinist

Sylvain Noack, who has played at the first desk of the Boston orchestra's first violin section since 1908, appearing each year as one of the soloists with ever-growing favorable impression, has resigned from the orchestra to become concert master of the new Philharmonic Orchestra in Los Angeles, which Walter Henry Rothwell will conduct.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT PLANS FOR THE COMING SEASON

Prospects Are Bright for Unusually Brilliant Year

FAMOUS NAMES IN LIST OF SOLOISTS

The coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra promises to be an unusually brilliant one.

The orchestra, whose performance under Mr. Rabaud gloriously maintained the standard that has given this organization international reputation, will be strengthened, if this is possible, by the addition of several players, first violoncello and first viola among them, from Paris and elsewhere, men of the very first rank. There is no need of dwelling upon the supreme merits of this orchestra, which has for years been the pride, not only of Boston, but of musical America.

LEO ORNSTEIN
Pianist

Mr. Monteux was not a stranger when he conducted the first concerts of the orchestra last season. He had shown his authority, taste and imagination as a conductor of the visiting Metropolitan Opera House Company. As conductor of the Symphony orchestra he had the severe task of reshaping it after the departure of Dr. Muck. How successful he was in this is known to all. Mr. Rabaud found a well-disciplined, plastic instrument on which he could play at will.

He was the first, and not merely from courtesy, to recognize and proclaim the fact; and when, much to the regret of the trustees and the audience, he felt obliged to refuse the offer of a second term early last spring, he most strongly advised the selection of Mr. Monteux as his successor.

Mr. Monteux as a disciplinarian reminds one of Mr. Gericke in certain ways, especially in his insistence on tonal beauty and sense of proportion; add to these desirable, necessary qualities, warmth, dash, poetic vision. A man of catholic taste, not a sworn member of any particular musical chapel, he will surely arrange varied programs, irrespective of the nationality of the composer, taking care, however, that the compositions will be worthy of the orchestra's and the audience's attention. The public has already learned through Mr. Rabaud's masterly interpretation of works by Bach, Handel,

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor

ALFRED CORTOT
Pianist

Beethoven, Mozart, that a commanding and sympathetic conductor of the classics need not neseccarily be a German. Nor need one fear that there will be any attempt this season to Germanize the taste of the Boston public, to persuade the audience that music was invented by Germans, is cultivated only by Germans, and can be performed only by German musicians and singers.

The prospects for the season of the Boston Symphony concerts are now taking definite shape. Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor, has already returned from France and is in Boston preparing for a busy winter of 48 concerts in Boston and 54 in other cities. The first concerts will take place Oct. 10 and 11 in Boston. With tomorrow (Sept. 1) as the last date for the renewal of the subscription seats, a crowded attendance may now be predicted with assurance. It is more than probable that no single seats will be left for sale for Friday afternoons, and for Saturday evenings from week to week there will be very few, as the balconies are nearly sold out already.

In the early years of the orchestra, a symphony concert without a soloist was unheard of. Gradually, the concerts became more distinctly and purely orchestral, until a minimum number of soloists in a season was reached. Still, the number was varied. For the season of 1919-20 an average of 13 has been engaged. There will be four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, besides Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack of the orchestra; four singers, Margaret Matzeneuer, Emmy Destinn, Povla Frijsh and John McCormack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

Soloists Released by the Peace

Three musicians, each one a favorite Boston Symphony soloist of the past, have been recently prevented from musical activity in this country by the war. Their return is the matter of the keener interest. Fritz Kreisler, about to emerge from retirement, is eagerly awaited. Mme. Emmy Destinn, formerly prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been bottled up in her native Bohemia and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the west, where she has her more devoted public and her stronger affiliations. When the channel of travel opened she immediately went to London, where she was received with open arms, first as a wonderful soprano, secondly as a veritable Czecho-Slovak. She enjoyed an unprecedented success in the leading role at the Covent Garden opera.

Also claimed by the war was the young American violinist, Albert Spalding. His musical career had reached a fine stage of brilliance when the war

MARGARET MATZENAUER
Contralto

Pierre Monteux, Newly Engaged Conductor, Here from France

48 CONCERTS HERE, 54 ELSEWHERE

came. He immediately enlisted as a private in the United States army, forfeiting many and lucrative engagements for the season of 1917-18. In France he was given the commission of lieutenant, and assigned to the aviation corps in Italy, where he did valiant service. He subsequently was enthusiastically applauded in Rome for his playing.

Soloists Heard Last Year

Three of the soloists who played at these concerts last year were so favorably received that they have been re-engaged—Sergei Rachmaninoff and Alfred Cortot, foremost pianists of Russia and France, respectively, and Joseph Bonnet, the superlatively praised organist of the Church of St. Eustache, Paris. Mr. Rachmaninoff, famous as a composer of orchestral and piano music, and songs wherever music is heard, landed unexpectedly in New York last winter, virtually an exile from the land of the Bolsheviki. He took musical America by surprise with his phenomenal powers as a concert pianist. A remarkable master of the orchestra and piano both, he made his strongest impression by playing his own concertos in orchestral concerts.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF
Pianist

Alfred Cortot came likewise little known from the country where, not only as a pianist, but as a conductor of opera and concert and as an organizer of choral festivals, his eminence was undisputed. In the United States he won recognition and acclaim quickly enough.

The name of Joseph Bonnet has become a matter almost of reverence among the organists of our various cities. His performance at a Symphony concert was a leading feature of last season.

A singer like Mme. Matzenauer and

POVLA FRIJSH
Soprano

Comedy Company will give "Dan Dooley's Double." There will also be photo plays. Sunday night concert.

the Boston Symphony Orchestra are two institutions which were almost bound to come together sooner or later. She is a singer of marked dramatic intensity, and the range of her superbly sonorous voice is so wide that she has sung both principal soprano and contralto parts with ease in the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mme. Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano, will be surely welcomed at the Symphony concerts by all who have come to admire highly at recitals her rare dramatic and interpretive power.

Among the younger pianists of the day, Leo Ornstein has also a large and growing public of his own. Particular interest naturally attaches to his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although he has long disturbed the conservatives by his topsy-turvy readings and his exceedingly "different" original compositions, nevertheless he has persistently won and

EMMY DESTINN
Soprano

ALBERT SPALDING
Violinist

MONITOR, BOSTON, [illegible] music

SEPTEMBER 6, 1919

Boston Symphony Plans

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — With Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and the soloists engaged, the character of the season of Symphony concerts to come may already be outlined, although the first concerts will not take place until Oct. 10 and 11. Forty-eight concerts are listed for Boston as usual, and for other cities at least 54, including eight in Cambridge, five in Providence, 10 in New York, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore; also single concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Toronto, Montreal, Worcester, Northampton, Springfield, and other New England cities.

In addition to hints of new works by Saint-Saëns and Rabaud which the new conductor revealed to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor, a short while ago, he has made several more definite announcements. The new symphony which d'Indy has just completed will certainly have its first American presentation under Mr. Monteux's baton—also a new symphony by Jean Huré. He will put Wagner on his first program, and consult American public opinion later on the subject of Strauss. He hopes to give two choral works, if practical obstacles may be overcome—Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's ninth symphony. Debussy's "Play," and Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" or his "Bird of Fire" he expects to give in form divorced from the ballet for which they were written. He mentioned particularly among the older symphonic composers, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn, and among other composers, Liszt, Dvorák, and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists engaged for the season in Boston number 14. There will be five singers: Emmy Destinn who has been in her native Bohemia during the war and only recently has been able to cross the lines and sing at the Covent Garden Opera in London; Margaret Matzenauer, the opulent-voiced contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Louise Homer of the same company; Povla Frijsh, the dramatic Danish soprano, and John McCormack. The violinists number three; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and Fredric Fradkin, the concert master of the orchestra. The pianists will number four, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz, and Leo Ornstein. There is to be also the Parisian organist, Joseph Bonnet, who has come to be considered as the greatest of his kind, and the 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, who is coming from France to lead the 'cello section in the orchestra.

FRITZ KREISLER
Violinist

Sylvain Noack, who has played at the first desk of the Boston orchestra's first violin section since 1908, appearing each year as one of the soloists with ever-growing favorable impression, has resigned from the orchestra to become concert master of the new Philharmonic Orchestra in Los Angeles, which Walter Henry Rothwell will conduct.

NEW LIGHTS AND OLD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN FALL FORECAST

Bright Prospects for the Impending Season—A Continuing Orchestra, an Expectant and Eager Public, "Assisting Artists" Well Arrayed, and Generally Favoring Circumstance—Above All, the Promise of Mr. Monteux as Conductor

FOR at least two seasons, the prospects of the Symphony Concerts have not been so auspicious as they are at the beginning of this autumn of 1919. Neither trustees nor faithful and familiar public, neither conductor nor managers are occupied, in this thirty-ninth year of the orchestra, with a reorganization of the musicians in its ranks. That necessary task, as conditions went twelve and fifteen months ago, was then accomplished at no small pains on the part of all concerned, in outcome that almost immediately spoke for itself and with ampler promise for the future. With scarcely a material change in personnel, the Symphony Orchestra of the season of 1919-1920 will be the Symphony Orchestra that the frequenters of the concerts knew and applauded at the end of the season of 1918-1919. It will be indeed the better, since in the work of another year it is sure to become both more homogeneous and more plastic; an instrument, so to say, more sensitive to itself and to the conductor playing upon it; a body in which individual abilities will shine the more brightly for the richness of the general setting. By common consent the reorganized orchestra does not lack such abilities; by the testimony of the common ear, it was fast renewing last spring the qualities by which of old it had run the gamut of tonal eloquence. In the new season it has only to go forward and in promising circumstance.

A year ago there was no conductor, established or temporary, for the Symphony Concerts. Not until November, indeed, came a diligent and conscientious locum tenens, doing the best he might at a post the exactions of which he little foresaw and before a public that he little understood—a conductor better versed in the ways of orchestral concerts in Paris than in the standards of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in its own city and in the cities that it regularly visits. Fortunately in a season he passed; and now at the beginning of a new year, a leader succeeds him, who was designated last spring, who has prepared himself accordingly, whose hand the orchestra already knows, whose abilities the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings have already applauded—a conductor to whom his American public is not new and strange—a cosmopolitan conductor of the great world of music rather than of one and another corner of it in Paris.

To put by the two or three men of genius in the art of conducting, to regret in passing one and another exceptional talent that was not available, the trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. When, last autumn, on leave from the Metropolitan Opera House, he led the reorganized orchestra in a few concerts at the beginning of the season, band and audience discovered his pains as a drill-master, his abilities as an interpreter, his sensibility to the distinctions of orchestral playing, his keen intelligence and his warm sympathy with whatever music he had in hand. Last autumn Mr. Monteux's first pair of concerts in Boston was notable; while his second was full to the brim of interesting pieces. At that time he carried the concerts through the first weeks of a beset season and returned to his post as an operatic conductor. Now for a full year, the orchestra will be his to develop, to sensitize, to polish according to the scope of his abilities, his ambition and the response of a warmly interested and keenly anticipatory public. Through twenty-four concerts he can devise and diversify his programmes, free at last from the salutary or the superfluous inhibitions of war-time.

Mr. Monteux is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name, he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easiest way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French operas for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background. As fortunately, he knows and appreciates the standards and the traditions of the Symphony Concerts and the expectations—the habit even—of the public frequenting them in Boston and New York. In his programmes they bid fair to regain their familiar catholicity, their familiar diversity of interest; as of old, composers will hand to the conductor of the Boston Orchestra important new pieces; so far as in him lies the quality of performance. The Monteux who bids fair to stir his hearers with the sensuous beauty of Stravinsky's ballets knows also the austerities of d'Indy. The Monteux who searched out last summer in Paris the few posthumous pieces of Debussy is mindful also of the over-neglected Mendelssohn of a vanished day.

As with the orchestra and the conductor, so with the audiences that from the middle of October to the beginning of May will weekly sit before them. These listeners also will be free from the pains and penalties of war-time. No longer need anyone put by the Symphony Concert lest money so spent should be diverted from warchests or pleasure so taken distract from austerer obligations. No longer need resentful ears turn away from the music of Wagner (which from the beginning Mr. Monteux intends to place plentifully in his programmes) nor hear with inner qualms the music even of Brahms. The acrimonies over Dr. Muck in his final days and over the subsequent reorganization of the orchestra are lessening, as sooner rather than later they were sure to do. Even the confirmed doubters have waited and seen how interesting the "new" Symphony Orchestra can be, how stimulating a new line of conductors may prove. After two years of more or less divided continuance, the Symphony Orchestra can return to its sufficient task of playing music for the sake of music and performance; while audiences may equally hear both for the satisfaction that they yield in themselves and not for the random sympathies they happen to evoke. Artistry and pleasure are again the word at the Symphony Concerts, alike on the stage and, by clear token, in the auditorium. For already, through nearly every city through which the orchestra ranges, and especially in its "home-town," the eagerness of the public, old and new, stands clear. Unless many a sign fails, there will be "atmosphere" again in Symphony Hall on the twenty-four Fridays and the like-numbered Saturdays.

In such auspicious circumstances, the Symphony Concerts of 1919-1920 will run a familiar course. From the middle of October to the beginning of May stretch the twenty-four pairs of concerts, broken by the usual intervals when the orchestra makes its monthly journeys southward or departs for a week—this season in December—into the Middle States. As of old, it will be heard regularly in two or three cities of New England and occasionally in many more; while in Boston on a Sunday afternoon, one at least of the annual concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund will be restored. Thus, a hundred concerts and a few more will make the work of the orchestra for the year—as much as it can do well, yet not too much to keep it in established place in all the region that it annually pleasures. As in recent years, it will, likewise, command at need the services of Mr. Townsend's Symphony Chorus. For Mr. Monteux is ambitious of occasional performances of music in which orchestra and chorus join voices. He is taking thought of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, heard only twice in Boston since Mr. Fiedler's time. He is as eager to end the season, next May, with a performance of Franck's oratorio of "The Beatitudes." Indeed, as some predict, then and there Mr. McCormack, the tenor, will be heard in a choral concert for the first time hereabouts—or anywhere else—in years. Of such, after all superfluous gainsaying, remains the prestige of the Symphony Concerts.

Worthy of that prestige and not too many nor too few are the "assisting artists" announced for the new season; while as last year, the management in the choice of them has avoided the rut into which it is easy to fall. Outside Mr. Fradkin and Mr. Noack who, rising from their places in the orchestra, are to play the violin concertos which are the reward of the "first desk," the "soloists" number twelve. Mr. McCormack aside, the singers are four women: Miss Destinn or Miss Destinnova, as she now elects to call herself in the Czech tongue, released from war-time durance in Bohemia and reported from London as renewing her fine powers; Mme. Matzenauer in the flower of large-voiced song at the Metropolitan Opera House; Mme. Homer, likewise in the full graces of vocal and interpretive maturity; and last, for signal newcomer, Mme. Frijsh, riper of voice than in an earlier day, rich in the virtues of musical insight and dramatizing imagination, and as always, vivid personality.

The pianist of large, deep and grave maturity, the august presence among the virtuosi now traversing American concert-halls, is Mr. Rakhmaninov, the inevitable; the pianist whose fineness and brightness of touch and tone stirred the ear last year "at these concerts," whose intelligence and imagination were not less luminous, returns in Mr. Cortot; the approved abilities of Mr. Ganz as virtuoso and musician give him just place in the Symphony Concerts; while youth, and richly deserving youth, has its opportunity in the first coming to them of Mr. Ornstein, not as debatable composer but as undebatable pianist of no small or untried powers. Again, too, returns the one organist who, in this day, has established himself in the symphony concerts of the United States, the applauded and anticipated Bonnet. The younger generation has righteous place again with Mr. Spalding as one of the two violinists, outside the orchestra, to grace the concerts—and grace plus gravity are the words for this his early prime. The other assisting violinist need hardly be named, since, for the impending season, every orchestra covets him and a manifold public everywhere awaits him. The inhibitions of the war-years are ended; Mr. Kreisler is restored to concert-hall. With him as with many another circumstance and condition for the new year, old times have come again at Symphony Concerts.

A Pianist Returns to Boston

M. Alfred Cortot to Appear With the Symphony Orchestra

-ETON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Brilliant Stars at Symphony Concerts

SOME OF THE STARS OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

IT is already possible to predict that no single seats will be left for sale for the Friday afternoon concerts from week to week, and for Saturday evenings there will be very few, as the balconies are already nearly sold out. The time for renewing subscriptions ends tomorrow. The first concerts come October 10 and 11.

On his arrival from France last week Pierre Lonteux, who resumes his place as conductor, gave some hints of his plans. He believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. On the question of Strauss, he will consult public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," pieces written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned specifically Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

Among the soloists listed to appear are six singers, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; and an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—AUGUST 31

Concerning the Coming Symphony Concerts

Now that Conductor Pierre Monteaux has returned from Europe definite announcements regarding the coming season of Symphony Concerts may be made. The soloists have been engaged, and the list is an impressive one. The advance sale of seats has been so large that it is probable there will be none left unsold for the Friday afternoon concerts and very few for the Saturday evenings.

Conductor Monteaux believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. As to Strauss, he will consult American public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are: New symphonies by d'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed; Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," modern pictorial scores written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentions specifically are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The following 14 soloists are listed to appear: Singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and from the orchestra itself, Frederic Fradkin and Jean Bedetti; pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

American Aug 30

Union AUG 22 1919
Springfield, Mass.

There was nothing in the news dispatches to indicate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on hand to play a farewell tune when former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, arrived on his return trip to his native Germany.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30

Symphony Will Play Music of Wagner

The music of Wagner will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of its first program under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. Conductor Monteaux, declaring that "it is time to consider music and war as two different things" has signified his intention of suiting symphony programs to the American taste.

Fourteen soloists will be heard in Boston during the symphony season beginning Oct. 10 and 11. Of these 14 artists Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Louise Homer and John McCormack are the vocalists; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack are the violinists; Sergei Rachmoninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein pianists, and Joseph Bonnet is organist.

The last date for renewal of subscription seats is next Monday. In all probability no single seats will be avaliable from week to week for Friday afternoons, it is stated. For Saturdays very few seats remain, the balconies being nearly sold out.

(Photo copyrighted by Underwood & Underwood)

Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano whose many past triumphs in Symphony Hall, will be duplicated during the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

EVENING POST
New York City
AUG 2 - 191

DEMAND

There were several reasons, one of them being that the offer came toward the end of August, when he had already made other engagements. He frankly admitted that the prospect of presiding over that orchestra did not quite appeal to him under the circumstances. He had heard that important changes in the personnel and the repertory had been made, for political reasons, and he has no patience with this association of art with politics.

"I think it is ridiculous," he said, "to claim that any political propaganda can be, or ever is, made through the medium of any form of art. You will see that Wagner will have his triumphant reëntry into the civilized world in all countries, and that very shortly. People are hungry for his music. And, you know, anything the public wants it generally gets in the end."

He had the best of reasons for saying the public is hungry for Wagner. He had just been conducting a concert in Milan devoted to excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," which evoked "prolonged and frantic applause," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which also was received with tumultuous approval. The demand for tickets was so great that the same programme was played three times.

Bori and Toscanini

LUCREZIA BORI is not, alas, coming to New York next season, but she is negotiating with Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the season of 1920-21. Why wait? No artist is so much needed as she at the Metropolitan, and according to all accounts she is better than ever. Her recent appearances at Monte Carlo in "La Bohème" and "Falstaff" were hugely successful, and she herself feels, as she informed Musical America's correspondent, Dr. O. P. Jacobs, that the operation on her throat, which seemed to have ended her career as a singer, was after all, a blessing. "All my life," she said, "I have been singing against or over a physical obstruction which with this operation has been entirely eliminated. I am frank to admit that for the first time in my life I am now singing under normal physical conditions." She will, besides singing in Italian cities next season, make her first appearance in Spanish cities, including her native town, Valencia.

With Toscanini, too, Dr. Jacobs was so fortunate as to secure an interview. The great conductor was noncommittal regarding his own plans. There were rumors that the directorship of the Scala had been offered him, and he admitted he might conduct there. He would be glad to return to America, but he regretted that box office receipts played so important a rôle in this wealthy country as against art for art's sake. Why did he refuse the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Post Aug 31

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

Preparing for Symphony Season

Mr. Monteux Already at Work in Boston—Worcester Music Festival, Caruso's Return and Other Promises to Gladden Music Lovers' Hearts.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester music

Mr. Sylvi Noack has resigned the position of second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to become concert master for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor.

We found Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution ,and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosiphically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understand me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities, that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere—every time. At the Metropolitan last winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,': 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You will get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 05 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not throughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Traveler Sept 6

NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

These are busy days at Symphony Hall, although the opening of the Symphony concert season is a month away. Subscriptions for the season are still pouring in, and Mr. Monteux is more than busy going over the orchestra's library and studying new scores for the new season's programes.

While not pinning himself down to definite promises, Mr. Monteux expects to give, along with the works of the old masters, Debussy's "Play" and orches- suites from either "Petrouchka" or e Bird of Fire" and ballets by Stra- sky. Wagner is to once more appear the programs. For choral works, he planning on Franck's "Beatitudes" Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He has in mind a new symphony by dy and one by Jean Hure.

Advertiser Sept 7

DEMAND FOR MPHONY CONCERTS
th the opening Boston Symphony rts still more than a month off, hony Hall has at this time of the a very quiet appearance—on the de. But not so within. Subion applications flood every mail h an extent that an augmented force is necessary. No less than y-nine packages of new scores, sed to "Pierre Monteux, Sym- Hall," have arrived.

Globe Sept. 7

g Symphony Concerts

e first Boston Symphony con- more than a month off, Sym- ll has at this time of the year uiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail. Upstairs, the great music library has been dusted, and Mr Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. No less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the Customs House last week.

Naturally Mr Monteux hesitates to reveal too much, for some works must be rejected, and musical publication in Europe is still somewhat a matter of hazard. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hur

Herald Sept. 7

NEW WORKS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications are coming by every mail to such an extent that an augmented office force is necessary. Upstairs the great music library has been dusted, and Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. Moreover, no less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the custom house last week.

Naturally, Mr. Monteux is considering many plans. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky, are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure. Mr. Monteux mentions among the masters of the past Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

American Sept. 6

From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SEP - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is feeling the after-war urge of the people for music. Season tickets were placed on sale on the first of June and all the low-priced seats for the Saturday concerts are already sold out—an unprecedented occurrence in orchestral management.

Post Sept. 7

E TON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Brilliant Stars at Symphony Concerts

IT is already possible to predict that no single seats will be left for sale for the Friday afternoon concerts from week to week, and for Saturday evenings there will be very few, as the baloonies are already nearly sold out. The time for renewing subscriptions ends tomorrow. The first concerts come October 10 and 11.

On his arrival from France last week Pierre Lonteux, who resumes his place as conductor, gave some hints of his plans. He believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. On the question of Strauss, he will consult public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," pieces written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned specifically Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

Among the soloists listed to appear are six singers, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; and an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

SOME OF THE STARS OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

ALFRED CORTOT — REMBRANDT STUDIO

EMMY DESTINN

PHOTO BY APEDA

LEO ORNSTEIN

MME. HOMER

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—AUGUST 31

Concerning the Coming Symphony Concerts

Now that Conductor Pierre Monteaux has returned from Europe definite announcements regarding the coming season of Symphony Concerts may be made. The soloists have been engaged, and the list is an impressive one. The advance sale of seats has been so large that it is probable there will be none left unsold for the Friday afternoon concerts and very few for the Saturday evenings.

Conductor Monteaux believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. As to Strauss, he will consult American public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are: New symphonies by d'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed; Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," modern pictorial scores written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentions specifically are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The following 14 soloists are listed to appear: Singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and from the orchestra itself, Frederic Fradkin and Jean Bedetti; pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30

Symphony Will Play Music of Wagner

The music of Wagner will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of its first program under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. Conductor Monteaux, declaring that "it is time to consider music and war as two different things" has signified his intention of suiting symphony programs to the American taste.

Fourteen soloists will be heard in Boston during the symphony season beginning Oct. 10 and 11. Of these 14 artists Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Louise Homer and John McCormack are the vocalists; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack are the violinists; Sergei Rachmoninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein pianists, and Joseph Bonnet is organist.

The last date for renewal of subscription seats is next Monday. In all probability no single seats will be avaliable from week to week for Friday afternoons, it is stated. For Saturdays very few seats remain, the balconies being nearly sold out.

(Photo copyrighted by Underwood & Underwood)

Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano whose many past triumphs in Symphony Hall, will be duplicated during the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

There were several reasons, one of them being that the offer came toward the end of August, when he had already made other engagements. He frankly admitted that the prospect of presiding over that orchestra did not quite appeal to him under the circumstances. He had heard that important changes in the personnel and the repertory had been made, for political reasons, and he has no patience with this association of art with politics.

"I think it is ridiculous," he said, "to claim that any political propaganda can be, or ever is, made through the medium of any form of art. You will see that Wagner will have his triumphant reëntry into the civilized world in all countries, and that very shortly. People are hungry for his music. And, you know, anything the public wants it generally gets in the end."

He had the best of reasons for saying the public is hungry for Wagner. He had just been conducting a concert in Milan devoted to excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," which evoked "prolonged and frantic applause," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which also was received with tumultuous approval. The demand for tickets was so great that the same programme was played three times.

EVENING POST
New York City
AUG 2 - 19

DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail. Upstairs, the great music library has been dusted, and Mr Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. No less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the Customs House last week.

Naturally Mr Monteux hesitates to reveal too much, for some works must be rejected, and musical publication in Europe is still somewhat a matter of hazard. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure.

American Aug 30

Bori and Toscanini

LUCREZIA BORI is not, alas, coming to New York next season, but she is negotiating with Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the season of 1920-21. Why wait? No artist is so much needed as she at the Metropolitan, and according to all accounts she is better than ever. Her recent appearances at Monte Carlo in "La Bohème" and "Falstaff" were hugely successful, and she herself feels, as she informed Musical America's correspondent, Dr. O. P. Jacobs, that the operation on her throat, which seemed to have ended her career as a singer, was, after all, a blessing. "All my life," she said, "I have been singing against or over a physical obstruction which with this operation has been entirely eliminated. I am frank to admit that for the first time in my life I am now singing under normal physical conditions." She will, besides singing in Italian cities next season, make her first appearance in Spanish cities, including her native town, Valencia.

With Toscanini, too, Dr. Jacobs was so fortunate as to secure an interview. The great conductor was noncommittal regarding his own plans. There were rumors that the directorship of the Scala had been offered him, and he admitted he might conduct there. He would be glad to return to America, but he regretted that box office receipts played so important a rôle in this wealthy country as against art for art's sake. Why did he refuse the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Union
Springfield, Mass.

...here was nothing in the news ...atches to indicate that the Bos... Symphony Orchestra was on ... to play a farewell tune when ...rmer leader, Dr. Karl Muck, ... on his return trip to his ... Germany.

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

Preparing for Symphony Season

Mr. Monteux Already at Work in Boston—Worcester Music Festival, Caruso's Return and Other Promises to Gladden Music Lovers' Hearts.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester music festival ...

Mr. Sylvi Noack has resigned the position of second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to become concert master for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor.

We found Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution ,and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosiphically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understand me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities, that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere —every time. At the Metropolitan last winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,': 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You will get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 05 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not throughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Herald Sept. 7

interest are ...

NEW WORKS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications are coming by every mail to such an extent that an augmented office force is necessary. Upstairs the great music library has been dusted, and Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. Moreover, no less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the custom house last week.

Naturally, Mr. Monteux is considering many plans. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky, are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure. Mr. Monteux mentions among the masters of the past Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

Travel Sept 6

NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

These are busy days at Symphony Hall, although the opening of the Symphony concert season is a month away. Subscriptions for the season are still pouring in, and Mr. Monteux is more than busy going over the orchestra's library and studying new scores for the new season's programes.

While not pinning himself down to definite promises, Mr. Monteux expects to give, along with the works of the old masters, Debussy's "Play" and orches... suites from either "Petrouchka" or ...e Bird of Fire" and ballets by Stra... sky. Wagner is to once more appear ... the programs. For choral works, he ... planning on Franck's "Beatitudes" ... Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He ... has in mind a new symphony by ...dy and one by Jean Hure.

American Sept. 6

Advertiser Sept 7

DEMAND FOR ...PHONY CONCERTS

...th the opening Boston Symphony ...erts still more than a month off, ...phony Hall has at this time of the ...a very quiet appearance—on the ...de. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail ...h an extent that an augmented ... force is necessary. No less than ...y-nine packages of new scores, ...ssed to "Pierre Monteux, Sym... Hall," have arrived.

Globe Sept. 7

...g Symphony Concerts

...e first Boston Symphony con... more than a month off, Sym... ...ll has at this time of the year ...quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail. Upstairs, the great music library has been dusted, and Mr Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. No less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the Customs House last week.

Naturally Mr Monteux hesitates to reveal too much, for some works must be rejected, and musical publication in Europe is still somewhat a matter of hazard. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hur...

From ...

SEP - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is feeling the after-war urge of the people for music. Season tickets were placed on sale on the first of June and all the low-priced seats for the Saturday concerts are already sold out—an unprecedented occurrence in orchestral management.

-E TON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Brilliant Stars at Symphony Concerts

IT is already possible to predict that no single seats will be left for sale for the Friday afternoon concerts from week to week, and for Saturday evenings there will be very few, as the balconies are already nearly sold out. The time for renewing subscriptions ends tomorrow. The first concerts come October 10 and 11.

On his arrival from France last week Pierre Lonteux, who resumes his place as conductor, gave some hints of his plans. He believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. On the question of Strauss, he will consult public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Debussy's "Play" and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," pieces written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned specifically Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

Among the soloists listed to appear are six singers, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; and an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

SOME OF THE STARS OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

ALFRED CORTOT

EMMY DESTINN

LEO ORNSTEIN

LOUISE HOMER

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—AUGUST 31

Concerning the Coming Symphony Concerts

Now that Conductor Pierre Monteaux has returned from Europe definite announcements regarding the coming season of Symphony Concerts may be made. The soloists have been engaged, and the list is an impressive one. The advance sale of seats has been so large that it is probable there will be none left unsold for the Friday afternoon concerts and very few for the Saturday evenings.

Conductor Monteaux believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. As to Strauss, he will consult American public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are: New symphonies by d'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed; Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," modern pictorial scores written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentions specifically are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The following 14 soloists are listed to appear: Singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and from the orchestra itself, Frederic Fradkin and Jean Bedetti; pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

American Aug 30

Union
Springfield, Mass.
AUG 22 1919

There was nothing in the news dispatches to indicate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on hand to play a farewell tune when its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, was put on his return trip to his native Germany.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30

Symphony Will Play Music of Wagner

The music of Wagner will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of its first program under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. Conductor Monteaux, declaring that "it is time to consider music and war as two different things" has signified his intention of suiting symphony programs to the American taste.

Fourteen soloists will be heard in Boston during the symphony season beginning Oct. 10 and 11. Of these 14 artists Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Louise Homer and John McCormack are the vocalists; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack are the violinists; Sergei Rachmoninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein pianists, and Joseph Bonnet is organist.

The last date for renewal of subscription seats is next Monday. In all probability no single seats will be available from week to week for Friday afternoons, it is stated. For Saturdays very few seats remain, the balconies being nearly sold out.

(Photo copyrighted by Underwood & Underwood)

Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano whose many past triumphs in Symphony Hall, will be duplicated during the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

EVENING POST
New York City
AUG 2 - 1919

Bori and Toscanini

LUCREZIA BORI is not, alas, coming to New York next season, but she is negotiating with Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the season of 1920-21. Why wait? No artist is so much needed as she at the Metropolitan, and according to all accounts she is better than ever. Her recent appearances at Monte Carlo in "La Bohème" and "Falstaff" were hugely successful, and she herself feels, as she informed Musical America's correspondent, Dr. O. P. Jacobs, that the operation on her throat, which seemed to have ended her career as a singer, was, after all, a blessing. "All my life," she said, "I have been singing against or over a physical obstruction which with this operation has been entirely eliminated. I am frank to admit that for the first time in my life I am now singing under normal physical conditions." She will, besides singing in Italian cities next season, make her first appearance in Spanish cities, including her native town, Valencia.

With Toscanini, too, Dr. Jacobs was so fortunate as to secure an interview. The great conductor was noncommittal regarding his own plans. There were rumors that the directorship of the Scala had been offered him, and he admitted he might conduct there. He would be glad to return to America, but he regretted that box office receipts played so important a rôle in this wealthy country as against art for art's sake. Why did he refuse the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

...veral reasons, ...
...offer came t...
...n he had alrea...
...He frankly ...
...f presiding o...
...quite appeal t...
...es. He had he...
...in the person...
...een made, for p...
...no patience w...
...with politics.
...ridiculous," h...
...political propa...
...ade through th...
...art. You will ...
...his triumphant ...
...orld in all count...
People are hu...
...ou know, anyth...
...erally gets in th...
...of reasons fo...
...for Wagner.
...g a concert in ...
...from Wagner's ...
...border. "prolonged ...
...applause," and Beethoven's ...
...phony, which also was re...
...multuous approval. The de...
...was so great that the sa...
...was played three times.

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

Preparing for Symphony Season

Mr. Monteux Already at Work in Boston—Worcester Music Festival, Caruso's Return and Other Promises to Gladden Music Lovers' Hearts.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester music festival [illegible]

Mr. Sylvi Noack has resigned the position of second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to become concert master for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor.

We found Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution, and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosiphically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understand me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities, that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere—every time. At the Metropolitan last winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,': 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You will get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 05 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not throughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Traveler Sept 6

NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

These are busy days at Symphony Hall, although the opening of the Symphony concert season is a month away. Subscriptions for the season are still pouring in, and Mr. Monteux is more than busy going over the orchestra's library and studying new scores for the new season's programes.

While not pinning himself down to definite promises, Mr. Monteux expects to give, along with the works of the old masters, Debussy's "Play" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" and ballets by Stravinsky. Wagner is to once more appear on the programs. For choral works, he is planning on Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He also has in mind a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure.

Advertiser Sept 7

BIG DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail to such an extent that an augmented office force is necessary. No less than twenty-nine packages of new scores, addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," have arrived.

Globe Sept. 7

Coming Symphony Concerts

With the first Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within, Subscription applications flood every mail. Upstairs, the great music library has been dusted, and Mr Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. No less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the Customs House last week.

Naturally Mr Monteux hesitates to reveal too much, for some works must be rejected, and musical publication in Europe is still somewhat a matter of hazard. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure.

Herald Sept. 7

NEW WORKS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications are coming by every mail to such an extent that an augmented office force is necessary. Upstairs the great music library has been dusted, and Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. Moreover, no less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the custom house last week.

Naturally, Mr. Monteux is considering many plans. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky, are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure. Mr. Monteux mentions among the masters of the past Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

American Sept. 6

From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SEP - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is feeling the after-war urge of the people for music. Season tickets were placed on sale on the first of June and all the low-priced seats for the Saturday concerts are already sold out—an unprecedented occurrence in orchestral management.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, AUGUST 31, 1919

Brilliant Stars at Symphony Concerts

SOME OF THE STARS OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

IT is already possible to predict that no single seats will be left for sale for the Friday afternoon concerts from week to week, and for Saturday evenings there will be very few, as the balconies are already nearly sold out. The time for renewing subscriptions ends tomorrow. The first concerts come October 10 and 11.

On his arrival from France last week Pierre Lonteux, who resumes his place as conductor, gave some hints of his plans. He believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. On the question of Strauss, he will consult public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," pieces written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned specifically Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

Among the soloists listed to appear are six singers, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack; four pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; and an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—AUGUST 31

Concerning the Coming Symphony Concerts

Now that Conductor Pierre Monteaux has returned from Europe definite announcements regarding the coming season of Symphony Concerts may be made. The soloists have been engaged, and the list is an impressive one. The advance sale of seats has been so large that it is probable there will be none left unsold for the Friday afternoon concerts and very few for the Saturday evenings.

Conductor Monteaux believes that it is time to hear the music of Wagner again, and will accordingly put Wagner on his first program. As to Strauss, he will consult American public opinion. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are: New symphonies by d'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed; Debussy's "Play" and Strawinsky's "Fire Bird," modern pictorial scores written for the ballet. Among the older symphonic composers he mentions specifically are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the more recent composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The following 14 soloists are listed to appear: Singers, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, and from the orchestra itself, Frederic Fradkin and Jean Bedetti; pianists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

American Aug 30

Union
Springfield, Mass.

There was nothing in the news dispatches to indicate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on hand to play a farewell tune when its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, sailed on his return trip to his native Germany.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30

Symphony Will Play Music of Wagner

The music of Wagner will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of its first program under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. Conductor Monteaux, declaring that "it is time to consider music and war as two different things" has signified his intention of suiting symphony programs to the American taste.

Fourteen soloists will be heard in Boston during the symphony season beginning Oct. 10 and 11. Of these 14 artists Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Louise Homer and John McCormack are the vocalists; Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Frederic Fradkin and Sylvain Noack are the violinists; Sergei Rachmoninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein pianists, and Joseph Bonnet is organist.

The last date for renewal of subscription seats is next Monday. In all probability no single seats will be avaliable from week to week for Friday afternoons, it is stated. For Saturdays very few seats remain, the balconies being nearly sold out.

(Photo copyrighted by Underwood & Underwood)

Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano whose many past triumphs in Symphony Hall, will be duplicated during the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

EVENING POST
New York City
AUG 2 - 1919

Bori and Toscanini

LUCREZIA BORI is not, alas, coming to New York next season, but she is negotiating with Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the season of 1920-21. Why wait? No artist is so much needed as she at the Metropolitan, and according to all accounts she is better than ever. Her recent appearances at Monte Carlo in "La Bohème" and "Falstaff" were hugely successful, and she herself feels, as she informed Musical America's correspondent, Dr. O. P. Jacobs, that the operation on her throat, which seemed to have ended her career as a singer, was, after all, a blessing. "All my life," she said, "I have been singing against or over a physical obstruction which with this operation has been entirely eliminated. I am frank to admit that for the first time in my life I am now singing under normal physical conditions." She will, besides singing in Italian cities next season, make her first appearance in Spanish cities, including her native town, Valencia.

With Toscanini, too, Dr. Jacobs was so fortunate as to secure an interview. The great conductor was noncommittal regarding his own plans. There were rumors that the directorship of the Scala had been offered him, and he admitted he might conduct there. He would be glad to return to America, but he regretted that box office receipts played so important a rôle in this wealthy country as against art for art's sake. Why did he refuse the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

...veral reasons, one
...offer came to
...n he had alrea
He frankly a
...f presiding o
quite appeal t
...es. He had he
...in the person
...een made, for p
no patience w
...with politics.
...ridiculous," he political propa
...ade through th
art. You will his triumphant
...orld in all count
People are hur
...ou know, anyth
...erally gets in th of reasons for
for Wagner.
...g a concert in
...from Wagner'
"prolonged applause," and Beethoven's
phony, which also was re multuous approval. The de was so great that the sa
was played three times.

...d natured
...cites the ...Rocking
...nxious
...fessional.
...fleet wa
...the war
...n, but i
...offer i
...is too g
...eclipsed.
...n, that I
...more for
...r body
...an those
...found o success i
...am of ten
...f States
...er for the
...vers than
...s of the H
...border.

Travile Sept 6

NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

These are busy days at Symphony Hall, although the opening of the Symphony concert season is a month away. Subscriptions for the season are still pouring in, and Mr. Monteux is more than busy going over the orchestra's library and studying new scores for the new season's programes.

While not pinning himself down to definite promises, Mr. Monteux expects to give, along with the works of the old masters, Debussy's "Play" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" and ballets by Stravinsky. Wagner is to once more appear on the programs. For choral works, he is planning on Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He also has in mind a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure.

Advertiser Sept 7

BIG DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subcription applications flood every mail such an extent that an augmented ...fice force is necessary. No less than ...enty-nine packages of new scores, ...dressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symony Hall," have arrived.

Globe Sept. 7

Coming Symphony Concerts

With the first Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications flood every mail. Upstairs, the great music library has been dusted, and Mr Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. No less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the Customs House last week.

Naturally Mr Monteux hesitates to reveal too much, for some works must be rejected, and musical publication in Europe is still somewhat a matter of hazard. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure.

From Traile
SEP - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is feeling the after-war urge of the people for music. Season tickets were placed on sale on the first of June and all the low-priced seats for the Saturday concerts are already sold out—an unprecedented occurrence in orchestral management.

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

Preparing for Symphony Season

Mr. Monteux Already at Work in Boston—Worcester Music Festival, Caruso's Return and Other Promises to Gladden Music Lovers' Hearts.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester music ...

Mr. Sylvi Noack has resigned the position of second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to become concert master for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor.

We found Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution ,and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosiphically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understand me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities, that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere —every time. At the Metropolitan last winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,': 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You will get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 05 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not throughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Herald Sept. 7

NEW WORKS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With the opening Boston Symphony concerts still more than a month off, Symphony Hall has at this time of the year a very quiet appearance—on the outside. But not so within. Subscription applications are coming by every mail to such an extent that an augmented office force is necessary. Upstairs the great music library has been dusted, and Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has emptied shelf after shelf for careful perusal. Moreover, no less than 29 packages of new scores, covered with French stamps and addressed to "Pierre Monteux, Symphony Hall," were extricated from the custom house last week.

Naturally, Mr. Monteux is considering many plans. There are hints of new works by the more daring Russian, Italian and French composers. Debussy's "Jeux" and orchestral suites from either "Petrouchka" or "The Bird of Fire" ballets by Stravinsky, are strong possibilities. Wagner has been accepted for immediate use, but Strauss is still to be judged. Two choral works, Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he hopes to give if practical obstacles may be overcome. A virtual certainty is a new symphony by d'Indy and one by Jean Hure. Mr. Monteux mentions among the masters of the past Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

American Sept. 6

POST, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10. 1919

Symphony Concertmaster Proud Father of Twins

FRADKIN TWINS BUT TWO DAYS OLD ENJOY PICTURE TAKING.
Russell Lee Fradkin, at left, and Jeanne Lorraine Fradkin had their pictures taken yesterday. Their nurse, Miss A. Murry is snapped with them.

Frederick Fradkin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, is wearing a large, expansive smile on his face, the reason for the smile being that he is now the proud father of twins, Russell Lee and Jeanne Lorraine Fradkin.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony has ever had. He was born in New York, and won a prize for concert work in Paris. He married Jean Tell, who has appeared in many New York productions, but gave up the stage upon her marriage to Mr. Fradkin. They live at 82 Fenway.

versalist churches in

FREDERIC FRADKIN IS FATHER OF TWINS

Symphony's Solo Violinist Adds Duet to the Aggregation

Frederic Fradkin, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with twins yesterday by Mrs. Fradkin. One was a boy, weighing six pounds, and tne other a girl, weighing a pound less. Mrs. Fradkin is resting well and is rejoicing with her husband over the arrival of the twins.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony Orchestra has had. He was born in New York and won his first prize at Paris. A few years ago he married Jean Tell, who was an artist in several New York plays. Mrs. Fradkin quit the stage for all time when she was married to the musician. They are making their home at 82 Fenway.

Adv. Sept. 14

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10,

NEWS OF MUSIC

CONDUCTORS AND COMPOSERS IN VARIOUS ANGLES

Mr. Monteux Cautiously Answers an Inevitable Question — Those Hospitable English—Mr. Toscanini Heard and Noted —Mr. Bodanzky Picks His Pieces for His New Orchestra—Busy Mr. Weingartner—Items and Incidents

SUBMISSIVE to the interviewer—perhaps as minor obligation of his present high place—if not altogether reconciled to him, Mr. Monteux has conversed cautiously yet interestingly with the correspondent in Boston of Musical America. "You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music?" and the conductor answered: "Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of Old World music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer. Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music. But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American. I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

m BILLBOARD

dress: Cincinnati

te..... 5 -

PROSPECTS

For the Coming Boston Symphony Orchestra Season

Boston, June 28.—The Boston Sympony Orchestra, widely known as one of the best orchestras in the country, will next autumn begin one of the busiest seasons of its thirty-nine years. According to custom, the orchestra will give twenty-four pairs of concerts in Boston, ten concerts in New York, five in Brooklyn and will tour the cities of New England, the South and the West.

One of the reasons for the large subscription sales is due to the personnel of the organization, which has perhaps reached its highest level, and the largest number of distinguished virtuosi it has ever assembled at a single time.

Another reason for the interest in next year's program is the newly engaged conductor, Pierre Monteux. Pierre Monteux has had a brilliant career, having started as a viola player in Paris, but soon found his true work was that of a conductor. At the head of the Ballet Russe he toured Europe four times, and after serving two years in the French army came to America and became regular French conductor at the Metropolitan. Efforts were made in 1918 to have him become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Metropolitan Opera Company would not release him except for a brief period, during which he conducted the two opening pairs of the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston.

American Sept. 13

"THE RITES OF SPRING"

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was moved to reminiscence when he came across the score of Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Inside the cover is scribbled—"To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in grateful memory of April 14, 1914. Igor Strawinsky." On that day Mr. Monteaux first compelled Paris to listen to that revolutinary score.

He had produced it with ballet five times amid such a hubbub of hisses, cat calls and applause, that neither audience, dancers nor conductor could hear more than occasional strains of the music.

On April 14 he played the piece in purely orchestral form, in one of his "Concerts Monteux. The packed theatre listened in reasonable silence, but immediately after the last note shouted, hurled missiles and skirmished until the police had to intervene. Strawinsky himself was discovered and friends and opponents made for him simultaneously. He fled for his life, and was arrested by some suspicious gendarmes. But he pointed to his battered silk hat, explained that he was a deputy, and they allowed him to seek refuge in a taxicab.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my 'Concerts Monteux' in the same theatre a little later (April 14, 1914). The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece, Strawinsky appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a tall hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky's suffered with the rest. His champions made for him, applauding, but he fled for a taxicab. The police grew suspicious at the lank running figure and arrested him. But Strawinsky pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go."

SUNDAY HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 14, 1919.

WHEN MONTEUX UPSET MUSICAL PARIS

One of the scores owned by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Over its frontispiece is inscribed in fountain pen writing, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in membry of April 14, 1914—Igor Strawinsky."

The inscription moved Mr. Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership.

"It was not Paris's first taste of Strawinsky," he explained, "'The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is different—it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 84 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

It has been announced—we have all heard the flourish of trumpets—that Mr. Monteux will conduct orchestral music by Wagner at the Symphony concerts this season. The announcement shows that Mr. Monteux either is passionately fond of this music written by a man who sneeringly abused his country in a wretched pamphlet after Prussia had wantonly attacked and savagely trodden France under its hoofs; that Mr. Monteux, a forgiving soul, exclaims: "Art knows no national boundaries"; or that he is willing to sink patriotic feeling, thinking that Wagner's music will be welcomed by certain persons in the audience.

There is this to be said in favor of Mr. Monteux's purpose and of any longing on the part of certain hearers; Wagner is dead; dead and buried; he did not sign the manifesto of the "Intellectuals." Yet in the arrogant finale of "The Mastersingers" he spurns all music outside of Germany and shouts fortissimo, "Deutschland Ueber Alles."

Neither did Richard Strauss sign the manifesto. The thrifty Richard had an eye on the royalties for performance of his tone poems in Paris, London and other foreign cities. Will Mr. Monteux conduct his music?

Then there is Mr. Felix Weingartner, with his new orchestral works, one of them a mockery of the allies. He signed the manifesto, but he now weeps salty tears, says that he was basely deceived by wicked Germans in Berlin; he didn't know the contents; he loves America dearly. Bruch and Humperdinck are apparently not repentant. Then there are other German composers, who no doubt would be willing to forgive America if their music would bring them dollars.

On August 14th of this year the Daily Telegraph of London published a letter, one of a series, written by Mr. Antoine, the celebrated Parisian actor and manager. The following extract bears on the question just raised:

"It is of sufficient interest, I think, to mention that lately Wagnerian music has been played in public in Paris for the first time since 1914. This question was raised many times during the war, and very divergent opinions were expressed. At the open air concerts given in the evening at the Jardin des Tuileries, selections from 'Die Meistersinger' have been sandwiched between pieces by Gluck and Mozart, and, as a very piquant contrast, the programme also included a work by Saint-Saens, who, during the period of hostilities, was the leader of a very strong campaign against German music. Soldiers were very numerous among the audience, but there were no incidents; everything passed off with great decorum and tact. The managers of our great lyric theatres, I fancy, have not failed to observe this first essay, because the matter is of importance, particularly for our Opera, which includes in its repertory many of Wagner's works. In this connection, while the interests of the French theatres must be weighed, it is necessary also to respect public feeling, which is always the supreme judge."

This letter was published on Aug. 14. The Morning Telegraph of New York has published a letter from a United News staff correspondent dated Paris, Aug. 29. He begins: "France is not yet ready to listen to German music, and least of all the music of Wagner." He then says that Saint-Saens and Dubois on the 29th supported the action of the prefect of Paris in forbidding a concert in the Tuileries Garden because the program included compositions of Wagner. The prefect said the performance of these pieces might cause a public demonstration which would be prejudicial to the peace negotiations, which are not yet at an end. His action was approved by the newspapers and the people.

"An impresario recently asked my permission to give a concert composed half of Wagner's works and half of my own," Saint-Saens declared. "I refused absolutely. On the other hand, I was told recently that Marshal Foch has been listening to Wagnerian music, and this may have occurred in the German regions under his command, but I know that there is no German music played when he gives a soiree in his own home. In my book, written in 1881, I said, 'Art has no fatherland, but at least artists have.' Now I say that that statement was inexact. In all schools of music we see rooms labelled 'Italian school,' 'French school,' 'Spanish school.' Isn't Scottish music, for example, vastly different from Spanish?"

Dubois said: "But for German music there would be no questions for the peace conference to settle now. Wagner is a great master, and it will never be possible to consider excluding entirely his works from French programs, but just now it is a question of tact. The time is inopportune. It is too soon to begin the day after the war—and such a war!—interpreting the music of such a man as Wagner, who in a book even more foolish than hateful, insulted our country. Later we may arrive at a decision as to which of his works are acceptable to us. We will play the works of all authors whose works have become classic—Germans as well as others—and Wagner's works will be among them.

"But, in any event, we will not play the works of any living German composer."

L'Action Francaise, the leading Royalist French newspaper, has this to say:

"To play Wagner's music now would be to traffic with the enemy, which is illegal. Every Wagnerian concert brings royalties to the composer's son, Siegfried, who is an extreme pan-Germanist and one of the 99 intellectuals who signed the famous appeal early in the war. It is still too soon, with peace still unratified, with so many thousands of our people still in mourning, to play the music of the man who has cruelly insulted us after our disaster of wspapers of London are protesting against any attempt to produce German plays in that city. We now quote from the Stage:

"The Berlin papers gleefully announce that representatives of Shubert, Klaw & Erlanger and other American theatrical firms have just arrived in Hunland on the lookout for the latest successes, either in opera, comedy, farce or tragedy, to take back to New York. These gentlemen may buy what they like for the American stage, but we must see that, later on, they do not send their Prussian plays over here, to the detriment of British authors. We have all heads use of the expression, 'Art has no nationality,' at different times, and have meant it; but when alien art is used principally for propaganda purposes, one feels inclined to add the words, 'unless it is German.'

"I liked C. B. Cochran's letter to the Evening News on this subject, in which he registers a very strong protest against the proposed production of a new Hungarian opera at a West end theatre, and I should not be surprised if fresh arrangements were made at the last moment. These are not the times to challenge the temper of the public on the question of alien art."

It would be a pity if Mr. Monteux in his zeal to please certain subscribers, or perhaps to display a "catholic taste," should unwittingly become an instrument of German propaganda.

TRANSCRIPT, SATU SEPTEMBER 6,

—Mr. Monteux's Novel Pieces—Mr. Noack to California

Mr. Monteux, scrutinizing and sifting the well-stored library of the Symphony Orchestra and reading and re-reading the scores that he recently brought from Paris, has virtually decided upon the performance for the first times in Boston of three notable pieces—D'Indy's third symphony, a symphony by Jean Huré, whose music French composers, conductors and reviewers much admire, and Debussy's ballet "Jeux," to be played, of course, as a tone-poem without visible action. If the conductor can lay hands upon score and parts, he will also include in a programme the suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," the music of which has been heard in Boston in the theatre only. There is a possibility also that Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play as a tone-poem another and more characteristic ballet of Stravinsky, "Petrouchka." The conductor has further decided to put D'Indy's second symphony on one of his early programmes. Masterly and moving music as it is, it has not been heard in Boston or anywhere else in America for seven or eight years.

Mr. Sylvian Noack, long the second concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his post to become first concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Los Angeles in California, of wh'ch Mr. Walter Rothwell has now become the able conductor. The public of the Symphony Concerts, recalling Mr. Noack, alike in his place in the string choir and in the concertos he has played as occasional "soloist," will miss the refinements of his tone, the elasticity and surety of his hand, the sensibility and clarity of his understanding and imagination with whatever music fell to him. Who will succeed him at the first desk of the violins has not yet been decided. Among the "soloists" for the impending season, Mr. Bedetti, the Parisian successor to Mr. Malkin as first violoncellist, will fill his place.

SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 14,

ling

erre

Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Over its frontispiece is inscribed in fountain pen writing, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in memory of April 14, 1914—Igor Strawinsky." The inscription moved Mr. Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership.

"It was not Paris's first taste of Strawinsky," he explained. "'The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is different—it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 84 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my 'Concerts Monteux' in the same theatre a little later (April 14, 1914). The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile, and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece Strawinsky appeared on the stage and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a tall hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky had one which suffered with the rest. His champions made for him, applauding, but he fled for a taxicab. The police grew suspicious at the lank, running figure and arrested him. But Strawinsky pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go."

WORCESTER MUSIC FESTIVAL

SUNDAY GLOBE-

SEPTEMBER 14,

How Paris Received a Ballet by Strawinsky

One of the scores owned by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps." Over its frontispiece is inscribed, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in memory of April 14, 1914.—Igor Strawinsky."

The inscription moved Mr Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership. "It was not Paris' first taste of Strawinsky," he explained. "The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Saire de Printemps' is different; it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 84 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them, the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my concerts Monteux in the same theatre on April 14. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere.

"At the end of the piece Strawinsky appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a t hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky one which suffered with the re champions made for him, ap but he fled for a taxicab. grew suspicious at the la figure and arrested him. pointed to his crushed them that he was a let him go."

POST, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1919

Herald. Sept 7

Symphony Concertmaster Proud Father of Twins

FRADKIN TWINS BUT TWO DAYS OLD ENJOY PICTURE TAKING.
Russell Lee Fradkin, at left, and Jeanne Lorraine Fradkin had their pictures taken yesterday. Their nurse, Miss A. Murry is snapped with them.

Frederick Fradkin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, is wearing a large, expansive smile on his face, the reason for the smile being that he is now the proud father of twins, Russell Lee and Jeanne Lorraine Fradkin.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony has ever had. He was born in New York, and won a prize for concert work in Paris. He married Jean Tell, who has appeared in many New York productions, but gave up the stage upon her marriage to Mr. Fradkin. They live at 82 Fenway.

versalist churches in

FREDERIC FRADKIN IS FATHER OF TWINS

Symphony's Solo Violinist Adds Duet to the Aggregation

Frederic Fradkin, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with twins yesterday by Mrs. Fradkin. One was a boy, weighing six pounds, and tne other a girl, weighing a pound less. Mrs. Fradkin is resting well and is rejoicing with her husband over the arrival of the twins.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony Orchestra has had. He was born in New York and won his first prize at Paris. A few years ago he married Jean Tell, who was an artist in several New York plays. Mrs. Fradkin quit the stage for all time when she was married to the musician. They are making their home at 82 Fenway.

Adv. Sept. 14

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10,

NEWS OF MUSIC

CONDUCTORS AND COMPOSERS IN VARIOUS ANGLES

Mr. Monteux Cautiously Answers an Inevitable Question — Those Hospitable English—Mr. Toscanini Heard and Noted —Mr. Bodanzky Picks His Pieces for His New Orchestra—Busy Mr. Weingartner—Items and Incidents

SUBMISSIVE to the interviewer—perhaps as minor obligation of his present high place—if not altogether reconciled to him, Mr. Monteux has conversed cautiously yet interestingly with the correspondent in Boston of Musical America. "You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music?" and the conductor answered: "Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of Old World music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer. Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music. But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American. I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

n BILLBOARD

dress: Cincinnati

te 5 -

PROSPECTS

For the Coming Boston Symphony Orchestra Season

Boston, June 28.—The Boston Sympony Orchestra, widely known as one of the best orchestras in the country, will next autumn begin one of the busiest seasons of its thirty-nine years. According to custom, the orchestra will give twenty-four pairs of concerts in Boston, ten concerts in New York, five in Brooklyn and will tour the cities of New England, the South and the West.

One of the reasons for the large subscription sales is due to the personnel of the organization, which has perhaps reached its highest level, and the largest number of distinguished virtuosi it has ever assembled at a single time.

Another reason for the interest in next year's program is the newly engaged conductor, Pierre Monteux. Pierre Monteux has had a brilliant career, having started as a viola player in Paris, but soon found his true work was that of a conductor. At the head of the Ballet Russe he toured Europe four times, and after serving two years in the French army came to America and became regular French conductor at the Metropolitan. Efforts were made in 1918 to have him become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Metropolitan Opera Company would not release him except for a brief period, during which he conducted the two opening pairs of the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston.

TRANSCRIPT, SATU SEPTEMBER 6,

—Mr. Monteux's Novel Pieces—Mr. Noack to California

Mr. Monteux, scrutinizing and sifting the well-stored library of the Symphony Orchestra and reading and re-reading the scores that he recently brought from Paris, has virtually decided upon the performance for the first times in Boston of three notable pieces—D'Indy's third symphony, a symphony by Jean Huré, whose music French composers, conductors and reviewers much admire, and Debussy's ballet "Jeux," to be played, of course, as a tone-poem without visible action. If the conductor can lay hands upon score and parts, he will also include in a programme the suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," the music of which has been heard in Boston in the theatre only. There is a possibility also that Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play as a tone-poem another and more characteristic ballet of Stravinsky, "Petrouchka." The conductor has further decided to put D'Indy's second symphony on one of his early programmes. Masterly and moving music as it is, it has not been heard in Boston or anywhere else in America for seven or eight years.

Mr. Sylvian Noack, long the second concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his post to become first concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Los Angeles in California, of which Mr. Walter Rothwell has now become the able conductor. The public of the Symphony Concerts, recalling Mr. Noack, alike in his place in the string choir and in the concertos he has played as occasional "soloist," will miss the refinements of his tone, the elasticity and surety of his hand, the sensibility and clarity of his understanding and imagination with whatever music fell to him. Who will succeed him at the first desk of the violins has not yet been decided. Among the "soloists" for the impending season, Mr. Bedetti, the Parisian successor to Mr. Malkin as first violoncellist, will fill his place.

American Sept. 13

"THE RITES OF SPRING"

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was moved to reminiscence when he came across the score of Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Inside the cover is scribbled—"To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in grateful memory of April 14, 1914. Igor Strawinsky." On that day Mr. Monteaux first compelled Paris to listen to that revolutinary score.

He had produced it with ballet five times amid such a hubbub of hisses, cat calls and applause, that neither audience, dancers nor conductor could hear more than occasional strains of the music.

On April 14 he played the piece in purely orchestral form, in one of his "Concerts Monteux. The packed theatre listened in reasonable silence, but immediately after the last note shouted, hurled missiles and skirmished until the police had to intervene. Strawinsky himself was discovered and friends and opponents made for him simultaneously. He fled for his life, and was arrested by some suspicious gendarmes. But he pointed to his battered silk hat, explained that he was a deputy, and they allowed him to seek refuge in a taxicab.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my 'Concerts Monteux' in the same theatre a little later (April 14, 1914). The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece, Strawinsky appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a tall hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky's suffered with the rest. His champions made for him, applauding, but he fled for a taxicab. The police grew suspicious at the lank running figure and arrested him. But Strawinsky pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go."

SUNDAY HERALD, SEPTEMBER 14, 1919.

WHEN MONTEUX UPSET MUSICAL PARIS

One of the scores owned by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Over its frontispiece is inscribed in fountain pen writing, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in memory of April 14, 1914—Igor Strawinsky."

The inscription moved Mr. Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership.

"It was not Paris's first taste of Strawinsky," he explained. "'The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is different—it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

It has been announced—we have all heard the flourish of trumpets—that Mr. Monteux will conduct orchestral music by Wagner at the Symphony concerts this season. The announcement shows that Mr. Monteux either is passionately fond of this music written by a man who sneeringly abused his country in a wretched pamphlet after Prussia had wantonly attacked and savagely trodden France under its hoofs; that Mr. Monteux, a forgiving soul, exclaims: "Art knows no national boundaries"; or that he is willing to sink patriotic feeling, thinking that Wagner's music will be welcomed by certain persons in the audience.

There is this to be said in favor of Mr. Monteux's purpose and of any longing on the part of certain hearers: Wagner is dead; dead and buried; he did not sign the manifesto of the "Intellectuals." Yet in the arrogant finale of "The Mastersingers" he spurns all music outside of Germany and shouts fortissimo, "Deutschland Ueber Alles."

Neither did Richard Strauss sign the manifesto. The thrifty Richard had an eye on the royalties for performance of his tone poems in Paris, London and other foreign cities. Will Mr. Monteux conduct his music?

Then there is Mr. Felix Weingartner, with his new orchestral works, one of them a mockery of the allies. He signed the manifesto, but he now weeps salty tears, says that he was basely deceived by wicked Germans in Berlin; he didn't know the contents; he loves America dearly. Bruch and Humperdinck are apparently not repentant. Then there are other German composers, who no doubt would be willing to forgive America if their music would bring them dollars.

On August 14th of this year the Daily Telegraph of London published a letter, one of a series, written by Mr. Antoine, the celebrated Parisian actor and manager. The following extract bears on the question just raised:

"It is of sufficient interest, I think, to mention that lately Wagnerian music has been played in public in Paris for the first time since 1914. This question was raised many times during the war, and very divergent opinions were expressed. At the open air concerts given in the evening at the Jardin des Tuileries, selections from 'Die Meistersinger' have been sandwiched between pieces by Gluck and Mozart, and, as a very piquant contrast, the programme also included a work by Saint-Saens, who, during the period of hostilities, was the leader of a very strong campaign against German music. Soldiers were very numerous among the audience, but there were no incidents; everything passed off with great decorum and tact. The managers of our great lyric theatres, I fancy, have not failed to observe this first essay, because the matter is of importance, particularly for our Opera, which includes in its repertory many of Wagner's works. In this connection, while the interests of the French theatres must be weighed, it is necessary also to respect public feeling, which is always the supreme judge."

This letter was published on Aug. 14. The Morning Telegraph of New York has published a letter from a United News staff correspondent dated Paris, Aug. 29. He begins: "France is not yet ready to listen to German music, and least of all the music of Wagner." He then says that Saint-Saens and Dubois on the 29th supported the action of the prefect of Paris in forbidding a concert in the Tuileries Garden because the program included compositions of Wagner. The prefect said the performance of these pieces might cause a public demonstration which would be prejudicial to the peace negotiations, which are not yet at an end. His action was approved by the newspapers and the people.

"An impresario recently asked my permission to give a concert composed half of Wagner's works and half of my own," Saint-Saens declared. "I refused absolutely. On the other hand, I was told recently that Marshal Foch has been listening to Wagnerian music, and this may have occurred in the German regions under his command, but I know that there is no German music played when he gives a soiree in his own home. In my book, written in 1881, I said, 'Art has no fatherland, but at least artists have.' Now I say that that statement was inexact. In all schools of music we see rooms labelled 'Italian school,' 'French school,' 'Spanish school.' Isn't Scottish music, for example, vastly different from Spanish?"

Dubois said: "But for German music there would be no questions for the peace conference to settle now. Wagner is a great master, and it will never be possible to consider excluding entirely his works from French programs, but just now it is a question of tact. The time is inopportune. It is too soon to begin the day after the war—and such a war!—interpreting the music of such a man as Wagner, who in a book even more foolish than hateful, insulted our country. Later we may arrive at a decision as to which of his works are acceptable to us. We will play the works of all authors whose works have become classic—Germans as well as others—and Wagner's works will be among them.

"But, in any event, we will not play the works of any living German composer."

L'Action Francaise, the leading Royalist French newspaper, has this to say:

"To play Wagner's music now would be to traffic with the enemy, which is illegal. Every Wagnerian concert brings royalties to the composer's son, Siegfried, who is an extreme pan-Germanist and one of the 99 intellectuals who signed the famous appeal early in the war. It is still too soon, with peace still unratified, with so many thousands of our people still in mourning, to play the music of the man who has cruelly insulted us after our [illegible] of wspapers of London are protesting against any attempt to produce German plays in that city. We now quote from the Stage:

"The Berlin papers gleefully announce that representatives of Shubert, Klaw & Erlanger and other American theatrical firms have just arrived in Hunland on the lookout for the latest successes, either in opera, comedy, farce or tragedy, to take back to New York. These gentlemen may buy what they like for the American stage, but we must see that, later on, they do not send their Prussian plays over here, to the detriment of British authors. We have all heard use of the expression, 'Art has no nationality,' at different times, and have meant it; but when alien art is used principally for propaganda purposes, one feels inclined to add the words, 'unless it is German.'

"I liked C. B. Cochran's letter to the Evening News on this subject, in which he registers a very strong protest against the proposed production of a new Hungarian opera at a West end theatre, and I should not be surprised if fresh arrangements were made at the last moment. These are not the times to challenge the temper of the public on the question of alien art."

It would be a pity if Mr. Monteux in his zeal to please certain subscribers, or perhaps to display a "catholic taste," should unwittingly become an instrument of German propaganda.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 14,

ling

erre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"). Over its frontispiece is inscribed in fountain pen writing, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in memory of April 14, 1914—Igor Strawinsky." The inscription moved Mr. Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership.

"It was not Paris's first taste of Strawinsky," he explained. "'The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is different—it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my 'Concerts Monteux' in the same theatre a little later (April 14, 1914). The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile, and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece Strawinsky appeared on the stage and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a tall hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky had one which suffered with the rest. His champions made for him, applauding, but he fled for a taxicab. The police grew suspicious at the lank, running figure and arrested him. But Strawinsky pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go."

WORCESTER MUSIC FESTIVAL

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 14,

How Paris Received a Ballet by Strawinsky

One of the scores owned by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps." Over its frontispiece is inscribed, "To my dear friend, Pierre Monteux, in memory of April 14, 1914.—Igor Strawinsky."

The inscription moved Mr Monteux to reminiscence, for on that date Paris first "heard" the music under his leadership. "It was not Paris' first taste of Strawinsky," he explained. "The Bird of Fire' and 'The Nightingale' were heard and praised with little adverse comment. But 'Le Saire de Printemps' is different; it marks Strawinsky's 'third manner.' The orchestration is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before I was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. We gave five performances in the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them, the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that I could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but my baton.

"Paris had not yet heard 'The Rites of Spring.' They had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore I arranged a purely orchestral performance of the score at my concerts Monteux in the same theatre on April 14. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere.

"At the end of the piece Strawinsky appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. I think not a tall hat was unsmashed. Strawinsky had one which suffered with the rest. His champions made for him, applauding, but he fled for a taxicab. The police grew suspicious at the lank, running figure and arrested him. But Strawinsky pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON AMERICAN
SEPTEMBER 20,

FEW SYMPHONY SEATS LEFT

In no former years have the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony Concerts been larger than for the season which is to begin two weeks from next Friday, (October 10th). It is highly probable that the Friday afternon concerts will be sold out in the next few days, for even now, there are less than a hundred seats left. Considering that for Saturday evenings 505 additional seats in the second balcony are sold by subscription, there are correspondingly few still available for these concerts. Such facts bespeak the public appreciation of the present eloquence of the orchestra and the eminent musicianship of the new conductor.

Pierre Monteux's career in France is not entirely a record of musical performance. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as a private in the 35th Territorial Infantry, he was a large part of the time in the trenches, fighting in the most desperate battle at Rheim, Verdun, Soissons, and in th Argonne; but his violin was never far, and in periods of rest he played for his comrades, from the poilu to the general. Few Sundays passed when he did not furnish the music at the religious service, whether in a ruined church or in the open. Sometimes he had a harmonium, sometimes a real organ, and sometimes only his beloved violin.

Record Sept. 20

Fo... ymphony Seats Left

In no former years have the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony Concerts been larger than for the season which is to begin two weeks from next Friday, Oct. 10. It is highly probable that the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold out in the next few days, for even now there are less than a hundred seats left. Considering that for Saturday evenings 505 additional seats in the second balcony are sold by subscription, there are correspondingly few still available for these concerts. Such facts bespeak the public appreciation of the present loquence of the orchestra and the eminent musicianship of the new conductor.

SUNDAY GLOBE
SEPTEMBER 21,

Symphony Ticket Sales

The subscription sales for Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin two weeks from next Friday, Oct 10, have never been larger in former years. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than 100 seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available, in consideration of the 505 additional reserved seats in the second balcony for these concerts.

Musical Happenings

Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, did military duty for his country before he first came to America. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as private in the 35th Territorial Infantry; he fought at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous, faithful service he was given his discharge.

HERALD, BOSTON,
SEPTEMBER 21

SYMPHONY SALE

The subscription sales for the Boston Symphony orchestra season which will begin two weeks from next Friday (Oct. 10) have never been larger in former years. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than 100 seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available, in consideration of the 505 additional reserved seats in the second balcony for these concerts. This is surely a clear appreciation of the orchestra. Before Pierre Monteux first came to America he served his country with his compatriots. Called out in the first week of the French mobilization, he became a private in the 35th territorial infantry. For two years he did constant and active duty in the trenches, seeing part in the fiercest battles at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. But those days had their recreations. His violin was always as near him as contingencies allowed and he played to audiences ranging from the poilu to the general. Scarcely a Sunday passed when he did not assist at the religious services, whether in a ruined church or in a hastily constructed outdoor chapel. Sometimes he played a harmonium or a real organ when for... at other times he resorted to... violin.

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 21, 1919

SYMPHONY ... MAKING NEW RECORD

The subscription sales for Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin two weeks from next Friday, have never been so large. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than a hundred seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available. This is regarded as a clear appreciation of the great position which the orchestra has reached, and of the genius of the conductor who will preside over it. Before Pierre Monteux first came to America, he served his country with his compatriots.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 22,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Parisians and Wagner in Parisian Concerts —Two Views of an Amusing Episode— Mr. Monteux's First Programme—Mr. Townsend to Train a Chorus for the Philadelphia Orchestra — Incidents and Personalities

I RECENTLY mentioned that a musical society which for many years past has been giving concerts in the Tuileries Gardens had played some Wagnerian fragments before a popular audience, including many soldiers, without arousing any astonishment or the slightest protest. Even the press did not greatly concern itself with this revival, somewhat premature, perhaps, of our pre-war customs. A recent decision, however, now prohibits the public performance of German music, and this fact must be noted as a characteristic symptom. I leave it for others to decide whether this measure was absolutely necessary. Already some Allied countries do not seem disposed towards a similar boycott—quite understandable, but very rigorous—which may possibly have more serious disadvantages for ourselves than for our recent adversaries. The latter during the war always took their good things wherever they could find them, and French works were constantly performed in Germany, even whon hostilities were at their fiercest. [André Antoine in The London Telegraph

The Parisian papers were amusing reading the other day, when there was a general chorus of ridicule at the prohibition of Wagner's music by the Prefect of Police. The most amusing is "L'Œuvre," which played a cruel trick on Mr. Pascalis, one of the leading officials at the Prefecture. It sent to him a reporter who professed to be the manager of the suppressed concert which was to have been held in the Tuileries Gardens, and who has faithfully reported everything that Mr. Pascalis said to him. Some of the official's remarks are funny. "Wagner," he said, "is very dangerous, as you well know. At any rate we made you understand it yesterday. Wagner disturbs public order. We had an anonymous letter—only one, but it was of such a threatening character—the writer of which said that he would make a scandal if Wagner were played in public."

To the objection that the concert programme had previously been passed by the Prefecture—even concert programmes are still censored in France—Mr. Pascalis replied that they had not noticed Wagner's name on it, and they had passed it by mistake. The reporter masquerading as concert-director objected that there was also music by Beethoven on the programme, to which Mr. Pascalis replied that Beethoven was not a "Boche." The Parisian press in general resents the suggestion that Wagner's music would have caused a disturbance as a libel on the Parisian public. The public which arrived at the concert to find that it was prohibited seems to have audibly expressed its indignation. [The Manchester Guardian

Here in Boston

There was one listener to the Sistine Quartet at Symphony Hall last evening who evidently believed, as indeed the weather warranted, that the summer is not over. On the left side of the first balcony near the stage, serenely he sat, coatless and with sleeves rolled above the elbows, quite as though he were loafing away two hours of a warm night on a porch. Possibly, for the first time in many years, decorous Symphony Hall contained a coatless auditor.

By the same token, the knitting nuisance has not, even now, altogether disappeared from concerts. In war-time there was possibly some excuse for such bad manners toward the performers on the stage and toward the neighbors of the knitter. Yet long before the armistice, the passion for knitting in public had nearly vanished. Here and there, as a glance at the parquet of Symphony Hall revealed last evening, it still lingers. No manager now would be snarlingly labeled "pro-German," did he gently request the occasional knitters to discontinue in the concert-call an annoying pastime.

Credible report goes that at the first pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday, Oct. 10, and Saturday, Oct. 11, Mr. Monteux will include in his programme the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," and the sharply rhythmed and highly colored suite, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, hitherto known to Bostonian ears by piano pieces only.

RECORD, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1919

MONTEUX WILL OFFER WAGNER TO BOSTONIANS

By J. V. CLARK

The musical season begins next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, or Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, at Symphony hall. It depends on the point of view. Some consider the beginning of the Sunday concerts the start of the season. To them Mme. Galli-Curci's recital Sunday will mean the opening of the musical season. Others are firm in the belief that the season cannot open without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To them music holds sway after the first concert on Oct. 10.

For this Sunday's concert Mme. Galli-Curci will sing much of the ornate music in which the great public best likes her. She is at the present moment the coloratura idol. She will not be without competition this season. Later Mme. Tetrazzini will visit these shores and seek the popularity that once was hers. Mme. Lipkowska, the former Boston opera soprano, now in Paris after a long detention in Russia, makes no bones of the fact that she would like to get back to America. It is more than likely that her small voice will be warbling in Boston before many moons.

For the first Symphony concert Mr. Monteux will probably play one Wagner selection. The chances are that it will be the prelude to "Parsifal." Mr. Monteux is wise in taking his Wagnerian plunge at the outset of the season. Will there be a Richard Strauss plunge a little later? On the first program, too, may stand the brilliant suit, "Catalonia," by Albeniz. Reports from Huntington ave. are to the effect that the season's prospects are rosy. The house has practically been sold out for the Friday performances.

No definite announcements are made as to opera season for Boston this years. The Metropolitan announces productions of "The Blue Bird," "Zaza," "The Jewess," "L'Africara in Algieri" and "Manon." Among the new singers announced is only one of major importance, Gabriella Besanzoni, the mezzo soprano.

With little or no opera planned for Boston, this city must rely, more than in some years past, on its concerts. There is every reason to believe that the concerts of major interest will be many and interesting.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

With the arrival in Boston of Pierre Monteux, the new Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, plans are beginning to take shape for the coming season. M. Monteaux has recently returned from France, where he lived for 25 months with the poilu in the trenches. He is anxious, however, to forget the war and says that it will take no part in the seletcion of the musical programme for the orchestra. Classical music will hold its usual place as the time has not come, nor will it, when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. There may be a few works by the more daring Italian, Russian and French composers, and a new symphony by D'Indy is practically sure of incorporation into the programme.

D'Indy is an old man and although only a spectator of the things which have been happening in France during the past four years he seems to have translated the spirit of those terrible years into his scores. Wagner has been accepted and the old masters mentioned are Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

M. Monteaux was, of course, asked the pet question of all truly American interviewers. Is there any chance of developing a true American type of music? The conductor thinks there may be a chance in the future, but, according to his best knowledge it is a long way off. He thinks, however, that when the time comes for American music, it will be very original.

"The time has not yet arrived for American music," he says, "at present it is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer. To-day if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Rusian music—not of the same style as that of Russia, but with a style characteristically American. I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

om TIMES
ldress: Washington, D. C.
ate

The directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season still a matter for speculation. Rumor has it that the Dutch conductor Willem Mengelberg, will soon sign contract for this organization. Pierre Monteux, who was heard in Washington once last season, was reported as the Boston Symphony conductor for the season of 1919-1920, but the rumor would denote a change in plans.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N.Y. SEP 21 1919
Date

om EAGLE
ldress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te

The Orchestras Plan Series.

So much for opera. As in other seasons the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony offer series of five concerts each, the first and third under the auspices of the Institute and the second under that of the Brooklyn Committee of Seventy-five.

The soloists for the concerts of the Boston Symphony, this year under the direction of Pierre Monteux, follow: November 7, Sergi Rachmaninoff, pianist; December 5, Louise Homer, contralto; January 9, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone; February 6, Fritz Kreisler, violinist; March 19, Emmy Destinn, soprano. Those for the concerts of the

m AMERICAN
ress: New York City
SEP -7 19

SUNDAY CONCERTS PLANNED.

The lady furthermore quoted a recent published statement of Pierre Monteux, the eminent French conductor, lately of the Metropolitan Opera Company and at present at the head of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Monteux said that his programmes would embrace all music worthy a performance by his splendid orchestra, irrespective of the nationality of the composer. He specifically pointed out that if would be impossible for him to arrange artistic concerts without the inclusion of German works.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 10 1919

AN OLD TRADITION IN PROCESS OF CHANGE

From Teutonic to Gallic in Boston, via Rabaud and Monteux.

BUT THE WAR IS FORGOT

Some Interesting Remarks by Present Conductor Apropos of American Music.

WELL, now that Dr. Muck has officially sailed away from our shores, M. Pierre Monteux, of Boston, has no "dark gentleman" influence lurking about the corners of his bailiwick to interfere with the integrity of his direction.

Muck was an excellent conductor. He had the Boston Orchestra drilled to a hair; only, when he was forcibly lifted out of that organization, some 28 of his Teutonic musicians went with him. You cannot amputate the director and a score or more of players from an orchestra without doing some considerable violence to the texture of it.

Inevitable Rifts and Rebuildings.

The Boston band has never been the same since. But then last year was largely a makeshift. There was no expectation that Rabaud would remain above part of a season, and probably little effort was made to fix a permanent new routine.

But now Monteux is back early to work for the current season, and he will have a pretty fair chance. Drill is what any orchestra needs, and plenty of it. That was where Muck shone. The precision of the bowing in his string band, the absolute physical unison, was a thing of pleasure to the eye. One felt that just nothing could go wrong here.

All such mastery of the means of expression is mere routine. Given the proper conditions, it can always be acquired. And probably the conditions of management behind the Boston Orchestra are just as free and liberal now as when Colonel Higginson personally stood for everything. So here is Monteux's opportunity. He is a distinguished musician, with much and varied experience behind him. The approaching Boston Symphony season of 1919-20 should be an interesting thing to scrutinize in detail.

Monteux, who is a Parisian, has been spending the summer at home, seeking new playing material for his concerts, and he returns to us in a very open state of mind. "Now that the war is over," he says, "let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs."

A Friendly Interpretation.

All our great American orchestras are undoubtedly going to be asked to play more American music. Here is another observation, apropos, by M. Monteux:

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French and with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia, but with a style characteristically American.

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

MUSIC IN LONDON

m TOWN TOPICS
lress New York City
te AUG 28

WITH the sailing of Herr Doktor Karl Muck for Europe last week, I was reminded of the pretty muddle in which the Boston Symphony orchestra finds itself. The Doktor, it will be recalled, charged that politics in the society was at the root of all his troubles, and many aver that Muck knew whereof he spoke. At the present time there seem to be two leading candidates for the post of conductor and Pierre Monteux, who succeeded Henri Rabaud, is not a more likely selection than a Hollander by the name of Mengleberg, who seems to have a considerable following. The Monteux factions aver their man gave eminent satisfaction last season and declare they will withdraw their patronage from the Symphony if he is not retained. On the other hand, it is asserted by the rival group that they will do the same. Maybe the solution is to have two conductors.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON AMERICAN
SEPTEMBER 20,

FEW SYMPHONY SEATS LEFT

In no former years have the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony Concerts been larger than for the season which is to begin two weeks from next Friday, (October 10th). It is highly probable that the Friday afternon concerts will be sold out in the next few days, for even now, there are less than a hundred seats left. Considering that for Saturday evenings 505 additional seats in the second balcony are sold by subscription, there are correspondingly few still available for these concerts. Such facts bespeak the public appreciation of the present eloquence of the orchestra and the eminent musicianship of the new conductor.

Pierre Monteux's career in France is not entirely a record of musical performance. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as a private in the 35th Territorial Infantry, he was a large part of the time in the trenches, fighting in the most desperate battle at Rheim, Verdun, Soissons, and in th Argonne; but his violin was never far, and in periods of rest he played for his comrades, from the poilu to the general. Few Sundays passed when he did not furnish the music at the religious service, whether in a ruined church or in the open. Sometimes he had a harmonium, sometimes a real organ, and sometimes only his beloved violin.

Record Sept. 20

Fe... ymphony Seats Left

In no former years have the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony Concerts been larger than for the season which is to begin two weeks from next Friday, Oct. 10. It is highly probable that the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold out in the next few days, for even now there are less than a hundred seats left. Considering that for Saturday evenings 505 additional seats in the second balcony are sold by subscription, there are correspondingly few still available for these concerts. Such facts bespeak the public appreciation of the present loquence of the orchestra and the eminent musicianship of the new conductor.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
-SEPTEMBER 21,

Symphony Ticket Sales

The subscription sales for Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin two weeks from next Friday, Oct 10, have never been larger in former years. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than 100 seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available, in consideration of the 505 additional reserved seats in the second balcony for these concerts.

Musical Happenings

Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, did military duty for his country before he first came to America. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as private in the 35th Territorial Infantry; he fought at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous, faithful service he was given his discharge.

HERALD, BOSTON,
SEPTEMBER 21

SYMPHONY SALE

The subscription sales for the Boston Symphony orchestra season which will begin two weeks from next Friday (Oct. 10) have never been larger in former years. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than 100 seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available, in consideration of the 505 additional reserved seats in the second balcony for these concerts. This is surely a clear appreciation of the orchestra. Before Pierre Monteux first came to America he served his country with his compatriots. Called out in the first week of the French mobilization, he became a private in the 35th territorial infantry. For two years he did constant and active duty in the trenches, taking part in the fiercest battles at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. But those days had their relaxations. His violin was always as near him as contingencies allowed and he played to audiences ranging from the poilu to the general. Scarcely a Sunday passed when he did not assist at the religious services, whether in a ruined church or in a hastily constructed outdoor chapel. Sometimes he played a harmonium or a real organ when forthcoming. At other times he resorted to more unorthodox violin.

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 21, 1919

SYMPHONY SALE MAKING NEW RECORD

The subscription sales for Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin two weeks from next Friday, have never been so large. The Friday afternoon concerts will almost certainly be sold out by subscription, for at this date there are less than a hundred seats left, while for Saturday evenings there are correspondingly few available. This is regarded as a clear appreciation of the great position which the orchestra has reached, and of the genius of the conductor who will preside over it. Before Pierre Monteux first came to America, he served his country with his compatriots.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 22,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Parisians and Wagner in Parisian Concerts —Two Views of an Amusing Episode— Mr. Monteux's First Programme—Mr. Townsend to Train a Chorus for the Philadelphia Orchestra — Incidents and Personalities

I RECENTLY mentioned that a musical society which for many years past has been giving concerts in the Tuileries Gardens had played some Wagnerian fragments before a popular audience, including many soldiers, without arousing any astonishment or the slightest protest. Even the press did not greatly concern itself with this revival, somewhat premature, perhaps, of our pre-war customs. A recent decision, however, now prohibits the public performance of German music, and this fact must be noted as a characteristic symptom. I leave it for others to decide whether this measure was absolutely necessary. Already some Allied countries do not seem disposed towards a similar boycott—quite understandable, but very rigorous—which may possibly have more serious disadvantages for ourselves than for our recent adversaries. The latter during the war always took their good things wherever they could find them, and French works were constantly performed in Germany, even when hostilities were at their fiercest. [André Antoine in The London Telegraph

The Parisian papers were amusing reading the other day, when there was a general chorus of ridicule at the prohibition of Wagner's music by the Prefect of Police. The most amusing is "L'Œuvre," which played a cruel trick on Mr. Pascalis, one of the leading officials at the Prefecture. It sent to him a reporter who professed to be the manager of the suppressed concert which was to have been held in the Tuileries Gardens, and who has faithfully reported everything that Mr. Pascalis said to him. Some of the official's remarks are funny, "Wagner," he said, "is very dangerous, as you well know. At any rate we made you understand it yesterday. Wagner disturbs public order. We had an anonymous letter—only one, but it was of such a threatening character —the writer of which said that he would make a scandal if Wagner were played in public."

To the objection that the concert programme had previously been passed by the Prefecture—even concert programmes are still censored in France—Mr. Pascalis replied that they had not noticed Wagner's name on it, and they had passed it by mistake. The reporter masquerading as concert-director objected that there was also music by Beethoven on the programme, to which Mr. Pascalis replied that Beethoven was not a "Boche." The Parisian press in general resents the suggestion that Wagner's music would have caused a disturbance as a libel on the Parisian public. The public which arrived at the concert to find that it was prohibited seems to have audibly expressed its indignation. [The Manchester Guardian

Here in Boston

There was one listener to the Sistine Quartet at Symphony Hall last evening who evidently believed, as indeed the weather warranted, that the summer is not over. On the left side of the first balcony near the stage, serenely he sat, coatless and with sleeves rolled above the elbows, quite as though he were loafing away two hours of a warm night on a porch. Possibly, for the first time in many years, decorous Symphony Hall contained a coatless auditor.

By the same token, the knitting nuisance has not, even now, altogether disappeared from concerts. In war-time there was possibly some excuse for such bad manners toward the performers on the stage and toward the neighbors of the knitter. Yet long before the armistice, the passion for knitting in public had nearly vanished. Here and there, as a glance at the parquet of Symphony Hall revealed last evening, it still lingers. No manager now would be snarlingly labeled "pro-German," did he gently request the occasional knitters to discontinue in the concert-call an annoying pastime.

Credible report goes that at the first pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday, Oct. 10, and Saturday, Oct. 11, Mr. Monteux will include in his programme the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," and the sharply rhythmed and highly colored suite, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, hitherto known to Bostonian ears by piano pieces only.

RECORD, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1919

MONTEUX WILL OFFER WAGNER TO BOSTONIANS

By J. V. CLARK

The musical season begins next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, or Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, at Symphony hall. It depends on the point of view. Some consider the beginning of the Sunday concerts the start of the season. To them Mme. Galli-Curci's recital Sunday will mean the opening of the musical season. Others are firm in the belief that the season cannot open without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To them music holds sway after the first concert on Oct. 10.

For this Sunday's concert Mme. Galli-Curci will sing much of the ornate music in which the great public best likes her. She is at the present moment the coloratura idol. She will not be without competition this season. Later Mme. Tetrazzini will visit these shores and seek the popularity that once was hers. Mme. Lipkowska, the former Boston opera soprano, now in Paris after a long detention in Russia, makes no bones of the fact that she would like to get back to America. It is more than likely that her small voice will be warbling in Boston before many moons.

For the first Symphony concert Mr. Monteux will probably play one Wagner selection. The chances are that it will be the prelude to "Parsifal." Mr. Monteux is wise in taking his Wagnerian plunge at the outset of the season. Will there be a Richard Strauss plunge a little later? On the first program, too, may stand the brilliant suit, "Catalonia," by Albeniz. Reports from Huntington ave. are to the effect that the season's prospects are rosy. The house has practically been sold out for the Friday performances.

No definite announcements are made as to opera season for Boston this years. The Metropolitan announces productions of "The Blue Bird," "Zaza," "The Jewess," "L'Africana in Algieri" and "Manon." Among the new singers announced is only one of major importance. Gabriella Besanzoni, the mezzo soprano.

With little or no opera planned for Boston, this city must rely, more than in some years past, on its concerts. There is every reason to believe that the concerts of major interest will be many and interesting.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

With the arrival in Boston of Pierre Monteux, the new Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, plans are beginning to take shape for the coming season. M. Monteaux has recently returned from France, where he lived for 25 months with the poilu in the trenches. He is anxious, however, to forget the war and says that it will take no part in the seletcion of the musical programme for the orchestra. Classical music will hold its usual place as the time has not come, nor will it, when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. There may be a few works by the more daring Italian, Russian and French composers, and a new symphony by D'Indy is practically sure of incorporation into the programme.

D'Indy is an old man and although only a spectator of the things which have been happening in France during the past four years he seems to have translated the spirit of those terrible years into his scores. Wagner has been accepted and the old masters mentioned are Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

M. Monteaux was, of course, asked the pet question of all truly American interviewers. Is there any chance of developing a true American type of music? The conductor thinks there may be a chance in the future, but, according to his best knowledge it is a long way off. He thinks, however, that when the time comes for American music, it will be very original.

"The time has not yet arrived for American music," he says, "at present it is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer. To-day if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia, but with a style characteristically American. I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season is still a matter for speculation. Rumor has it that the Dutch conductor Willem Mengelberg, will soon sign a contract for this organization. Pierre Monteux, who was heard in Washington once last season, was reported as the Boston Symphony conductor for the season of 1919-1920, but this rumor would denote a change in plans.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date SEP 21 1919

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 21 1919

The Orchestras Plan Series.

So much for opera. As in other seasons the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony offer series of five concerts each, the first and third under the auspices of the Institute and the second under that of the Brooklyn Committee of Seventy-five.

The soloists for the concerts of the Boston Symphony, this year under the direction of Pierre Monteux, follow: November 7, Sergi Rachmaninoff, pianist; December 5, Louise Homer, contralto; January 9, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone; February 6, Fritz Kreisler, violinist; March 19, Emmy Destinn, soprano. Those for the concerts of the New York

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date SEP -7 19

SUNDAY CONCERTS PLANNED.

The lady furthermore quoted a recent published statement of Pierre Monteux, the eminent French conductor, lately of the Metropolitan Opera Company and at present at the head of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Monteux said that his programmes would embrace all music worthy a performance by his splendid orchestra, irrespective of the nationality of the composer. He specifically pointed out that if would be impossible for him to arrange artistic concerts without the inclusion of German works.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 10 1919

AN OLD TRADITION IN PROCESS OF CHANGE

From Teutonic to Gallic in Boston, via Rabaud and Monteux.

BUT THE WAR IS FORGOT

Some Interesting Remarks by Present Conductor Apropos of American Music.

WELL, now that Dr. Muck has officially sailed away from our shores, M. Pierre Monteux, of Boston, has no "dark gentleman" influence lurking about the corners of his balliwick to interfere with the integrity of his direction.

Muck was an excellent conductor. He had the Boston Orchestra drilled to a hair; only, when he was forcibly lifted out of that organization, some 28 of his Teutonic musicians went with him. You cannot amputate the director and a score or more of players from an orchestra without doing some considerable violence to the texture of it.

Inevitable Rifts and Rebuildings.

The Boston band has never been the same since. But then last year was largely a makeshift. There was no expectation that Rabaud would remain above part of a season, and probably little effort was made to fix a permanent new routine.

But now Monteux is back early to work for the current season, and he will have a pretty fair chance. Drill is what any orchestra needs, and plenty of it. That was where Muck shone. The precision of the bowing in his string band, the absolute physical unison, was a thing of pleasure to the eye. One felt that just nothing could go wrong here.

All such mastery of the means of expression is mere routine. Given the proper conditions, it can always be acquired. And probably the conditions of management behind the Boston Orchestra are just as free and liberal now as when Colonel Higginson personally stood for everything. So here is Monteux's opportunity. He is a distinguished musician, with much and varied experience behind him. The approaching Boston Symphony season of 1919-20 should be an interesting thing to scrutinize in detail.

Monteux, who is a Parisian, has been spending the summer at home, seeking new playing material for his concerts, and he returns to us in a very open state of mind. "Now that the war is over," he says, "let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs."

A Friendly Interpretation.

All our great American orchestras are undoubtedly going to be asked to play more American music. Here is another observation, apropos, by M. Monteux:

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French and with Russian music.

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia, but with a style characteristically American.

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

MUSIC IN LONDON

From TOWN TOPICS
Address New York City
Date AUG 28

WITH the sailing of Herr Doktor Karl Muck for Europe last week, I was reminded of the pretty muddle in which the Boston Symphony orchestra finds itself. The Doktor, it will be recalled, charged that politics in the society was at the root of all his troubles, and many aver that Muck knew whereof he spoke. At the present time there seem to be two leading candidates for the post of conductor and Pierre Monteux, who succeeded Henri Rabaud, is not a more likely selection than a Hollander by the name of Mengleberg, who seems to have a considerable following. The Monteux factions aver their man gave eminent satisfaction last season and declare they will withdraw their patronage from the Symphony if he is not retained. On the other hand, it is asserted by the rival group that they will do the same. Maybe the solution is to have two conductors.

Welcoming Symphony Twins

Little Fradkins, 12 Days Old, Have Musical Lungs

little knack for charm which neither the nurses or mother seems to possess, Frederic Fradkin, popular con-ert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenderly took the crying infants from their mother's side, held one on each arm and almost immediately they stopped crying and kept their arms and hands quiet for ne and a half seconds while their pictures were snapped.

The noted musician is constantly at Mrs. Fradkin's side, and many times during his practising in an adjoining room at the hospital will step in to see just how the twin brother and sister, Russell Lee and Miss Lorraine are getting along. Their little cry is his signal to postpone the practising for a few minutes, and with the violin under one arm he fondled the little hands of the babies with the other with such soothing effect that they are soon quiet again.

ne will be twins."
was the rather meaningless re-asually uttered by the photogra-hile he patiently waited to snap
e of the twin sister and brother few days ago to Mrs. Frederic n, wife of the noted concert
of the Boston Symphony Or-

as one of those photographic where the subjects take no whatsoever in the man that the child and says "now look at lie," for those cute little bits of ty persisted in keeping those waving back and forth in front faces faster than any strenu-stra leader ever could do. No would stop them from their
the sharp tinkle of a bell rest their attention for an

took place in a most com-sunny room in the Eliot udubon Road, and among re devising all the

become attentive for at least three seconds were two nurses, Mr. and Mrs. Fradkin and the photographer. Russell Lee, for that is the name of the boy, just didn't like so much attention being paid to him and immediately demonstrated in no uncertain manner that he had a pair of lungs that any 12-day-old baby might be proud of. This new noise seemed somewhat to quiet the sister, Miss Lorraine, but only for a moment, for she too joined in the chorus.

"Great," cried the father, his eyes sparkling with joy and his face wreathed in smiles. "That is real music to me. Nothing weak about those lungs," he laughed. Then assuming the duties of a nurse he went over, carefully picked up the crying infants and to the surprise of the chagrined nurses and mother and much to the joy of the photographer, had them quieted in a few seconds and while he sat down with a baby on each arm, they looking up into his face and smiling, if such a thing were possible for babies so young, the picture was snapped.

The Former Miss Jeanne Tell

No one enjoyed this little task of getting the babies' pictures more than the mother, whose deep blue eyes fairly scintillated and whose delightful laugh revealing two rows of pearly white teeth proved to be the inspiring rays of sunshine which buoyed up the photographer's courage to try for another picture. For let it be said right here that when Frederic Fradkin won the hand of Miss Jeanne Tell, for that was Mrs. Fradkin's stage name when she was appearing in some of the most prominent New York productions, the American stage public lost the opportunity of admiring one of the most beautiful women who ever tripped back and forth on the boards.

The news of the birth of these twins spread like wildfire throughout the musical and dramatic circles of the country, as both Mr. and Mrs. Fradkin are known everywhere, and are most popular with a host of the more prominent stars of the theatrical world. Naturally the incoming mail for the young mother at the hospital has been noticeably bounteous, and it will take her many weeks to acknowledge these fond words of congratulation.

While one watched with interest the admiring expression on the mother's face, and how she just couldn't keep from fondling those little hands and delighting in every move of the infants, it was the constant smile that the father bore which told more than words that the advent of this twin brother and sister was the most satisfying moment of his life.

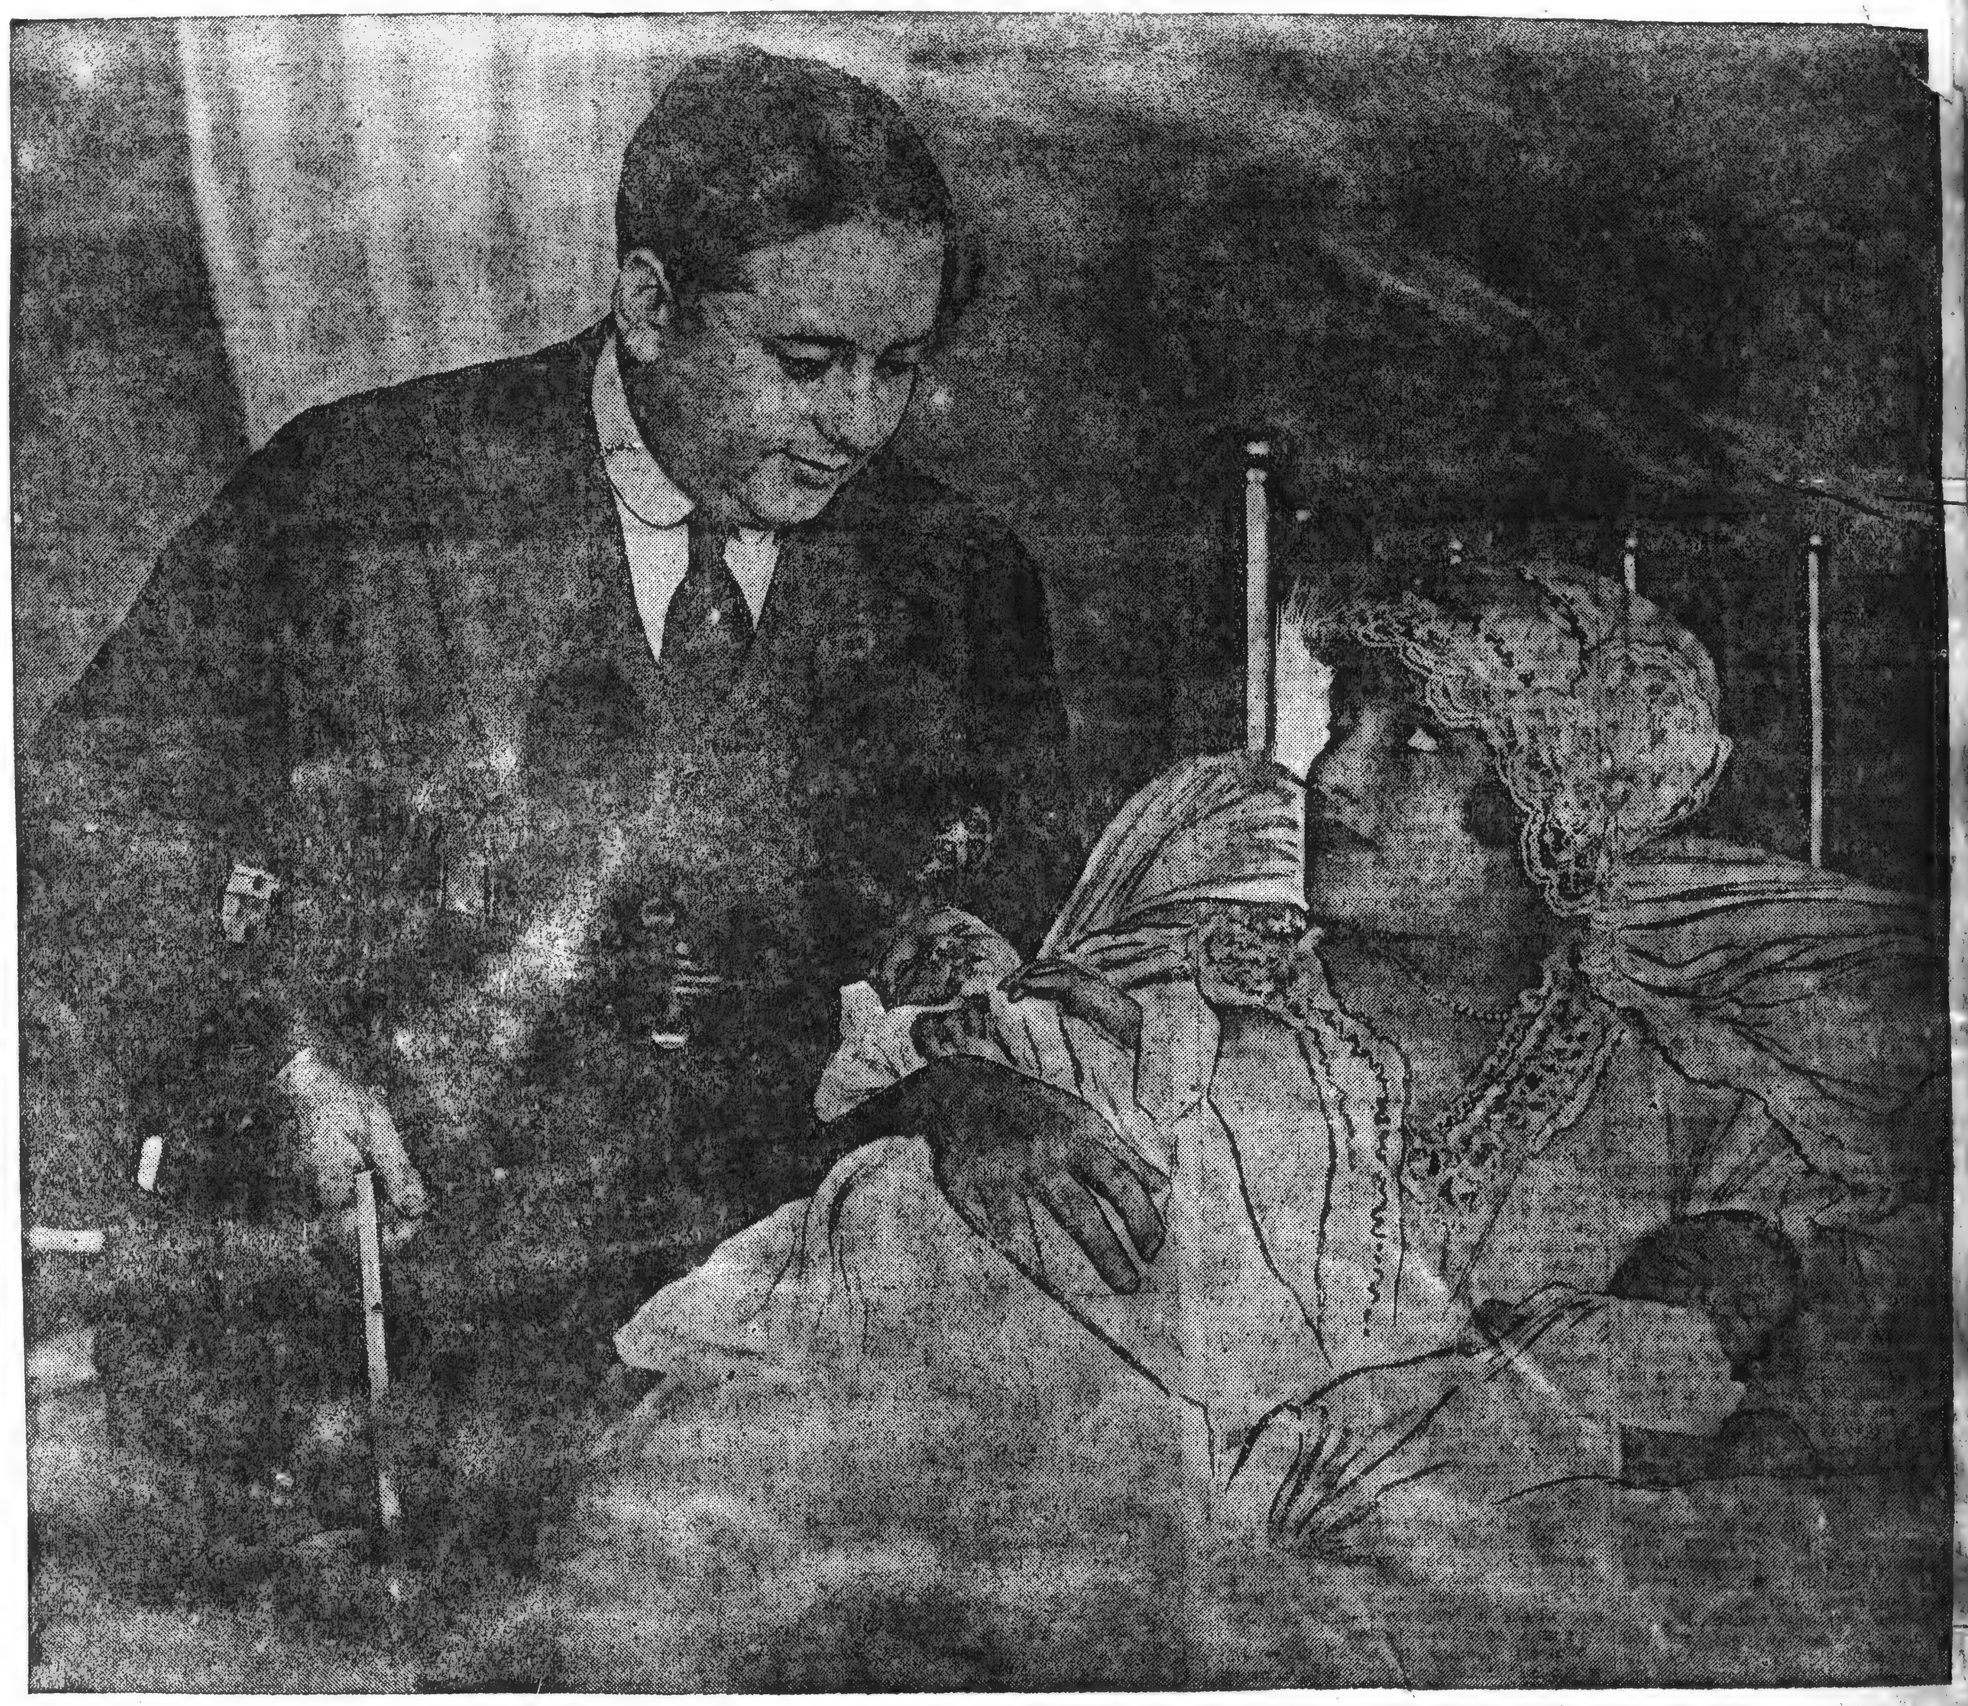
That this is so is most convincingly proven through the fact that he is constantly by his wife's side at the hospital, and they say at the hospital that no nurse could possibly foresee and carry out the wants of a patient with more despatch than he has. However, this does not mean that the noted violinist is slighting his art in the least, for he has with him at all times his instrument, and his practising is done in a room adjoining that occupied by the wife and twins.

There is one thing sure, thought the photographer while dismounting his camera and packing his grip at the end of the task, those infants show the same degree of enthusiasm and life that their parents are so well known for. From what they have already demonstrated, Russell and Lorraine are indeed embryo grand opera stars with a most favorable start. At least they have wonderfully clear and penetrating qualities in their voices.

FILMED AS BOUND

Welcoming Symphony Twins

Little Fradkins, 12 Days Old, Have Musical Lungs



little knack for charm which neither the nurses or mother seems to possess, Frederic Fradkin, popular concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenderly took the crying infants from their mother's side, held one on each arm and almost immediately they stopped crying and kept their arms and hands quiet for one and a half seconds while their pictures were snapped.

The noted musician is constantly at Mrs. Fradkin's side, and many times during his practising in an adjoining room at the hospital will step in to see just how the twin brother and sister, Russell Lee and Miss Lorraine, are getting along. Their little cry is his signal to postpone the practising for a few minutes, and with the violin under one arm he fondled the little hands of the babies with the other with such soothing effect that they are soon quiet again.

ns will be twins."
was the rather meaningless re-asually uttered by the photogra-hile he patiently waited to snap
e of the twin sister and brother few days ago to Mrs. Frederic n, wife of the noted concert
of the Boston Symphony Or-

as one of those photographic where the subjects take no whatsoever in the man that the film and says "now look at lie," for those cute little bits of ty persisted in keeping those waving back and forth in front faces faster than any strenu-stra leader ever could do. No
would stop them from their
the sharp tinkle of a bell rest their attention for an

took place in a most com-sunny room in the Elliot Audubon Road, and among re devising all the li

become attentive for at least three seconds were two nurses, Mr. and Mrs. Fradkin and the photographer. Russell Lee, for that is the name of the boy, just didn't like so much attention being paid to him and immediately demonstrated in no uncertain manner that he had a pair of lungs that any 12-day-old baby might be proud of. This new noise seemed somewhat to quiet the sister, Miss Lorraine, but only for a moment, for she too joined in the chorus.

"Great," cried the father, his eyes sparkling with joy and his face wreathed in smiles. "That is real music to me. Nothing weak about those lungs," he laughed. Then assuming the duties of a nurse he went over, carefully picked up the crying infants and to the surprise of the chagrined nurses and mother and much to the joy of the photographer, had them quieted in a few seconds and while he sat down with a baby on each arm, they looking up into his face and smiling, if such a thing were possible for babies so young, the picture was snapped.

The Former Miss Jeanne Tell

No one enjoyed this little task of getting the babies' pictures more than the mother, whose deep blue eyes fairly scintillated and whose delightful laugh revealing two rows of pearly white teeth proved to be the inspiring rays of sunshine which buoyed up the photographer's courage to try for another picture. For let it be said right here that when Frederic Fradkin won the hand of Miss Jeanne Tell, for that was Mrs. Fradkin's stage name when she was appearing in some of the most prominent New York productions, the American stage public lost the opportunity of admiring one of the most beautiful women who ever tripped back and forth on the boards.

The news of the birth of these twins spread like wildfire throughout the musical and dramatic circles of the country, as both Mr. and Mrs. Fradkin are known everywhere, and are most popular with a host of the more prominent stars of the theatrical world. Naturally the incoming mail for the young mother at the hospital has been noticeably bounteous, and it will take her many weeks to acknowledge these fond words of congratulation.

While one watched with interest the admiring expression on the mother's face, and how she just couldn't keep from fondling those little hands and delighting in every move of the infants, it was the constant smile that the father bore wich told more than words that the advent of this twin brother and sister was he most satisfying moment of his life.

That this is so is most convincingly proven through the fact that he is constantly by his wife's side at the hospital, and they say at the hospital that no nurse could possibly foresee and carry out the wants of a patient with more despatch than he has. However, this does not mean that the noted violinist is slighting his art in the least, for he has with him at all times his instrument, and his practising is done in a room adjoining that occupied by the wife and twins.

There is one thing sure, thought the photographer while dismounting his camera and packing his grip at the end of the task, those infants show the same degree of enthusiasm and life that their parents are so well known for. From what they have already demonstrated, Russell and Lorraine are indeed embryo grand opera stars with a most favorable start. At least they have wonderfully clear and penetrating qualities in their voices.

FILMED AS BOUND

Margaret Matzenauer. Prima Donna Contralto.

SOLOISTS TO APPEAR WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DURING THE COMING SEASON

Madame Povla Frijsh, Soprano.

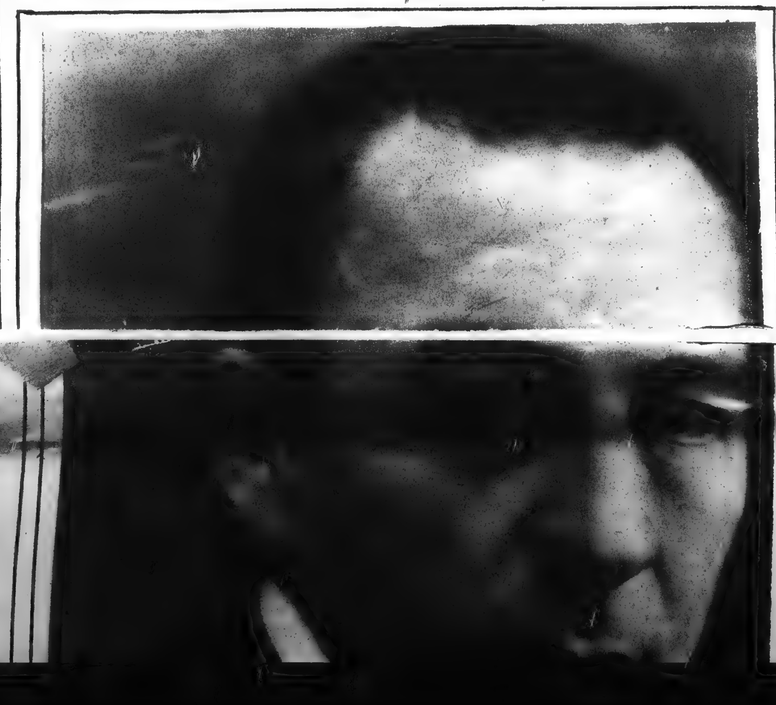
Emmy Destinn, Soprano.

SOLOISTS TO APPEAR WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DURING THE COMING SEASON

Emmy Destinn, Soprano.

Margaret Matzenauer. Prima Donna Contralto.

Madame Povla Frijsh, Soprano.



Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.

Leo Ornstein, Pianist.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.

Albert Spaulding, Violinist.

Rudolph Ganz, Pianist.

Joseph Bonnet, Organist

Alfred Cortot, Pianist.

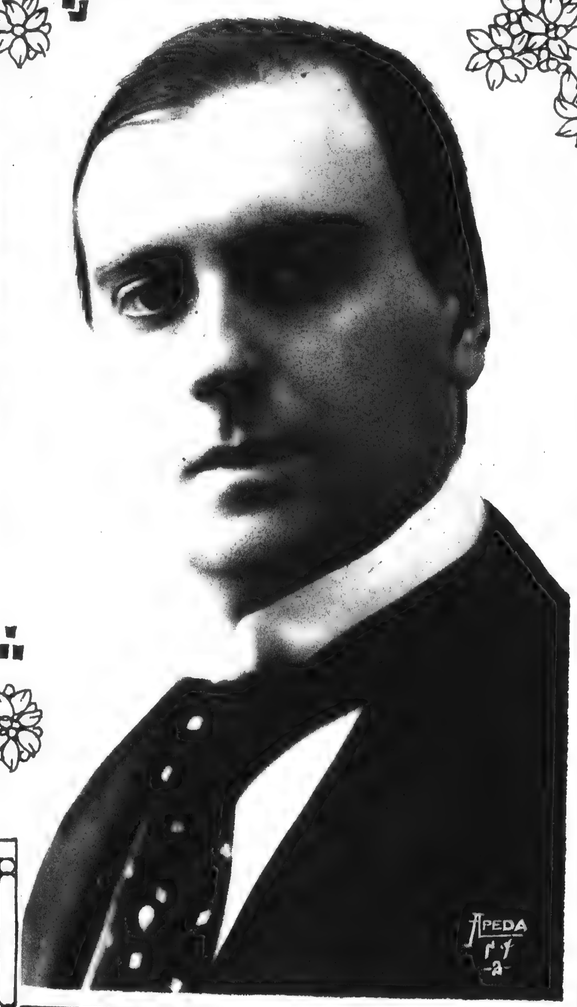
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.

Leo Ornstein, Pianist.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.

Albert Spaulding, Violinist.

Rudolph Ganz, Pianist.



Joseph Bonnet, Organist

Alfred Cortot, Pianist.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1919

TWO NEW SYMPHONY ARTISTS

(Photographs by Horner.)

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading 'Cellist of the Orchestra

FREDERIC DENAYER
One of the Four Best Viola Players of France

SYMPHONY MEN READY FOR WORK

Will Begin Rehearsals for the Coming Season Wednesday

NEW 'CELLO AND VIOLA LEADERS

One of the finest collections of artists ever brought together for the Symphony Orchestra will begin rehearsals Wednesday in preparation for the opening of the season a week from Friday. The musicians have already returned to Boston from their summer homes in response to the call of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra.

The appointment of Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 21 years, to the position of second concert master is the only radical change in the personnel of the body. New leaders have been chosen for the viola and 'cello sections, which have been partially reconstituted since the last appearance of the orchestra.

New Leading 'Cellist

The virtuosi, who have just arrived from France to lead these two string sections, have been well known to musical Paris for many years. Jean Bedetti, the violoncellist, took first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1092, and in 1908 played in the Colonne Orchestra under the leadership of Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. He has also given many recitals in France, Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war, in which he served at the front for 18 months.

Frederic Denayer, who has alzo been appointed to the orchestra, is considered one of the four best viola players ever produced by France. He has been active in the chief orchestras and ensembles of that country for the last 20 years, and has played in several orchestras under Monteux. He also played in the initial performance of Deubussy's quartet, and played opposite Ysaye in Chausson's quartet.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 28, 1

Symphony Starts Rehearsing

The coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, which is to open a week from next Friday, Oct. 10, is well anticipated. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is working busily over scores new and old. The musicians have returned from their various summer homes in Maine, Cape Cod, the White Mountains, the Adirondacks, and a dozen other places, for the rehearsals will begin this week. A full season stretches ahead, of which the 24 pairs of concerts in Boston will be less than half, for the total number of concerts scheduled reaches 110 and includes the cities of New England, the South and the West.

SUNDAY GLOBE-

-SEPTEMBER 28,

Symphony Orchestra Starts Rehearsals

Rehearsals for the new season of the Symphony Orchestra begin this week. Meanwhile, Mr Monteux, the conductor, is busily studying scores new and old.

Most music lovers will be glad to hear that Wagner is to be played at this year's concerto as of old. The Prelude to "Parsifal" will probably be on the first program Oct 10 and 11. Music by Strauss, and other living Germans, is still banned, of course. The Metropolitan Opera is also to give Wagner, in either Italian or English.

The total number of concerts scheduled this year for the Symphony Orchestra is 110, a few more than usual. Besides the regular series in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, there will be a western tour, and various scattered performances in the other New England cities. Every indication points to a very successful season.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 28, 1919

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Concerts, which is to open October 10 is well anticipated. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is working busily over scores new and old. The musicians have returned from their various Summer homes for the rehearsals will begin this week. At full season stretches ahead, of which the twenty-four pairs of concerts in Boston will be less than half, for the total number of concerts scheduled reaches 110 and includes the cities o

Amusement

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, during the season of 1919-1920, its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the National Theater under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 3; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3; Monday, March 15. Pierre Monteaux has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts for the coming season. The following soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio de Gorgorza, baritone; Fritz Kreisler, violin; Sergei Rachmaninoff, piano.

---

n COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE

ress: Cincinnati, Ohio

SEP 14 1919

NOTES.

Sylvain Noack, formerly second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been secured by Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony, as concertmaster for that organization. Mr. Noack is a native of Holland.

BOSTON RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 29,

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that rehearsals for the season will start Wednesday. The season opens a week from Friday.

The present personnel of the orchestra bears no noteworthy change, save in the appointment of Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 21 years, to the post of second concert master, and in the viola and 'cello sections, which have new leaders and have been partly reconstituted.

Two virtuosi, well known to musical Paris, have just arrived in America to lead these two string sections. Jean Bedetti, the new violincellist, took the first prize in the Paris Conservatory in 1902. He played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra where he played also as first 'cellist under three conductors—Colonne, Pierne, and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous.

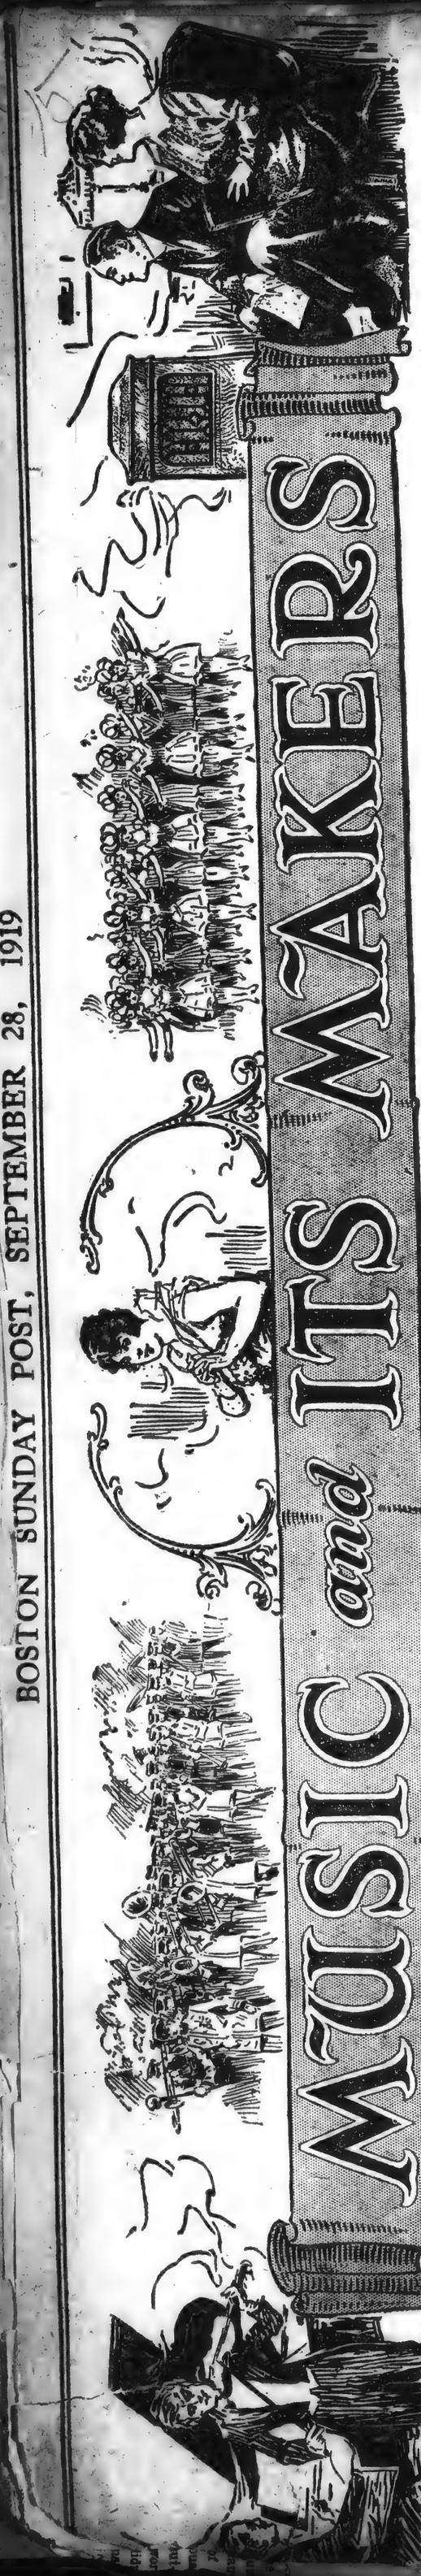
France, which has produced the finest wood-wind players in the world, has also produced four viola players whose musicianship is considered comparable to no other. Frederic Denayer, who has been most active in the best orchestras and Chamber music ensembles of France for the last 20 years, is by no means the least of these. Besides occasional engagements as soloist with the Lamaureuxa and Chevillard Orchestras, he played for 20 years as first viola in the Grand Opera Orchestra, an dfor the same length of time in the Colonne Orchestra.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 15 1919

The name of the new director of the Boston Orchestra is Pierre Monteux, which sounds a whole lot less kultural and more civilized than Karl Muck.—Indianapolis News.



MUSIC IS THE MOST UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE IN THE WORLD—AS A MUSICIAN AND AS A SOLDIER, NO ONE KNEW BETTER THAN I THE NEED OF IT AS A MEANS OF COMFORT AND THE CONSOLATION IT GAVE IN TIME OF WAR—IT HAS NOW AN EVEN NOBLER MISSION—THE MESSAGES OF PEACE—PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1919

TWO NEW SYMPHONY ARTISTS

(Photographs by Horner.)

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading 'Cellist of the Orchestra

FREDERIC DENAYER
One of the Four Best Viola Players of France

SYMPHONY MEN READY FOR WORK

Will Begin Rehearsals for the Coming Season Wednesday

NEW 'CELLO AND VIOLA LEADERS

One of the finest collections of artists ever brought together for the Symphony Orchestra will begin rehearsals Wednesday in preparation for the opening of the season a week from Friday. The musicians have already returned to Boston from their summer homes in response to the call of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra.

The appointment of Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 21 years, to the position of second concert master is the only radical change in the personnel of the body. New leaders have been chosen for the viola and 'cello sections, which have been partially reconstituted since the last appearance of the orchestra.

New Leading 'Cellist

The virtuosi, who have just arrived from France to lead these two string sections, have been well known to musical Paris for many years. Jean Bedetti, the violoncellist, took first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1092, and in 1908 played in the Colonne Orchestra under the leadership of Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. He has also given many recitals in France, Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war, in which he served at the front for 18 months.

Frederic Denayer, who has also been appointed to the orchestra, is considered one of the four best viola players ever produced by France. He has been active in the chief orchestras and ensembles of that country for the last 20 years, and has played in several orchestras under Monteux. He also played in the initial performance of Deubussy's quartet, and played opposite Ysaye, in Chausson's quartet.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The name of the new director of the Boston Orchestra is Pierre Monteux, which sounds a whole lot less kultural and more civilized than Karl Muck.—Indianapolis News.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 28, 1

Symphony Starts Rehearsing

The coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, which is to open a week from next Friday, Oct. 10, is well anticipated. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is working busily over scores new and old. The musicians have returned from their various summer homes in Maine, Cape Cod, the White Mountains, the Adirondacks, and a dozen other places, for the rehearsals will begin this week. A full season stretches ahead, of which the 24 pairs of concerts in Boston will be less than half, for the total number of concerts scheduled reaches 110 and includes the cities of New England, the South and the West.

SUNDAY GLOBE-SEPTEMBER 28,

Symphony Orchestra Starts Rehearsals

Rehearsals for the new season of the Symphony Orchestra begin this week. Meanwhile, Mr Monteux, the conductor, is busily studying scores new and old.

Most music lovers will be glad to hear that Wagner is to be played at this year's concerto as of old. The Prelude to "Parsifal" will probably be on the first program Oct 10 and 11. Music by Strauss, and other living Germans, is still banned, of course. The Metropolitan Opera is also to give Wagner, in either Italian or English.

The total number of concerts scheduled this year for the Symphony Orchestra is 110, a few more than usual. Besides the regular series in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, there will be a western tour, and various scattered performances in the other New England cities. Every indication points to a very successful season

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 28, 1919

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Concerts, which is to open October 10 is well anticipated. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is working busily over scores new and old. The musicians have returned from their various Summer homes for the rehearsals will begin this week. A full season stretches ahead, of which the twenty-four pairs of concerts in Boston will be less than half, for the total number of concerts scheduled reaches 110 and includes the cities of

Arrangement

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, during the season of 1919-1920, its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the National Theater under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 3; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3; Monday, March 15. Pierre Monteux has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts for the coming season. The following soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio de Gorgorza, baritone; Fritz Kreisler, violin; Sergei Rachmaninoff, piano.

h COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE
ress: Cincinnati, Ohio
SEP 14 1919

NOTES.

Sylvain Noack, formerly second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been secured by Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony, as concertmaster for that organization. Mr. Noack is a native of Holland.

BOSTON RECORD, SEPTEMBER 29,

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that rehearsals for the season will start Wednesday. The season opens a week from Friday.

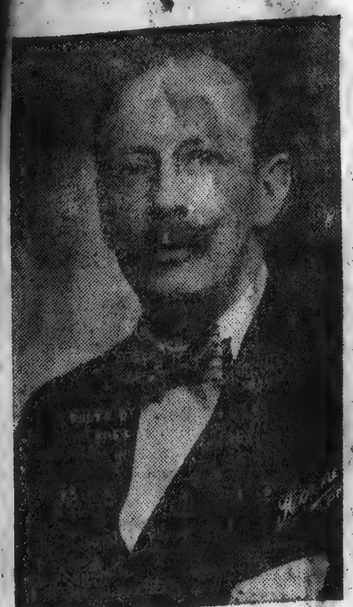
The present personnel of the orchestra bears no noteworthy change, save in the appointment of Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 21 years, to the post of second concert master, and in the viola and 'cello sections, which have new leaders and have been partly reconstituted.

Two virtuosi, well known to musical Paris, have just arrived in America to lead these two string sections. Jean Bedetti, the new violincellist, took the first prize in the Paris Conservatory in 1902. He played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra where he played also as first 'cellist under three conductors—Colonne, Pierne, and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous.

France, which has produced the finest wood-wind players in the world, has also produced four viola players whose musicianship is considered comparable to no other. Frederic Denayer, who has been most active in the best orchestras and Chamber music ensembles of France for the last 20 years, is by no means the least of these. Besides occasional engagements as soloist with the Lamaureuxa and Chevillard Orchestras, he played for 20 years as first viola in the Grand Opera Orchestra, an dfor the same length of time in the Colonne Orchestra.

ON POST, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 29

Symphony to Hold Rehearsal Wednesday



FREDERIC DENAYER,
French first violinist, who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JEAN BEDETTI.
He came recently from France to play first 'cello in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held Wednesday in preparation for the opening of the 1919 season on Oct. 9.

The personnel of the orchestra is little changed from last season. Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 20 years, has been appointed second concertmaster, while the two principal additions are in the appointment of leaders for the viola and 'cello sections.

Jean Bedetti, who will lead the 'cello section, is a most famous French musician. He took the first prize in the Paris conservatory in 1902, and has been 'cellist in the Opera Comique and the Colonne orchestras in Paris. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous, and gave his own recitals in a number of French cities; also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization or Aug 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Frederic Denayer, the leader in the viola section, has been active in the best orchestras and chamber music ensembles of France for 20 years. Besides occasional engagements as soloist with the Lamoreux and Chevillard orchestras, he played for 12 years as first viola in the Grand Opera Orchestra, and for the same length of time in the Colonne Orchestra. In that organization, and in the "Concerts Monteux," he played under Pierre Monteux.

n TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.

RABAUD AND MONTEUX ARE DIFFERENT TYPES

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the charming Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite mental poles.

Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his dreamy gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words; the other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician, the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that are rendered especially attractive by a most winning manner. One could not imagine M. Rabaud making enemies; one could not fancy M. Monteux as making any but friends. The warmth and grace of the South of France, from which he derives his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform M. Monteux's ready smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

om BILLBOARD
ddress: Cincinnati, Oh
ate SEP 13 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in October in its home town. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra, recently returned from Paris, and is now in Boston preparing for the rehearsals. A new symphony by Vincent d'Indy is on the list for the coming season, and German music will also be included in the programs.

Washington, D. C.
OCT 31 1919

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his daughter Benise, aged six. (Photo by Marcia Stein.)

New York City
SEP 20

young folks still more, for they are learning to appreciate not only melody but those subtler things harmonic in which MacDowell is superior to Foster.

There are others who have sounded original and unmistakably American strains; but the two composers named suffice to demonstrate how uninformed is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who declared in a recent interview that American music is not recognizable as such, like the music of France, Italy, Russia. Many American compositions undoubtedly do sound as if they had been composed in Europe; but how about the numerous French compositions which sound as if they had been composed in Germany by Richard Wagner?

And speaking of Richard Wagner, what is M. Monteux going to do about his works, so far as they are available in the concert hall? Will he be allowed to boycott them, as his predecessor, M. Rabaud, did? If so, will he be consistent and boycott also all French compositions which betray the influence of Wagner? According to Romain Rolland, most of them do show that influence. Perhaps some one will enlighten the Boston conductor. Let me call his attention to the fact that Richard Wagner in his political ideals was as thoroughly American as is Woodrow Wilson. What the world war has achieved he demanded as long ago as 1848! On June 14 of that year he delivered a fiery address before a revolutionary society in Dresden, which was printed as a newspaper extra. In it he demanded, besides general suffrage, nothing less than the complete abolishment of the aristocracy as well as of the standing army, and the proclamation of Saxony as a republic! It took the world just seventy-one years to catch up with Wagner's desire that Germany should be Americanized.

To return for a moment to the question of Americanism in music: Personally, I never have the slightest difficulty in recognizing a composition racy of our soil. If M. Monteux will put as many American compositions on his programme as Josef Stransky puts on the programmes of the New York Philharmonic, he will doubtless learn before the season is over that there are things musical which are as unmistakably American as the poems of Walt Whitman, the jokes of Mark Twain or the novels of Howells.

ESTABLISHED 1881 SEP 14 1919
From Morning Telegrap
New York Cit

Boston Symphony Annals.

W. H. Brennan, manager, has just issued bound numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program, 1918-1919. This volume gives a complete record of the thirty-eighth season of America's most famous instrumental organization.

VENING GLOBE
New York City
E SEP 19 1919

LOOKI

Richard Himself Again—Willy-nilly, concertgoers are to have their ears assailed by Wagner this season. It is already announced that the French conductor of the Boston Symphony, successor of that eminent Swiss Dr. Karl Muck, is to display the wares of the great Teutonic master. And there is some grumbling thereat in Mr. H. L. Higginson's home town. It would be a pity, says Philip Hale, the Symphony's programme annotator, if Mr. Monteux in his zeal to please certain subscribers, or perhaps to display a "catholic" taste, should unwittingly become an instrument of German propaganda.

There is this to be said, Mr. Hale continues, in favor of Mr. Monteux's purpose and of any longing on the part of certain hearers: Wagner is dead; dead and buried; he did not sign the manifesto of the "Intellectuals." Yet in the arrogant finale of "The Mastersingers" he spurns all music outside of Germany and shouts, fortissimo, "Deutschland Ueber Alles."

Neither did Richard Strauss sign the manifesto. The thrifty Richard had an eye on the royalties for performance of his tone poems in Paris, London, and other foreign cities. Will Mr. Monteux conduct his music?

Then there is Mr. Felix Weingartner, with his new orchestral works, one of them a mockery of the allies. He signed the manifesto, but he now weeps salty tears, says that he was basely deceived by wicked Germans in Berlin; he didn't know the contents; he loves America dearly. Bruch and Humperdinck are apparently not repentant. Then there are other German composers who no doubt would be willing to forgive America if their music would bring them dollars.

n JOURNAL
ress Providence, R. I. e
AUG 26

MONTEUX, MUCK'S SUCCESSOR, ARRIVES IN NEW YORK

Frenchman Says German Music Will Be Played by Symphony.

[By the Associated Press]

New York, Aug. 25.—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chosen to succeed Karl Muck, interned for alleged pro-German activities and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here to-day on the French liner La Lorraine, from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children. He brought with him the works of several new French composers, which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programmes. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

TRIBUNE
s New York City
D SEP 10 1919

Music

Large Audience at Carnegie Hall for the First Concert of Vatican Choirs

By Grenville Vernon

The postponed American debut of the Vatican Choirs, which arrived on Monday to begin a nationwide tour, took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The backers of the choir surely had no reason to complain, for the audience in size and somewhat in composition resembled those of the Boston Symphony concerts of others days. All lovers of music were there, and holic Church was generously both in its

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.
SEP 21 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

First Concert October 10—P gram Plans for the Season

With its new conductor, Pier Monteux, at hand, and available sea being fast disposed of by subscriptio ade, the Boston symphony orchest s facing a season as busy as it wi e eventful. The first concerts tak place October 10 and 11.

Mr Monteux on his arrival from France made it known that he had music in store for the season of a most varied and interesting character, from which he intends to choose in accordance with American public opinion and taste as he finds them. For this consideration, Strauss is in abeyance, while Wagner will figure on the opening program. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed, Debussy's "Play" and Stravinsky's "Firebird," remarkable modern ballet scores. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned particularly Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the later composers, Wagner, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists at these concerts have been many during some seasons and in some years few. For the coming winter the happy average of 14 have been engaged, including five singers —Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists —Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding and Fredric Fradkin; four pianists— Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

om Evening Sun
altimore, Md.
SEP 8 - 1919

THE CASE OF DR. MUCK

Refusal To Play National Anthem Fatal To His Successful Course.

From the Ohio State Journal.

Few professional men ever came to this country with greater prestige or a more generous measure of public good will than Dr. arl Muck, when he was brought over to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He came to fill the most exalted musical position in the land. He was to direct the greatest musica lorganization hi country ever had. He had won inence and distinguished leadership i own land. He was to be paid t largest salary ever offered a music rector. Back of him were unlimited fortune and social power beyond compart. It offered him an opportunity to round out a career such as few men ever met.

In a large way he made good. No finer orchestral concerts were ever given in American cities than were prepared and given under his direction. He was winnnig new honors when war developed. For a while things went well. No unhappy utterance came from him. In a rich city the orchestra was to give a concert. War was on, every home in the land was giving up its boys to war. There was a patriotic high tide running The public asked for "The Star spangled Banner," an offering to patriotism. Dr. Muck refused, saying such music had no place in a symphony program. Dr. Muck was German born and trained; had been a favorite conductor with the German Kaiser. The United States was at war, a just war, with Germany. The remark was accepted as a showing of hostility to this land. t was fatal. It cost him his position with the orchestra. It caused him to be sent to Fort Oglethorpe and interned as an alien enemy. A few days ago he was deported. He left, saying that, as he was born in Germany, had become a citizen of Switzerland, and was being deported from America, he was a man without a flag, without a country. He is one of the victims of the war, but this country can get along without him.

om POST
ddress: Washington, D. C. te P SEP 21 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1919-20 its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 2, 1919; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3, and Monday, March 15, 1920. Pierrce Monteaux has been engaged to conduct the Boston symphony concerts for the coming season. He is recognized as one of the finest orchestral conductors living. The following distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio De Gogorza, barytone; l violin and Sergei

m EVENING STAR
ddress Washington, D.C. e P SEP 28 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1919-20 five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, on Tuesday, November 4; December 2, January 6, February 3 and March 15. Pierre Monteaux will conduct the concerts for the coming season. The following distinguished soloists have be concerts: Em Ho- me oza, bas ar- ge on tic Gr es. str ess: Detroit, Mich.

NEWS TRIBUN
M SEP 21

New Conductor Plans Interesting Season

PIERRE MONTEUX, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just reached this country from France, with plans for a season of varied and interesting music.

New symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Debussy's "Play," are among the works of particular interest he proposes to produce; and among the older composers the names of Haydn, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Brahms figure prominently on his tentative programs. Tschaikowsky, Dvorak and Wagner are prominent on the list of more recent composers whose works will be played by the Boston orchestra.

Fourteen soloists, including five singers, have been engaged for the orchestra's concerts. The singers are: Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Louise Homer, John McCormack and Margaret Matzenauer. The violinists are: Fritz Kreisler, Frederic Fradkin and Albert Spalding. The pianists: Sergei Rachmaninoff, Rudolph Ganz, Alfred Cortot and L Ornstein. Joseph Bonnet, org will also appe organ

ON POST, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 29

Symphony to Hold Rehearsal Wednesday

FREDERIC DENAYER,
French first violinist, who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JEAN BEDETTI.
He came recently from France to play first 'cello in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held Wednesday in preparation for the opening of the 1919 season on Oct. 9.

The personnel of the orchestra is little changed from last season. Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 20 years, has been appointed second concertmaster, while the two principal additions are in the appointment of leaders for the viola and 'cello sections.

Jean Bedetti, who will lead the 'cello section, is a most famous French musician. He took the first prize in the Paris conservatory in 1902, and has been 'cellist in the Opera Comique and the Colonne orchestras in Paris. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous, and gave his own recitals in a number of French cities; also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Frederic Denayer, the leader in the viola section, has been acive in the best orchestras and chamber music ensembles of France for 20 years. Besides occasional engagements as soloist with the Lamoreux and Chevillard orchestras, he played for 12 years as first viola in the Grand Opera Orchestra, and for the same length of time in the Colonne Orchestra. In that organization, and in the "Concerts Monteux," he played under Pierre Monteux.

n TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.

RABAUD AND MONTEUX ARE DIFFERENT TYPES

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the charming Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite mental poles.

Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his dreamy gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words; the other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician, the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that are rendered especially attractive by a most winning manner. One could not imagine M. Rabaud making enemies; one could not fancy M. Monteux as making any but friends. The warmth and grace of the South of France, from which he derives his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform M. Monteux's ready smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

om BILLBOARD
ddress: Cincinnati, Oh
ate

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in October in its home town. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra, recently returned from Paris, and is now in Boston preparing for the rehearsals. A new symphony by Vincent d'Indy is on the list for the coming season, and German music will also be included in the programs.

ING STAR
Washington, D. C.
AUG 31 1919

Pierre Monteux, the newly engaged conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his daughter Benise, aged six.
(Photo by Marcin Stein.)

New York City

young folks still more, for they are learning to appreciate not only melody but those subtler things harmonic in which MacDowell is superior to Foster.

There are others who have sounded original and unmistakably American strains; but the two composers named suffice to demonstrate how uninformed is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who declared in a recent interview that American music is not recognizable as such, like the music of France, Italy, Russia. Many American compositions undoubtedly do sound as if they had been composed in Europe; but how about the numerous French compositions which sound as if they had been composed in Germany by Richard Wagner?

And speaking of Richard Wagner, what is M. Monteux going to do about his works, so far as they are available in the concert hall? Will he be allowed to boycott them, as his predecessor, M. Rabaud, did? If so, will he be consistent and boycott also all French compositions which betray the influence of Wagner? According to Romain Rolland, most of them do show that influence. Perhaps some one will enlighten the Boston conductor. Let me call his attention to the fact that Richard Wagner in his political ideals was as thoroughly American as is Woodrow Wilson. What the world war has achieved he demanded as long ago as 1848! On June 14 of that year he delivered a fiery address before a revolutionary society in Dresden, which was printed as a newspaper extra. In it he demanded, besides general suffrage, nothing less than the complete abolishment of the aristocracy as well as of the standing army, and the proclamation of Saxony as a republic! It took the world just seventy-one years to catch up with Wagner's desire that Germany should be Americanized.

To return for a moment to the question of Americanism in music: Personally, I never have the slightest difficulty in recognizing a composition racy of our soil. If M. Monteux will put as many American compositions on his programme as Josef Stransky puts on the programmes of the New York Philharmonic, he will doubtless learn before the season is over that there are things musical which are as unmistakably American as the poems of Walt Whitman, the jokes of Mark Twain or the novels of Howells.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881
SEP 14 1919
From Morning Telegrap
New York Cit

Boston Symphony Annals.

W. H. Brennan, manager, has just issued bound numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program, 1918-1919. This volume gives a complete record of the thirty-eighth season of America's most famous instrumental organization.

VENING GLOBE
New York City
SEP

LOOKI

Richard Himself Again—Willy-nilly, concertgoers are to have their ears assailed by Wagner this season. It is already announced that the French conductor of the Boston Symphony, successor of that eminent Swiss Dr. Karl Muck, is to display the wares of the great Teutonic master. And there is some grumbling thereat in Mr. H. L. Higginson's home town. It would be a pity, says Philip Hale, the Symphony's programme annotator, if Mr. Monteux in his zeal to please certain subscribers, or perhaps to display a "catholic" taste, should unwittingly become an instrument of German propaganda.

There is this to be said, Mr. Hale continues, in favor of Mr. Monteux's purpose and of any longing on the part of certain hearers: Wagner is dead; dead and buried; he did not sign the manifesto of the "Intellectuals." Yet in the arrogant finale of "The Mastersingers" he spurns all music outside of Germany and shouts fortissimo, "Deutschland Ueber Alles."

Neither did Richard Strauss sign the manifesto. The thrifty Richard had an eye on the royalties for performance of his tone poems in Paris, London, and other foreign cities. Will Mr. Monteux conduct his music?

Then there is Mr. Felix Weingartner, with his new orchestral works, one of them a mockery of the allies. He signed the manifesto, but he now weeps salty tears, says that he was basely deceived by wicked Germans in Berlin; he didn't know the contents; he loves America dearly. Bruch and Humperdinck are apparently not repentant. Then there are other German composers who no doubt would be willing to forgive America if their music would bring them dollars.

n JOURNAL
ress Providence, R. I.

MONTEUX, MUCK'S SUCCESSOR, ARRIVES IN NEW YORK

Frenchman Says German Music Will Be Played by Symphony.

[By the Associated Press]

New York, Aug. 25.—Pierre Monteux, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chosen to succeed Karl Muck, interned for alleged pro-German activities and who sailed for Europe last week, arrived here to-day on the French liner La Lorraine, from Havre, accompanied by his wife and children. He brought with him the works of several new French composers, which will be rendered in this country, but said that German music will have its place on his programmes. A delegation representing the orchestra met him at the pier.

TRIBUNE
s New York City
SEP 7 9 1919

Music

Large Audience at Carnegie Hall for the First Concert of Vatican Choirs

By Grenville Vernon

The postponed American debut of the Vatican Choirs, which arrived on Monday to begin a nationwide tour, took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The backers of the choir surely had no reason to complain, for the audience in size and somewhat in composition resembled those of the Boston Symphony concerts of others days. All lovers of music were there, and tholic Church was generously both in its

From Republican
Springfield, Mas

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

First Concert October 10—Program Plans for the Season

With its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, at hand, and available seats being fast disposed of by subscription sale, the Boston symphony orchestra is facing a season as busy as it will be eventful. The first concerts take place October 10 and 11.

Mr Monteux on his arrival from France made it known that he had music in store for the season of a most varied and interesting character, from which he intends to choose in accordance with American public opinion and taste as he finds them. For this consideration, Strauss is in abeyance, while Wagner will figure on the opening program. Works of particular interest which he intends to produce are new symphonies by D'Indy and Hure as yet unplayed. Debussy's "Play" and Stravinsky's "Firebird," remarkable modern ballet scores. Among the older symphonic composers he mentioned particularly Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn; among the later composers, Wagner, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists at these concerts have been many during some seasons and in some years few. For the coming winter the happy average of 14 have been engaged, including five singers —Emmy Destinn, Margaret Matzenauer, Povla Frijsh, Louise Homer and John McCormack; four violinists —Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding and Fredric Fradkin; four pianists—Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Rudolph Ganz and Leo Ornstein; also an organist, Joseph Bonnet.

om Evening Sun
altimore, Md.
SEP 8 - 1919

THE CASE OF DR. MUCK

Refusal To Play National Anthem Fatal To His Successful Course.

From the Ohio State Journal.

Few professional men ever came to this country with greater prestige or a more generous measure of public good will than Dr. arl Muck, when he was brought over to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He came to fill the most exalted musical position in the land. He was to direct the greatest musica lorganization th country ever had He had won inence and distinguished leadership i s own land. He was to be paid t argest salary ever offered a music rector. Back of him were unlimited fortune and social power beyond compart. It offered him an opportunity to round out a career such as few men ever met.

In a large way he made good. No finer orchestral concerts were ever given in American cities than were prepared and given under his direction. He was winnig new honors when war developed. For a while things went well. No unhappy utterance came from him. In a rich city the orchestra was to give a concert. War was on, every home in the land was giving up its boys to war. There was a patriotic high tide running The public asked for "The Star spangled Banner," an offering to patriotism. Dr. Muck refused, saying such music had no place in a symphony program. Dr. Muck was German born and trained; had been a favorite conductor with the German Kaiser. The United States was at war, a just war, with Germany. The remark was accepted as a showing of hostility to this land. t was fatal. It cost him his position with the orchestra. It caused him to be sent to Fort Oglethorpe and interned as an alien enemy. A few days ago he was deported. He left, saying that, as he was born in Germany, had become a citizen of Switzerland, and was being deported from America, he was a man without a flag, without a country. He is one of the victims of the war, but this country can get along without him.

om POST
dress: Washington, D. C.
te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1919-20 its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 2, 1919; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3, and Monday, March 15, 1920. Pierrce Monteaux has been engaged to conduct the Boston symphony concerts for the coming season. He is recognized as one of the finest orchestral conductors living. The following distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio De Gogorza, barytone; I violin and Sergei

m EVENING STAR
dress Washington, D.C. e P SEP 28 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1919-20 five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, on Tuesday, November 4; December 2, January 6, February 3 and March 15. Pierre Monteaux will conduct the concerts for the coming season. The following distinguished soloists have be concerts: En Ho- me oza, bal er- gei on tic rs. Gr sti

NEWS TRIBUNE
ess: Detroit, Mich
M SEP

New Conductor Plans Interesting Season

PIERRE MONTEUX, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just reached this country from France, with plans for a season of varied and interesting music.

New symphonies by D'Indy and Hure, Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Debussy's "Play," are among the works of particular interest he proposes to produce; and among the older composers the names of Haydn, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Brahms figure prominently on his tentative programs. Tschaikowsky, Dvorák and Wagner are prominent on the list of more recent composers whose works will be played by the Boston orchestra.

Fourteen soloists, including five singers, have been engaged for the orchestra's concerts. The singers are: Povla Frijsh, Emmy Destinn, Louise Homer, John McCormack and Margaret Matzenauer. The violinists are: Fritz Kreisler, Frederic Fradkin and Albert Spalding. The pianists: Sergei Rachmaninoff, Rudolph Ganz, Alfred Cortot and Leo Ornstein. Joseph Bonnet, organ- will also appear.

ESTABLISHED SEP 14 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

PIERRE MONTEUX DISCUSSES AMERICAN MUSICAL AUDIENCES

Conductor of Boston Symphony Arrives in Hub to Prepare for Symphony Season—Worcester Festival and Other Features.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester Music Festival draws near. Mr. Caruso comes back to New York, and even the certainty of twelve concerts in Mexico at $7,000 a concert fails to lighten his sorrow over the conscription by Italian socialists of his choice wines and viands on his estate in Italy. Arturo Bodanzky, who will conduct a series of important orchestral concerts, in addition to his activities at the Metropolitan Opera House, has also returned. The lists of a number of new singers, five of them American girls, have been added to the Metropolitan personnel. Which means that the music critics, also, have to come back to town and sharpened their pencils.

Mr. Caruso, who came back with Mrs. Caruso and Caruso's 12-year-old son, Enrico, by another union, was explicit in his statements against Soviet rule: "I consider that I was treated shabbily. They invaded my home in the name of the Soviet. Soviet! Bah! What do I care for the Soviet! They were well treated. They enjoyed my hospitality, which I freely gave to my starving countrymen, and then—they steal my Virginia hams! I do not drink the wine myself, but that which was contained in the demijohns was sold—had been paid for, in fact—and I? I am unable to deliver it to the buyers! For that I came away earlier than I expected. I am anxious to come here, where I am not robbed. What they take from you here they take gently and with respect. Ask 'Big Bill' Edwards. See how genteel he is in taking it from you!"

At the Worcester Festival, given in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, October 6-10, there will be five concert programs consisting entirely of works by American composers. This all-American program was omitted last year because of the influenza epidemic. The programs then proposed will be given with a very few alterations and additions next month. One of the important additions will be John Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre," a work which made a deep impression on discerning listeners when it was given for the first time at a recent Norfolk, Ct., music festival. The "Rhapsodie Negre" will be heard for the first time hereabouts. It was added to the festival program at the suggestion of another American composer, himself a keen student of Negro folk-song, who earnestly recommended Mr. Powell's work for performance.

At this festival nineteen American composers will be given a hearing. The big choral works will be George W. Chadwick's "Judith," Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," and Mabel Daniels's "Peace With a Sword." The soloists will be Mabel Garrison, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emma Roberts, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor; Lambert Murphy, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Edgar Schofield, bass; Milton C. Snyder, bass; Frances Nash, pianist, and Mr. Powell as pianist as well as composer. As usual, the Worcester Festival chorus will consist of about 400 voices and there will be a large chorus of children's voices. Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct and the orchestra will be the orchestra of Philadelphia, led by its concert master, Thaddeus Rich.

We found Pierre Monteux conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution, and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosophically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understaid me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere—every time. At the Metropolitan last Winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,' 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You must get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "He is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity. But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. "Men they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors twenty-five years ago, the same joke that orchestral players fifty years from now will be playing on conductors who do not thoroughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke."

MONITOR, BOSTON,
, OCTOBER 4, 1919

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The first concert of the season was given in Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, Sept. 28, by Amelita Galli-Curci and the audience filled the hall just as her audiences have got in the habit of doing. The singer rewarded her hearers richly; she had a good program, with fewer operatic bits and show pieces and more songs, and her singing was vastly improved over the last time she appeared in Boston.

Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have begun under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. The new players at first desks, Jean Bedetti, among the 'cellos, and Frederic Denayer leading the violas, are in their places. A promotion has been made in the advancement of Julius Theodorowicz to the position of second concert master made vacant when Sylvain Noack resigned to become concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Los Angeles. The first program will be given Oct. 10-11 and includes the second Beethoven symphony, Franck's "Chasseur Maudit," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

BOSTON AMERICAN
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4,

OPENING SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the first pair of concerts of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestera season in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen the following program:

Beethoven, Second Symphony; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Poem, "The Cursed Huntsman"; Debussy, "Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia."

TRANSCRIPT, SAT
URDAY, OCTOBER 4,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux as Conductor and a Novel Spanish Piece—Mr. McCormack in Familiar Exercise of Familiar Powers

MORE auspiciously than for two years past, the Symphony Concerts begin anew next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, without change in the routine of either occasion. The orchestra for the season of 1919-1920 is the reorganized band of last winter with a few newcomers who succeed to chairs unsatisfactorily filled or vacated by resignation. The conductor is Mr. Monteux, now established in the post in which he was applauded at two pairs of concerts last autumn. He brings to it well-tested abilities and exemplary diligence and discipline as conductor, an open mind in the choice of pieces, a cosmopolitan career, knowledge of the standard of the Symphony Concerts, a fine regard for it and an eager ambition to maintain it. With reason his audiences are well disposed and expectant toward him. On Friday afternoons these audiences will, as of old, fill every seat in the hall. On Saturday evenings they will be much more numerous than the meagre companies of the last year of Dr. Muck and the vanished year of Mr. Rabaud. By so much has the public of the Symphony Concerts regained interest in them and returned to familiar pleasures. For his first programme, Mr. Monteux proposes Beethoven's youthful second symphony; Franck's tone-poem, "The Accursed Huntsman," unheard hereabouts for many years; Debussy's jewelled prelude to Mallarmé's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and a suite, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz. One and another of his piano-pieces has been occasionally played here; but, seemingly, none of his orchestral music. The impending suite is alive with sharp rhythms, vivid with harmonic and instrumental and full of a true Spanish tang, even though Albeniz was no stranger to the influences of Paris. It is good to find Spanish music, of which audiences in America know too little, making way into the Symphony concerts.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 5,

First Symphony Concerts Next Friday and Saturday

The new season of the Symphony Orchestra begins this week with concerts in Symphony Hall at the usual hours, Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. The subscription seats for the Friday series are, as has generally been the case in the past, all sold in advance. The 505 seats in the second balcony are to be sold unreserved on Fridays for a quarter apiece, as usual, so that the "Symphony Line" will continue to adorn the steps of the hall Friday noons.

Season seats for Saturday evenings are still available, and on and after next Wednesday seats for single concerts will be on sale at the box office.

The first program includes the expected Beethoven symphony, this time the second, Debussy's familiar and much praised "Afternoon of a Faun," Franck's less known symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," and a novel and interesting work by the Spaniard, Albeniz, entitled "Catalonia." This number, like the piano pieces by the same composer, often played here by Mr Copeland and others, is especially remarkable for its vigorous and novel rhythmic effects.

Boston Record
Sat. Oct. 4 '19

Monteux to Open Season Next Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with the concerts of Friday and Saturday of the coming week. For his first program Pierre Monteux, who this year begins his first full season as conductor, will play this program: Beethoven, Second Symphony; Franck, "The Cursed Huntsman"; Alberniz, "Catalonia" and Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun."

First reports were that Mr. Monteux was to have included Wagner on his initial program. Undoubtedly Wagner is only deferred, not entirely omitted from the programs. The Alberniz music is extremely brilliant. In the Debussy piece Mr. Monteux is familiar through performances with the Russian ballet. He should give a highly poetic, highly sensitivized interpretation of this most exquisite work. The conductor chose the great Franck Symphony when he first appeared with the Boston orchestra. Now he again turns to Franck. The Beethoven Symphony is known to all; it needs no comment.

Boston Herald
Sun. Oct. 5

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Rehearsals are already under way. Judging from the extensive public interest, the unprecedented excellence of the personnel, and the distinguished record of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, the season promises to be one of the best the orchestra has ever had. A few season seats for Saturday are still available, but the regular subscription sale closes next Tuesday. The sale of single tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteaux has chosen the following program for the first pair of concerts: Beethoven's Second Symphony; Franck's Symphonic Poem ("The Wild Huntsman"), Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "Afternoon of a Faun" and "Catalonia," a brilliant and characteristically rhythmic work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, which will be heard here for the first time.

Boston Post
Sun. Oct. 5

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wi begin its regular season of concerts i Symphony Hall next Friday afternoo and Saturday evening. The season c come promises to be one of the best i the history of the orchestra. A fe season seats for Saturday are stil available, but the regular subscriptio sale closes next Tuesday (Oct. 7), an the sale of single tickets for the firs concert will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteux has chosen the follow ing programme for the opening pair o concerts: Beethoven's Second Sym phony, Cesar Franck's Symphon Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("Th Cursed Huntsman"), Debussy's famou Symphonic Prelude to Mallarme'

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, will give its usual five concerts at the Academy of Music during the impending season. Emmy Destinn, Fritz Kreisler, Louis Homer and Sergei Rachmaninoff are the assisting artists whose engagement has been announced. The local subscription sale will begin at the usual place a week

TRAVELER, TUES
DAY, SEPTEMBER 30,

OPENING PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will hold the first rehearsal tomorrow in preparation for the regular opening of the season a week from next Friday. The program for these concerts will include Beethoven's Second Symphony; two symphonic poems—Cesar Franck's "Accursed Huntsman" and Debussy's famous setting of Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and for a final number, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

ENING RECORD, TUES
DAY, SEPTEMBER 30

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STARTS REHEARSALS

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold the first rehearsal tomorrow in preparation for the regular opening of the season a week from next Friday and Saturday. The program for these concerts will include Beethoven's Second Symphony; two symphonic poems—Cesar Franck's "Accursed Huntsman" and Debussy's famous setting of Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and for a final number, "Catalonia," a brilliant work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.
ate OCT 5

Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who announced on his deportation to his own country, Germany, that he was a "man without a country," arrived in Scandinavia in the middle of September. It was announced that he has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra this month. The people of Berlin seem to have no doubts as to his na-

Many Notable
To Mark Ca
Beginning

By J. MacB.

Pierre Monteux, who led one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last winter, will wield the baton for that orchestra's first concert on Tuesday, November 4, at the National Theater.

M. Monteux, who on that occasion was conductor by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casassa, of the Metropolitan Opera, will this season be in charge of the Boston Symphony. He impressed Washington last season as a volatile director, using lightness and brilliancy in his interpretations, a gracious Latin suavity in rhythm, but also a keen sense of beauty in the details of his delineations.

Just what programs the gifted Frenchman will present will be interesting. He is said to deflect the spirit of southern France in temperament, thus rendering his concerts an attractive source of comparison with those of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
P SEP 22 1919

A Musician's Sanity.

From the Philadelphia Press.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," are the words attributed to Pierre Monteux, who is about to step into the symphonic shoes of the recently departed Dr. Muck, once leader of the famous Boston Band.

Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly right. In token of his declaration, he can now prove his breadth of mind by incorporating in the noted orchestra's programs some German music. The ban on Wagner in war times, silly though it was, did indeed have some basis in patriotic fact. But the continuance of this policy will reduce lovers of music to hearing all sorts of second-class stuff, when they might be getting the cream of genius.

Let us have Wagner, Bethoven, Brahms and Liszt to the full. The war is over and nothing is to be gained for art by tabooing these men and substituting for them their copyists and "sedulous apes."

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.
P SEP 25 1919

Five Boston Symphony Concerts Announced During This Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, during the season of 1919-1920, its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 2; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3, and Monday, March 15. Pierre Monteaux has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts for the coming season. He is recognized as one of the finest orchestral conductors living. The following distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio De Gorgorza, baritone; Fritz Kreisler, violin; Sergei Rachmaninoff, piano.

TELEGRAM
New York City.
SEP 28 1919

Monteux in Boston.

Pierre Monteux, who's held the French baton at the Metropolitan for several seasons, goes to the Boston Symphony, that's just had a sleepy season under the veteran Rabaud, who has gone back to France and his composing. M. Monteux never showed great fire or leadership at the opera, but he was always dependable and musicianly, and perhaps when he has the strain of keeping the soloists, the chorus and the orchestra together off his mind, and has only his men to think of, he may do some splendid things, and I surely hope he does.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 4 - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra anticipates one of the most successful seasons it has ever had. Exceptional interest is shown in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. There will be five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 5, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17. Tickets for the series may be had at the same prices as last year beginning October 13 at Heppe's, 1110 Chestnut street. The soloists at these concerts will be Fritz Kreisler, Emmy Destinn, Louise Homer, Emilio de Gogarba and Sergei Rachmaninoff.

ESTABLISHED SEP 14 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

PIERRE MONTEUX DISCUSSES AMERICAN MUSICAL AUDIENCES

Conductor of Boston Symphony Arrives in Hub to Prepare for Symphony Season—Worcester Festival and Other Features.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester Music Festival draws near. Mr. Caruso comes back to New York, and even the certainty of twelve concerts in Mexico at $7,000 a concert fails to lighten his sorrow over the conscription by Italian socialists of his choice wines and viands on his estate in Italy. Arturo Bodanzky, who will conduct a series of important orchestral concerts, in addition to his activities at the Metropolitan Opera House, has also returned. The lists of a number of new singers, five of them American girls, have been added to the Metropolitan personnel. Which means that the music critics, also, have to come back to town and sharpened their pencils.

Mr. Caruso, who came back with Mrs. Caruso and Caruso's 12-year-old son, Enrico, by another union, was explicit in his statements against Soviet rule: "I consider that I was treated shabbily. They invaded my home in the name of the Soviet. Soviet! Bah! What do I care for the Soviet! They were well treated. They enjoyed my hospitality, which I freely gave to my starving countrymen, and then—they steal my Virginia hams! I do not drink the wine myself, but that which was contained in the demijohns was sold—had been paid for, in fact—and I? I am unable to deliver it to the buyers! For that I came away earlier than I expected. I am anxious to come here, where I am not robbed. What they take from you here they take gently and with respect. Ask 'Big Bill' Edwards. See how genteel he is in taking it from you!"

At the Worcester Festival, given in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, October 6-10, there will be five concert programs consisting entirely of works by American composers. This all-American program was omitted last year because of the influenza epidemic. The programs then proposed will be given with a very few alterations and additions next month. One of the important additions will be John Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre," a work which made a deep impression on discerning listeners when it was given for the first time at a recent Norfolk, Ct., music festival. The "Rhapsodie Negre" will be heard for the first time hereabouts. It was added to the festival program at the suggestion of another American composer, himself a keen student of Negro folk-song, who earnestly recommended Mr. Powell's work for performance.

At this festival nineteen American composers will be given a hearing. The big choral works will be George W. Chadwick's "Judith," Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," and Mabel Daniels's "Peace With a Sword." The soloists will be Mabel Garrison, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emma Roberts, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor; Lambert Murphy, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Edgar Schofield, bass; Milton C. Snyder, bass; Frances Nash, pianist, and Mr. Powell as pianist as well as composer. As usual, the Worcester Festival chorus will consist of about 400 voices and there will be a large chorus of children's voices. Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct and the orchestra will be the orchestra of Philadelphia, led by its concert master, Thaddeus Rich.

We found Pierre Monteux conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution, and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosophically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understaid me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities that it is a big 'elite.'

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere—every time. At the Metropolitan last Winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mirielle,' 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You must get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right.

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "He is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity. But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. "Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors twenty-five years ago, the same joke that orchestral players fifty years from now will be playing on conductors who do not thoroughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

TRAVELER, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30,

OPENING PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will hold the first rehearsal tomorrow in preparation for the regular opening of the season a week from next Friday. The program for these concerts will include Beethoven's Second Symphony; two symphonic poems—Cesar Franck's "Accursed Huntsman" and Debussy's famous setting of Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and for a final number, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

EVENING RECORD, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STARTS REHEARSALS

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold the first rehearsal tomorrow in preparation for the regular opening of the season a week from next Friday and Saturday. The program for these concerts will include Beethoven's Second Symphony; two symphonic poems—Cesar Franck's "Accursed Huntsman" and Debussy's famous setting of Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and for a final number, "Catalonia," a brilliant work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

MONITOR, BOSTON, OCTOBER 4, 1919

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The first concert of the season was given in Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, Sept. 28, by Amelita Galli-Curci and the audience filled the hall just as her audiences have got in the habit of doing. The singer rewarded her hearers richly; she had a good program, with fewer operatic bits and show pieces and more songs, and her singing was vastly improved over the last time she appeared in Boston.

Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have begun under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. The new players at first desks, Jean Bedetti, among the 'cellos, and Frederic Denayer leading the violas, are in their places. A promotion has been made in the advancement of Julius Theodorowicz to the position of second concert master made vacant when Sylvain Noack resigned to become concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Los Angeles. The first program will be given Oct. 10-11 and includes the second Beethoven symphony, Franck's "Chasseur Maudit," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

BOSTON AMERICAN SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4,

OPENING SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the first pair of concerts of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestera season in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen the following program:

Beethoven, Second Symphony; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Poem, "The Cursed Huntsman"; Debussy, "Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia."

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux as Conductor and a Novel Spanish Piece—Mr. McCormack in Familiar Exercise of Familiar Powers

MORE auspiciously than for two years past, the Symphony Concerts begin anew next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, without change in the routine of either occasion. The orchestra for the season of 1919-1920 is the reorganized band of last winter with a few newcomers who succeed to chairs unsatisfactorily filled or vacated by resignation. The conductor is Mr. Monteux, now established in the post in which he was applauded at two pairs of concerts last autumn. He brings to it well-tested abilities and exemplary diligence and discipline as conductor, an open mind in the choice of pieces, a cosmopolitan career, knowledge of the standard of the Symphony Concerts, a fine regard for it and an eager ambition to maintain it. With reason his audiences are well disposed and expectant toward him. On Friday afternoons these audiences will, as of old, fill every seat in the hall. On Saturday evenings they will be much more numerous than the meagre companies of the last year of Dr. Muck and the vanished year of Mr. Rabaud. By so much has the public of the Symphony Concerts regained interest in them and returned to familiar pleasures. For his first programme, Mr. Monteux proposes Beethoven's youthful second symphony; Franck's tone-poem, "The Accursed Huntsman," unheard hereabouts for many years; Debussy's jewelled prelude to Mallarmé's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and a suite, "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeñiz. One and another of his piano-pieces has been occasionally played here; but, seemingly, none of his orchestral music. The impending suite is alive with sharp rhythms, vivid with harmonic and instrumental and full of a true Spanish tang, even though Albeñiz was no stranger to the influences of Paris. It is good to find Spanish music, of which audiences in America know too little, making way into the Symphony concerts.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 4

Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who announced on his deportation to his own country, Germany, that he was a "man without a country," arrived in Scandinavia in the middle of September. It was announced that he has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra this month. The people of Berlin seem to have no doubts as to his na-

---

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 5.

First Symphony Concerts Next Friday and Saturday

The new season of the Symphony Orchestra begins this week with concerts in Symphony Hall at the usual hours, Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. The subscription seats for the Friday series are, as has generally been the case in the past, all sold in advance. The 505 seats in the second balcony are to be sold unreserved on Fridays for a quarter apiece, as usual, so that the "Symphony Line" will continue to adorn the steps of the hall Friday noons.

Season seats for Saturday evenings are still available, and on and after next Wednesday seats for single concerts will be on sale at the box office.

The first program includes the expected Beethoven symphony, this time the second, Debussy's familiar and much praised "Afternoon of a Faun," Franck's less known symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," and a novel and interesting work by the Spaniard, Albeniz, entitled "Catalonia." This number, like the piano pieces by the same composer, often played here by Mr Copeland and others, is especially remarkable for its vigorous and novel rhythmic effects.

BOSTON RECORD Sat. Oct. 4 '19

Monteux to Open Season Next Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with the concerts of Friday and Saturday of the coming week. For his first program Pierre Monteux, who this year begins his first full season as conductor, will play this program: Beethoven, Second Symphony; Franck, "The Cursed Huntsman"; Alberniz, "Catalonia" and Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun."

First reports were that Mr. Monteux was to have included Wagner on his initial program. Undoubtedly Wagner is only deferred, not entirely omitted from the programs. The Alberniz music is extremely brilliant. In the Debussy piece Mr. Monteux is familiar through performances with the Russian ballet. He should give a highly poetic, highly sensitivized interpretation of this most exquisite work. The conductor chose the great Franck Symphony when he first appeared with the Boston orchestra. Now he again turns to Franck. The Beethoven Symphony is known to all; it needs no comment.

Boston Herald Sun. Oct 5

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Rehearsals are already under way. Judging from the extensive public interest, the unprecedented excellence of the personnel, and the distinguished record of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, the season promises to be one of the best the orchestra has ever had. A few season seats for Saturday are still available, but the regular subscription sale closes next Tuesday. The sale of single tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteaux has chosen the following program for the first pair of concerts: Beethoven's Second Symphony; Franck's Symphonic Poem ("The Wild Huntsman"), Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "Afternoon of a Faun" and "Catalonia," a brilliant and characteristically rhythmic work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, which will be heard here for the first time.

Boston Post Sun. Oct. 5

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wi begin its regular season of concerts Symphony Hall next Friday afternoo and Saturday evening. The season t come promises to be one of the best i the history of the orchestra. A fe season seats for Saturday are stil available, but the regular subscriptio sale closes next Tuesday (Oct. 7), an the sale of single tickets for the firs concert will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteux has chosen the follow ing programme for the opening pair o concerts: Beethoven's Second Sym phony, Cesar Franck's Symphoni Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("Th Cursed Huntsman"), Debussy's famou Symphonic Prelude to Mallarme'

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, will give its usual five concerts at the Academy of Music during the impending season. Emmy Destinn, Fritz Kreisler, Louis Homer and Sergei Rachmaninoff are the assisting artists whose engagement has been announced. The local subscription sale will begin at the usual place a week

---

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
P SEP 19

Many Notable To Mark Ca Beginning

By J. MacB.

Pierre Monteux, who led one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last winter, will wield the baton for that orchestra's first concert on Tuesday, November 4, at the National Theater.

M. Monteux, who on that occasion was conductor by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casassa, of the Metropolitan Opera, will this season be in charge of the Boston Symphony. He impressed Washington last season as a volatile director, using lightness and brilliancy in his interpretations, a gracious Latin suavity in rhythm, but also a keen sense of beauty in the details of his delineations.

Just what programs the gifted Frenchman will present will be interesting. He is said to deflect the spirit of southern France in temperament, thus rendering his concerts an attractive source of comparison with those of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.

A Musician's Sanity.

From the Philadelphia Press.

"I do not think the war has changed people's taste in music," are the words attributed to Pierre Monteux, who is about to step into the symphonic shoes of the recently departed Dr. Muck, once leader of the famous Boston Band.

Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly right. In token of his declaration, he can now prove his breadth of mind by incorporating in the noted orchestra's programs some German music. The ban on Wagner in war times, silly though it was, did indeed have some basis in patriotic fact. But the continuance of this policy will reduce lovers of music to hearing all sorts of second-class stuff, when they might be getting the cream of genius.

Let us have Wagner, Bethoven, Brahms and Liszt to the full. The war is over and nothing is to be gained for art by tabooing these men and substituting for them their copyists and "sedulous apes."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
P SEP 25 1919

Five Boston Symphony Concerts Announced During This Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, during the season of 1919-1920, its usual series of five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The dates will be Tuesday, November 4; Tuesday, December 2; Tuesday, January 6; Tuesday, February 3, and Monday, March 15. Pierre Monteaux has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts for the coming season. He is recognized as one of the finest orchestral conductors living. The following distinguished soloists have been engaged for these concerts: Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio De Gorgorza, baritone; Fritz Kreisler, violin; Sergei Rachmaninoff, piano.

TELEGRAM
New York City.

Monteux in Boston.

Pierre Monteux, who's held the French baton at the Metropolitan for several seasons, goes to the Boston Symphony, that's just had a sleepy season under the veteran Rabaud, who has gone back to France and his composing. M. Monteux never showed great fire or leadership at the opera, but he was always dependable and musicianly, and perhaps when he has the strain of keeping the soloists, the chorus and the orchestra together off his mind, and has only his men to think of, he may do some splendid things, and I surely hope he does.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra anticipates one of the most successful seasons it has ever had. Exceptional interest is shown in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. There will be five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17. Tickets for the series may be had at the same prices as last year beginning October 13 at Heppe's, 1119 Chestnut street. The soloists at these concerts will be Fritz Kreisler, Emmy Destinn, Louise Horner, Emilio de Gogarba and Sergei Rachmaninoff.

PASTE OVER

SUNDAY ADVERTISER, OCTOBER 5,

First Symphony Concerts This Week

HE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season of concerts in Symphony Hall xt Friday afternoon and Saturday vening, for which important event hearsals are already under way. dging from the extensive public terest, the unprecedented excelnce of the personnel, and the disnguished record of Pierre Monux, the new conductor, the season come will be one of the best the chestra has ever had. A few seat n seats for Saturday are still avail le, but the regular subscription le closes next Tuesday and the sale single tickets for the first con rt will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteux has chosen the folwing program for the opening conrts: Beethoven's Second Symhony, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Sem, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The arsed Huntsman"); Debussy's Symonic Prelude to "L'Apres-midi un Faune," and "Catalonia," a brilnt work by the Spanish composer lbeniz.

PIERRE MONTEUX, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PHOTO BY CARO

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 20 1919

HELP THE ORCHESTRA

EVEN before the war devastated the Boston Orchestra the magnificent organization directed in this city by Mr. Stokowski was being regarded as the best of its kind in the world. There is no question now of the pre-eminence of the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is unequaled. It owes its existence to the generosity, the artistic discrimination and the public spirit of the group of men and women who met its deficits in the days when deficits were large and frequent. The whole city was benefited immeasurably by the work of the organization and life has been made richer for innumerable people who at the winter concerts received their first introduction to the really significant literature of music. In Europe the municipalities, aware of the social and educational value of great orchestras, contribute liberally to their maintenance.

Those who gave their money to establish the Philadelphia Orchestra have established a public institution of an indispensable sort. The public ought to welcome the privilege to aid in maintaining it and increasing its prestige. Doubt-

OSTON HERALD, TUE

SDAY, OCTOBER 7,

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The orchestral pieces on the program of the Symphony concerts Oct. 17-18 will be Schumann's first Symphony and Enesco's Suite. This Suite of the Roumanian composer was last played here in December, 1911. Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist.

On Oct. 24-25 the program will include d'Indy's new symphony, "De Bello Gallico"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Liszt's "Preludes."

The program of Oct. 31, Nov. 1: Haydn's Symphony, "La Reine de France"; Rachmaninoff's piano concerto, No. 3 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet, "L'Oiseau de Feu"; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen."

The week following the orchestra will make its first trip.

The Billboar

SEPTEMBER 27, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Has Mapped Out Notable Season of Concerts—Fourteen Soloists Engaged

With the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, and the list of soloists fixed upon, the character of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin October 10 and 11, may already be outlined. There will be forty-eight concerts in Boston, ten in New York, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Providence and Baltimore, concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Toronto, Montreal, Worcester, Cambridge, and other New England cities. The subscription sales where the concerts come in series indicate a record attendance. Probably the season in Boston will equal any in the past, while seats for the series in New York and Washington are sold out far in advance.

Pierre Monteux, the renowned French conductor whom the orchestra has been fortunate enough to secure, has made known his intention to suit his programs to the taste of his new public. "I think it is time to consider music and war as two different things," he said on arriving from Europe last week. Accordingly, he intends to put the music of Wagner on his first program, and consult American opinion on the question of Strauss. Works of particular interest which he proposes to produce are new and as yet unplayed symphonies by d'Indy and Hure; Debussy's "Play" and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," elaborate modern scores written for ballet. He mentioned particularly among the older symphonic composers, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn, and of the later composers Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists engaged for the season number fourteen. There will be five singers: Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in her native Bohemia during the war and only recently been able to cross the lines and sing the leading soprano roles at the Covent Garden Opera in London with triumphant success: Margaret Matzenauer, the glorious-voiced contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Louise Homer of the same opera company, Povla Frijsh, the dramatic Danish soprano, and John McCormack, who can give a very special pleasure singing at these concerts. The violinists number three: Fritz Kreisler, whose emergence from retirement is eargerly awaited, Albert Spalding, the young American, who has made such a strong and increasing impression upon our musical [illegible] also Fredric Fradkin, the c[illegible] whose beautiful tone was the matter of enthusiastic remark last season. The pianists will number four: Sergei Rachmaninoff and Alfred Cortot, the foremost pianists of Russia and France respectively, both of whom veritably took this country by storm last year; also Leopold Ganz, whose brilliance is well remembered by those who heard him with this orchestra in 1911, and Leo Ornstein, the young revolutionist of his instrument, who charms the skeptical with his swift and delicate skill. There is to be also the Parisian organist, Joseph Bonnet, whom the connoisseurs here have come to consider the greatest of his kind, and the [illegible] Jean Bedetti, who is coming from [illegible] to lead the 'cello section in the orches-

Baltimore, Md.
E OCT 5 - 1919

Brilliant Boston Symphony Season To Come In 1919-1920

PIERRE MONTEUX

THE signs of interest in the different cities where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform next season (the concerts in this city are only five out of a sum total of 110) indicate one of the busiest seasons in the history of the orchestra. As usual, there will be five concerts in the Lyric Theatre on the evenings of November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16.

The genius of Pierre Monteux is evidently appreciated from the foretaste of last autumn, when he was offered the conductorship, but was unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, except temporarily, when he conducted the opening Boston symphony concerts here and elsewhere. Mr. Monteux has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season highly interesting and various as to programs and unexampled as to performance. Returning from France late in August, he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He has also in mind several American works of distinct merit. However, he has announced a cosmopolitan policy which will exclude no schools. Wagner is to be permitted, while Strauss is still in abeyance. The soloists at each of these concerts, a soprano, a contralto, a baritone, a pianist and violinist, are surely the pride and choice of their kind.

Two of them, Fritz Kreisler and Emmy Destinn are great favorites of the past who have been recently prevented by the fortunes of war from musical activity in this country.

Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company, no less than Mme. Destinn was its indispensable resource among sopranos.

Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone, will doubtless be eagerly welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts.

Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return.

eral American works of distinct merit. However, he has announced a cosmopolitan policy which will exclude no schools. Wagner is to be permitted, while Strauss is still in abeyance. The great symphonists of the past are by no means to be slighted.

Although notable groups of soloists have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past, surely no group has been more illustrious than the five selected for the season to come. In the first place, the restored peace has broadened the field of choice, and two great artists forced to silence by the misfortunes of war have been engaged. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his retirement, and Emmy Destinn, bottled up since 1916 in her native Bohemia, has just returned to New York.

Mme. Destinn is remembered as one of the most remarkable prima donna sopranos the Metropolitan Opera Company ever had, both from a histrionic and a lyric standpoint. Just before we entered the war she journeyed to her native country, and, unable to recross the lines of conflict, she has been witnessing events hot, heavy and unmusical. When travel reopened last spring she immediately repaired to London, where she was heralded as a true Czecho-Slovak. Every report of her appearances with the Covent Garden opera there tells that she is in the full prime of her powers.

The absence of the great Kreisler's violin has been grievously felt, and the quartet and comic opera which he has written could not replace his playing. His return is the more keenly awaited.

Mme. Louise Homer, the first contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is another favorite among the cherished Boston Symphony soloists of past seasons, whose return will undoubtedly be welcome. The size and constancy of her "following" is explicable in that no other singer has been able perennially to blend the character of maturity with the fresh loveliness of youth, both in her voice and in her person.

What Mme. Homer is among contraltos so is Emilio de Gogorza among barytones, with the difference that he has won and kept his public by the sole means of the concert stage. An American by birth and affiliation his Spanish aristocratic descent colors his voice and his interpretations and gives him a distinctive place among the singers of the day.

The only soloist to return from last season is Sergei Rachmaninoff. His eminence as a composer had long been taken for granted, but suddenly appearing in New York last autumn, an exile from the land of the Bolsheviki, the gaunt Russian unmistakably revealed to musical America by means of a few concerts that Russia's great composer is also Russia's greatest pianist.

ESTABLISHED 1861 OCT 5 - 1919

From Times
New York City

Boston Series Sold Out.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for 110 concerts scheduled this season, of which ten will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual, the New York visits starting Nov. 6 and 8. Also, as usual, the seats for these concerts are engaged in advance, although any wishing to become applicants should write to W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription.

From Tribune
New York City OCT 5 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall, as usual, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6-8, December 4-6, January 8-10, February 5-7 and March 18-20.

From STANDARD UNION
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
A OCT 4 - 1919

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger than any previous season and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities. There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music here on Friday evenings—Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has collected a considerable number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. Regarding the soloists, the restored peace has broadened the field of choice, and two great artists forced to silence by the misfortunes of war have been engaged. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement, devoted to composition. Mme. Emmy Destin, erstwhile prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been bottled up in Bohemia (where she was born) and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the West. When the channels of travel opened she immediately went to London. She arrived in New York a few days ago. Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone. Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return.

Philadelphia, Pa.
K OCT 5 - 1919

THE character of the season of Boston Symphony concerts may already be predicted, for although the subscription sales do not open here until a week from tomorrow, an eager interest is manifest, both in the orchestra and in Pierre Monteux, whose eminent abilities were tried and proved last year when he was offered the conductorship.

There are to be 110 concerts [illegible] of these take place in the Aca[illegible] Music on the evenings of Nove[illegible] December 1, January 5, Febru[illegible] and March 17, for which series ti[illegible] may be had at Heppe's. There will no additional tax.

Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which lies ahead of him. In France last summer he collected a considerable number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. In short, "the best of every epoch and every school" is his motto, and with an extensive reputation for versatile and cosmopolitan tastes, he is well able to carry out such a motto.

Two great artists forced into silence by the war, have been engaged, Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement and Emmy Destinn, bottled up since 1916 in her native Bohemia, has just returned to New York.

Mme. Destinn is remembered as one of the most remarkable prima donna sopranos the Metropolitan Opera Company ever had, from the histrionic and the lyric standpoint alike. Just before we entered the war she journeyed to her native country and, unable to recross the lines of conflict, she has been witnessing events, hot, heavy and unmusical. When travel reopened last spring she immediately repaired to London where she was heralded as a true Czecho-Slovak. Every report of her appearances with the Covent Garden Opera declares that she is in the full prime [illegible] New Y[illegible]

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
K OCT 5 - 1919

—The signs of interest in the different cities where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform this season (the concerts in this city are only five out of a sum total of 110), indicate one of the busiest seasons in the history of the orchestra. There will be five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17. The genius of Pierre Monteux is evidently appreciated from the foretaste of last autumn, when he was offered the conductorship but was unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company except temporarily, when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts here and elsewhere. Returning from France late in August he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He has also in mind several American works of distinct merit. However, he has announced a cosmopolitan policy which will exclude no schools. Wagner is to be permitted, but Strauss is still in abeyance. The soloists at each of these concerts, a soprano, a contralto, a baritone, a pianist and a violinist, are surely th

From North America
Philadelphia, P
K OCT 5 - 1919

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia season will be given on the eve of November 3, December 1, Jan 1, January 5, February 2 and Mar in the Academy of Music. This mark Pierre Monteux's first seas permanent conductor of the Boste list ganization. The soloists engaged for appearances with the Boston orchestra this season are Fritz Kreisler, Emmy Destinn (now Emma Destinnova, thru war realignment of European nationalities), Louise Homer and Sergei Rachmaninoff. It is said that Mr. Monteux is sparing no pains to make the pending season exceptional both in programs and in quality of performance. In France during the last summer he collected a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian, from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius much may be expected. He also bears in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slig the classics, nor will he bar Wag or any great music which the Am can public desires. In short, his pose is to make his programs co politan in accordance with the tation for versatility which stre far behind him in his career u continents. Every nation will b showing and every epoch

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 5,

BALTIMORE AMERICAN,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROSPECTUS.

The character of the season to come of Boston Symphony Concerts may already be predicted, for although the subscription sales do not open here until a week from tomorrow, the sales befall earlier in other cities. Everywhere an eager interest is manifest, both in the orchestra and in Pierre Monteux, whose eminent abilities were tried and proved last year when he was offered the conductorship.

There are to be 110 concerts and five of these in the Lyric Theatre on the evenings of November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4, March 16.

Mr. Monteux, in France last summer, collected a considerable number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new.

The soloists at each of these concerts, a soprano, a contralto, a baritone, a pianist and violinist, are surely the pride and choice of their kind.

Two of them, Fritz Kreisler and Emmy Destinn are great favorites of the past who have been recently prevented by the fortunes of war from musical activity in this country.

Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company, no less than Mme. Destinn was its indispensable resource among sopranos.

Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone, will doubtless be eagerly welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts.

Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return.

From American
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 5 - 1919

PIERRE MONTEUX
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY

PASTE OVER

SUNDAY ADVERTISER, OCTOBER 5,

First Symphony Concerts This Week

HE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its regular season of concerts in Symphony Hall ext Friday afternoon and Saturday vening, for which important event hearsals are already under way. dging from the extensive public terest, the unprecedented excelnce of the personnel, and the disguished record of Pierre Mouux, the new conductor, the season come will be one of the best the chestra has ever had. A few seat n seats for Saturday are still availle, but the regular subscription le closes next Tuesday and the sale single tickets for the first conrt will begin on Wednesday.

Mr. Monteux has chosen the folwing program for the opening conrts: Beethoven's Second Symony, Cesar Franck's Symphonic em, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The rsed Huntsman"); Debussy's Symonic Prelude to "L'Apres-midi un Faune," and "Catalonia," a brilnt work by the Spanish composer lbeniz.

PIERRE MONTEUX, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PHOTO BY CARO

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 20

OSTON HERALD, TUE

SDAY, OCTOBER 7,

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The orchestral pieces on the program of the Symphony concerts Oct. 17-18 will be Schumann's first Symphony and Enesco's Suite. This Suite of the Roumanian composer was last played here in December, 1911. Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist.

On Oct. 24-25 the program will include d'Indy's new symphony, "De Bello Gallico"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Liszt's "Preludes."

The program of Oct. 31, Nov. 1: Haydn's Symphony, "La Reine de France"; Rachmaninoff's piano concerto, No. 3 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet, "L'Oiseau de Feu"; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen."

The week following the orchestra will make its first trip.

The Billboar

SEPTEMBER 27, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Has Mapped Out Notable Season of Concerts—Fourteen Soloists Engaged

With the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, and the list of soloists fixed upon, the character of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will begin October 10 and 11, may already be outlined. There will be forty-eight concerts in Boston, ten in New York, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Providence and Baltimore, concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Toronto, Montreal, Worcester, Cambridge, and other New England cities. The subscription sales where the concerts come in series indicate a record attendance. Probably the season in Boston will equal any in the past, while seats for the series in New York and Washington are sold out far in advance.

Pierre Monteux, the renowned French conductor whom the orchestra has been fortunate enough to secure, has made known his intention to suit his programs to the taste of his new public. "I think it is time to consider music and war as two different things," he said on arriving from Europe last week. Accordingly, he intends to put the music of Wagner on his first program, and consult American opinion on the question of Strauss. Works of particular interest which he proposes to produce are new and as yet unplayed symphonies by d'Indy and Hure; Debussy's "Play" and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," elaborate modern scores written for ballet. He mentioned particularly among the older symphonic composers, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Mendelssohn, and of the later composers Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

The soloists engaged for the season number fourteen. There will be five singers: Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in her native Bohemia during the war and only recently been able to cross the lines and sing the leading soprano roles at the Covent Garden Opera in London with triumphant success: Margaret Matzenauer, the glorious-voiced contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Louise Homer of the same opera company, Povla Frijsh, the dramatic Danish soprano, and John McCormack, who can give a very special pleasure singing in these concerts. The violinists number three: Fritz Kreisler, whose emergence from retirement is eargerly awaited, Albert Spalding, the young American, who has made such a strong and increasing impression upon our musical [illegible] also Fredric Fradkin, the [illegible] whose beautiful tone was the matter of enthusiastic remark last season. The pianists will number four: Sergei Rachmaninoff and Alfred Cortot, the foremost pianists of Russia and France respectively, both of whom veritably took this country by storm last year; also Adolph Ganz, whose brilliance is well remembered by those who heard him with this orchestra in 1911, and Leo Ornstein, the young revolutionist of his instrument, who charms the skeptical with his swift and delicate skill. There is to be also the Parisian organist, Joseph Bonnet, whom the connoisseurs here have come to consider the greatest of his kind, and the cellist, Jean Bedetti, who is coming from [illegible] to lead the 'cello section in the orches-

Brilliant Boston Symphony Season To Come In 1919-1920

PIERRE MONTEUX

THE signs of interest in the different cities where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform next season (the concerts in this city are only five out of a sum total of 110) indicate one of the busiest seasons in the history of the orchestra. As usual, there will be five concerts in the Lyric Theatre on the evenings of November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16.

The genius of Pierre Monteux is evidently appreciated from the foretaste of last autumn, when he was offered the conductorship, but was unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, except temporarily, when he conducted the opening Boston symphony concerts here and elsewhere. Mr. Monteux has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season highly interesting and various as to programs and unexampled as to performance. Returning from France late in August, he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He has also in mind several American works of distinct merit. However, he has announced a cosmopolitan policy, which will exclude no schools. Wagner is to be permitted, while Strauss is still in abeyance. The great symphonists of the past are by no means to be slighted.

Although notable groups of soloists have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past, surely no group has been more illustrious than the five selected for the season to come. In the first place, the restored peace has broadened the field of choice, and two great artists forced to silence by the misfortunes of war have been engaged. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his retirement, and Emmy Destinn, bottled up since 1916 in her native Bohemia, has just returned to New York.

Mme. Destinn is remembered as one of the most remarkable prima donna sopranos the Metropolitan Opera Company ever had, both from a histrionic and a lyric standpoint. Just before we entered the war she journeyed to her native country, and, unable to recross the lines of conflict, she has been witnessing events hot, heavy and unmusical. When travel reopened last spring she immediately repaired to London, where she was heralded as a true Czecho-Slovak. Every report of her appearances with the Covent Garden opera there tells that she is in the full prime of her powers.

The absence of the great Kreisler's violin has been grievously felt, and the quartet and comic opera which he has written could not replace his playing. His return is the more keenly awaited.

Mme. Louise Homer, the first contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is another favorite among the cherished Boston Symphony soloists of past seasons, whose return will undoubtedly be welcome. The size and constancy of her "following" is explicable in that no other singer has been able perennially to blend the character of maturity with the fresh loveliness of youth, both in her voice and in her person.

What Mme. Homer is among contraltos so is Emilio de Gogorza among barytones, with the difference that he has won and kept his public by the sole means of the concert stage. An American by birth and affiliation his Spanish aristocratic descent colors his voice and his interpretations and gives him a distinctive place among the singers of the day.

The only soloist to return from last season is Sergei Rachmaninoff. His eminence as a composer had long been taken for granted, but suddenly appearing in New York last autumn, an exile from the land of the Bolsheviki, the gaunt Russian unmistakably revealed to musical America by means of a few concerts that Russia's great composer is also Russia's greatest pianist.

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 5 - 1919

HELP THE ORCHESTRA

EVEN before the war devastated the Boston Orchestra the magnificent organization directed in this city by Mr. Stokowski was being regarded as the best of its kind in the world. There is no question now of the pre-eminence of the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is unequaled. It owes its existence to the generosity, the artistic discrimination and the public spirit of the group of men and women who met its deficits in the days when deficits were large and frequent. The whole city was benefited immeasurably by the work of the organization and life has been made richer for innumerable people who at the winter concerts received their first introduction to the really significant literature of music. In Europe the municipalities, aware of the social and educational value of great orchestras, contribute liberally to their maintenance.

Those who gave their money to establish the Philadelphia Orchestra have established a public institution of an indispensable sort. The public ought to welcome the privilege to aid in maintaining it and increasing its prestige. Doubt-

ESTABLISHED 1861

From Times
New York City

Boston Series Sold Out.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for 110 concerts scheduled this season, of which ten will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual, the New York visits starting Nov. 6 and 8. Also, as usual, the seats for these concerts are engaged in advance, although any wishing to become applicants should write to W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription.

From Tribune
New York City

1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall, as usual, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6-8, December 4-6, January 8-10, February 5-7 and March 18-20.

From [illegible] UNION
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

A OCT 4 - 191[illegible]

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger than any previous season and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities. There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music here on Friday evenings—Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has collected a considerable number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. Regarding the soloists, the restored peace has broadened the field of choice, and two great artists forced to silence by the misfortunes of war have been engaged. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement, devoted to composition. Mme. Emmy Destin, erstwhile prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been bottled up in Bohemia (where she was born) and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the West. When the channels of travel opened she immediately went to London. She arrived in New York a few days ago. Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone. Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return.

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 5 - 1919

THE character of the season of Boston Symphony concerts may already be predicted, for although the subscription sales do not open here until a week from tomorrow, an eager interest is manifest, both in the orchestra and in Pierre Monteux, whose eminent abilities were tried and proved last year when he was offered the conductorship.

There are to be 110 concerts [illegible] of these take place in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 1, December 1, January 5, February [illegible] and March 17, for which series tickets may be had at Heppe's. There will be no additional tax.

Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which lies ahead of him. In France last summer he collected a considerable number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. In short, "the best of every epoch and every school" is his motto, and with an extensive reputation for versatile and cosmopolitan tastes, he is well able to carry out such a motto.

Two great artists forced into silence by the war, have been engaged, Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement and Emmy Destinn, bottled up since 1916 in her native Bohemia, has just returned to New York.

Mme. Destinn is remembered as one of the most remarkable prima donna sopranos the Metropolitan Opera Company ever had, from the histrionic and the lyric standpoint alike. Just before we entered the war she journeyed to her native country and, unable to recross the lines of conflict, she has been witnessing events, hot, heavy and unmusical. When travel reopened last spring she immediately repaired to London where she was heralded as a true Czecho-Slovak. Every report of her appearances with the Covent Garden Opera declares that she is in the full prime of her powers. New Y[illegible]

Lou[illegible] RECORD
Metro[illegible] dress Philadelphia, Pa. other [illegible] ton Ste[illegible] OCT 5 - 1919 whose [illegible] —The signs of interest in the different cities where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform this season (the concerts in this city are only five out of a sum total of 110), indicate one of the busiest seasons in the history of the orchestra. There will be five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17. The genius of Pierre Monteux is evidently appreciated from the foretaste of last autumn, when he was offered the conductorship but was unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company except temporarily, when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts here and elsewhere. Returning from France late in August he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He has also in mind several American works of distinct merit. However, he has announced a cosmopolitan policy which will exclude no schools. Wagner is to be permitted, but Strauss is still in abeyance. The soloists at each of these concerts a soprano, a contralto, a baritone, a pianist and a violinist, are surely th[illegible]

From North America
Philadelphia, P[illegible]

OCT 5 - 1919

The five concerts of the Boston [illegible] phony Orchestra in Philadelphia season will be given on the eve[illegible] of November 3, December 1, Jan[illegible] 1, January 5, February 2 and Mar[illegible] in the Academy of Music. This mark Pierre Monteux's first seas[illegible] permanent conductor of the Boston list ganization. The soloists engaged fo[illegible] appearances with the Boston orchestra this season are Fritz Kreisler, Emmy Destinn (now Emma Destinnova, thru war realignment of European nationalities), Louise Homer and Sergei Rachmaninoff. It is said that Mr. Monteux is sparing no pains to make the pending season exceptional both in programs and in quality of performance. In France during the last summer he collected a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian, from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius much may be expected. He also bears in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slig[illegible] the classics, nor will he bar Wagn[illegible] or any great music which the Am[illegible] can public desires. In short, his [illegible] pose is to make his programs co[illegible] politan in accordance with the [illegible] tation for versatility which stre[illegible] far behind him in his career up[illegible] continents. Every nation will b[illegible] showing [illegible] every epoch

From American
Baltimore, Md.

OCT 5 - 1919

PIERRE MONTEUX
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Music and Musicians --- Plays and P

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING OF THE NEW SEASON

The Usual Audience Seemingly Well Pleased—The Orchestra Little Changed and for the Better — An Interesting Conductor on His Mettle with an Interesting Programme — Franck's "Wild Huntsman" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" for Unfamiliar Pieces

THE war has ended at the Symphony Concerts. As though, indeed, it had never disturbed them, they began anew yesterday afternon, for a thirty-ninth year. As of old, every seat in Symphony Hall had been taken by subscription; while few were the chairs left temporarily vacant. Much the same also, to the casual eye, was the audience of October in 1919 and the audience of October in 1916—a middle-aged company, that is to say, in which the women appreciably outnumbered the men, among which youth was pleasantly sprinkled, and in which social prestige, social routine and liking for symphonic music were agreeably blended. Again, as of old, this audience could applaud warmly, as it did when Mr. Monteux came to his place as conductor and when he and the orchestra had made their way through Beethoven's second symphony. It was as well pleased with the obvious tonal melodrama of Franck's symphonic poem, 'The Wild Huntsman." Justifiably it did not linger long to clap Albeniz's suite "Catalonia," of a folk-nature, as the stately programme-book put it, and played for the first time in Boston. Strange, however, was its reserve over Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," since by this time the beauty of the music in voice and imagery, is acknowledged the world over while the performance yielded it richly. By these signs, the programme was one that might have stood at any Symphony Concert of recent years, so long as there was a well-read and catholic-minded conductor to choose it. For last token of the end of the war at Symphony Hall, "The Star-Spangled Banner" did not preface these pieces. Presumably audience, conductor and management are now agreed that the concern of the Symphony Concerts is the cosmopolitan making of music for its own sake.

True, there were perceptible changes in the personnel of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux now lead it for the first time as continuing conductor. Yet he might have come to his place from his two pairs of concerts last autumn; while the new comers do not alter—or alter for the better—the quality of the band. Mr. Theodorowicz, for example, was good to hear in the chair of the second concert-master, since by personal quality and long experience, he is both steadying and stimulating to his fellow-strings. As admirable, so far as the evidence of a single concert goes, was Mr. Bedetti, the new first violoncellist, clearly a sensitive musician, alert to rounded phrase and supple inflection commanding, besides, a warm, flowing tone. Other incidental changes, like the return of Mr. de Mailly to the flutes, the shifting of Mr. Mager to the trumpets and a few new hands among the violins, maintain the standard of the several choirs; while, as last winter, Mr. Laurent at the first flute and Mr. Speyer at the English horn shine among the wood-winds. On the other hand, the double basses lack, for the time, the usual numbers and there have been comings and goings among the horn-players. What advantage they will bring remains to be heard; but with an exception or two, the horns hardly match at present the rest of the wind-choir.

Throughout the concert, the orchestra acquitted itself well, subjected now to more insistent rehearsal and exacting discipline than it experienced under the departed Rabaud. Through Beethoven's flowing symphony, its tone was bright and plastic; it kept to Mr. Monteux's quick pace and animating rhythms; songful measures regained not a little of the mellowness of the past; details stood clear for the moment, then fell as elastically into place in the progress of the music. In Franck's symphonic poem, the band missed none of the tonal and pictorial energy that—and not much else—the music seems to exact. It was as fortunate with the rhythmical verve—and again not much else—that is the virtue of Albeniz's piece. Most of all, however, the quality of the orchestra, under Mr. Monteux's hand and ear and in individual prowess, shone out of Debussy's prelude. Strings and wood-winds caught the manifold iridescence, the incessant sensuous tremor, the exquisite suppleness and euphony of their measures. Seldom has the music sounded so luminous, so jewelled. As seldom has it seemed so lightly, surely and continuously woven; or the pure song—for it is no less—of recurring periods so melted upon the ear. With it Mr. Monteux and the orchestra both foreshadowed a time in which there will be less speaking and writing of the Boston Orchestra "before the war" or in like reservation.

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

(Photograph by Garo)

The New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra in Action

As for Mr. Monteux, he may be a conductor of this, that or the other rank in our American liking for degrees, but unmistakably he is interesting. His modesty, his subordination of himself to the task in hand, stand clear. As at the end of the symphony yesterday, it is the orchestra equally with the conductor that he would have the audience applaud. At his work, he is agreeable to the eye without superfluous vehemence or rigid insistence; while the players seem readily and responsively to understand him. A finely sensitive ear, hand and imagination surely ordered the performance of Debussy's prelude, discerning and maintaining the delicate formal outline, missing no play of tonal tint and half-tint, summoning and sustaining the sensuous impulse, the vaporous atmosphere, the half-sportive, half-melancholy fancy of the music—and all this loveliness in flowing fusion.

If it was difficult to share what may be Mr. Monteux's admiration for Albeniz's piece, it was easy to appreciate the rhythmic vigor that he brought to a repetitious music, the frank fashion in which he kept to its homely note, the zeal with which he caught each scrap of the Spaniard's meagre instrumental color. So too, with Franck's symphonic poem, characteristic of the composer when he would be boldly and baldly delineative. It is heavy-handed music, though Franck did write it and Mr. Monteux laid on and spared not. He missed neither the spectral voice of the horns nor the still more spectral voice of the tuba. He kept "The Wild Huntsman's" chase, whether for blasphemous pleasure or under ceaseless curse, in becoming sound and fury. The tonal panorama passed; it had been pictorial, theatric—and the piece is not one whit more. Clearly the new conductor differentiates well, seeks and imparts the characteristic voice of the music in hand. For this Monteux of "Catalonia" and "The Wild Huntsman" was also the Monteux of Debussy's faun in the manner aforesaid and of Beethoven's youthful symphony in D major, "read" limpidly, animatedly, faithfully, ingratiatingly.

The conductor's pace was brisk as Beethoven plainly prescribes; while his hand was light and pliant as the composer no less clearly indicates. The lively motion in which the conductor kept the first movement blurred not a detail. He paced and phrased the slow movement with a suavity and a felicity that renewed its grace and charm. Capriciously, not rigidly, went the playful contrasts of the scherzo; while in the finale, elasticity of rhythm and phrase, light and unobtruded suspensions, a shading here, a shading there of pace or accent, heightened the smiling gayety of the whole. The performance was mirror-like of Beethoven's music in spirit and in truth; the sternest purist could not reproach it; yet at many a turn it was touched by Mr. Monteux's own taste, skill and fancy. It was Beethoven Viennese, even Parisian, but Beethoven never literal, rigid, pedantic, or at the other extreme, over-emphasized, forced, mannered.

In fact conductor and orchestra fared better through the afternoon than did two of the assembled composers. It is possible that Bostonian ears have been overfilled of late with the music of Franck; it is certain that they have had quite enough of, say, the "Symphonic Piece" from "The Redemption" and "The Wild Huntsman" of yesterday. That German nobleman, as he usually appears in the legend, hunted blasphemously, vainglorious-ly, on what Anglo-Saxon statutes call "the Lord's Day." Therefore was he cursed to endless and fruitless hunting. (The wonder is that the Sabbatarian societies have never seized upon him as a horrible example, nay warning). Accordingly Franck's tonal tale is of kin with the passages in "The Beatitudes" that depict the wicked and their works and many degrees removed from the wholly Franckian "Psyche," for example, or the semi-Franckian "Daughters of Æolus." Music of evil is not altogether Franck's trade and writing it, he was prone to take refuge in the ways of Meyerbeer and occasionally of Berlioz, hardly his blood-brethren in imagination or procedure. From Berlioz he might catch romantic intensities of vision and expression; from Meyerbeer he could borrow only calculating tonal melodrama. Of that melodrama from the Sabbath-hymn of the peasants to the chase natural and supernatural, "The Wild Huntsman" is all compact. The composer of the incantation in "Robert the Devil" might even have envied Franck that curse out of the tuba. But a Franck outdoing Meyerbeer at his own game is not exactly the Franck whom the twentieth century hears most gladly.

In no better case was the Albeniz of "Catalonia." One and another of his piano-pieces heard hereabouts have praised him—for fire of rhythm, glow of color, ardor of picture, progress, emotion. Might not his orchestral music sound as well? Eager propaganda in recent years has implied that it would, even fostered the notion that he was an overlooked genius—neglected voice of a passionate and pungent music of Spain. Upon Mr. Monteux's programme goes Albeniz's "Catalonia." The music does seize vivid folk-tune, does quicken it with no little rhythmic verve and occasional flare of fancy. Over and over, however, it repeats motiv and rhythms and scanty is the harmonic and instrumental color that dresses and redresses them. Chabrier, Debussy, Laparra, Ravel, have written far more graphic and characteristic music of Spain and with folk-tune and folk-dance no less to prompt them. Possibly Spanish music, like many another objet d'art, is best made in Paris.

H. T. PARKER

TRAVELER, SATUI
RDAY, OCTOBER 11,

MONTEUX GIVEN FINE RECEPTION

The greatest conductor that ever wielded a baton could scarcely have asked for a more cordial reception than that accorded Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra when he came to the conductor's stand yesterday afternoon for the first concert of the 39th season. The large audience, every seat being taken, made the hall ring with applause until Mr. Monteux had repeatedly acknowledged the tribute. Throughout the concert at every opportunity he was afforded evidence of the pleasure felt by symphony patrons over their good fortune in having such a capable director.

It was a pleasure to hear Beethoven once more. Mr. Monteux's reading of the D major symphony left little to be desired. He knew his music, knew his players and brought out the merits of the number in full measure. He was thoroughly at home with Franck's "Wild Huntsman," but for many the gem of the concert was his reading of Debussy's "Faun" selection. The "Catalonia" suite by Albernitz, given at these concerts for the first time, a fanciful work, would have been heard to better advantage earlier in the program.

The pleasure afforded by the first concert promises well for those to come.

BOSTON HERALD, SAT

URDAY, OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Season Opens with Brilliant Performance and Large Audience

MR. MONTEUX GETS GREAT OVATION

By Philip Hale

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave the first concert of its 39th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a season that promises to be musically brilliant and pecuniarily successful. The hall was completely filled with an audience that was enthusiastic throughout the concert from the moment it welcomed heartily the conductor. Nor was the unusually hearty applause merely by way of compliment: it was spontaneous, a willing tribute to the indisputable talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivalled orchestra.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 2; Franck, symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia" (first time in Boston.)

It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the 24th, not the first.

Of all of Beethoven's symphonies, the second is the least interesting, the least characteristic, in 1919. The first pleases by its simplicity, by its relationship with the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart that preceded it. There are moments in the second that are unmistakably in the incomparable manner of the great Beethoven, but on the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of "Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed." The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful. Especially worthy of praise was the treatment of the Introduction, the Scherzo and the Finale. In the Larghetto there might have been more sustained passages of truly piano effect.

Franck's symphonic poem was really heard here for the first time, although it had been played thrice at these concerts before yesterday. On previous occasions the expression of the supernatural seemed tame, almost timid. There was little suggestion of horror, terror, the demoniacal. One thought that good "Pere" Franck here, as in "The Beatitudes," was unable to express the satanic; that Weber's few measures accompanying the ride through the air of the Demon Hunter and his train in "Der Freischuetz" were far more imaginative than the many measures of Franck. Yet this demoniacal quality is in Franck's symphonic poem. It needed an imaginative, dramatic conductor to bring it out. As the music was played yesterday, the effect was well-nigh overwhelming.

Debussy's exquisite Prelude has been a stumbling block to many conductors. Ever Mr. Weingartner chose so sluggish a pace that the music was lifeless. Even Dr. Muck, singularly fortunate as a rule in his choice of tempi, erred in the same direction. The Prelude was never so beautiful as it was yesterday, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbres, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable.

"Catalonia" was heard here for the first time. The stirring reading did not conceal the inherent poverty of the musical thought and rhetoric. To put it bluntly, this music seemed common.

The piano pieces "Iberia" reveal a finer side of Albeniz's nature. Hearing "Catalonia," one is more and more convinced that the best Spanish music has been written by Frenchmen—Chabrier, Ravel, Debussy, even Bizet, although Spaniards do not accept "Carmen." We have heard records of songs sung by gypsies in Spain that have more "local color"—to use a vague phrase condemned by some, as Johannes Weber, who argued at length that there is no such thing—than is to be found in this rhapsody of Isaac Albeniz.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak's violin concerto (Albert Spalding, violinist); Enesco's suite op. 9.

BORAH'S CHARGES

POST, SATURDAY

, OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY OPENS NEW MUSIC YEAR

First Concert Under Mr. Monteux Gives Big Promise

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first concert of the 1919-20 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience was a big one, and it applauded Mr. Monteux and his men when they finished Beethoven's Second Symphony until the orchestra rose and bowed its acknowledgements with the conductor. There is every indication from subscriptions and attendance at the opening concert of the year, when a good many subscribers have not returned to town, that the Symphony Orchestra faces one of the most successful seasons in its history.

ALBENIZ'S PIECE

Mr. Monteux's programme was very interesting; the Beethoven Symphony; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter"; Debussy's "L'Apresmidi d'un Faune," and a novelty, a movement of a suite, Catalonia, by Isaac Albeniz.

This is the first time Albeniz has appeared on a Boston Symphony programme. Piano pieces by him have been played by George Copeland and others in Boston. Many will be displeased by the music heard yesterday. They will say that it is noisy, vulgar, with instrumentation that is not merely brilliant, but gaudy. We confess to great pleasure in the virile commonness of the dance themes used, with other material, in a way which suggests some popular festival or fair. There is ribald laughter, toss-pot gayety, to the crackling of trumpets and the miauwing of 'celli. A muleteer makes love with a leer to the tavern wench. Costumes which mingle the most audacious and vulgar colors catch the rays of the blazing sun. Jests which are neither polite nor refined are exchanged. Dancers are heavy-footed. The crowd is odorous, but immensely alive. The world roars with laughter.

Lively and Vigorous

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake of varnishing this music or give it a distinction it did not possess. His lively and vigorous performance was in the right vein. In some one of Thomas Hardy's novels a peasant brings in a sandwich which has fallen in the dirt? and as some one begins to eat this sandwich some one else says that honest dirt never hurt a stomach, or words to that effect. Our stomach is not hurt by this music; we find it honest dirt.

Qualities of clearness, simplicity and a musician's understanding of the classic form showed in Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven familiar symphony—a performance which was, however, rather heavy and thick in tonal quality.

Debussy Exquisitely Played

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is a virtuoso study for a conductor, rather than one of the composer's best and most characteristic works. But Debussy of "L'Apresmidi d'un Faune"—what a miraculous master he is! How is it that one recognizes in a phrase of a flute, composed of notes which have been used countless of numbers of times with only slight variations of succession, pitch, etc., by a million composers—how is it that in the hands of a certain one of these composers the notes give us visions of antique art, of forests that never grew, and between their trees fleeting glimpses of the beings whose non-existence caused Keats such poignant and irreparable regret—how is all this? It is the miracle of genius, and that is as much as anyone will ever know of the matter.

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake which many a distinguished conductor has made of taking too slowly the tempo of this exquisite music, the performance of which was warmly applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE-

URDAY, OCTOBER 11

HAIL MONTEUX AND SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Crowd Hears the Opening Concert of the Season

Beethoven, Debussy, Franck and the Spaniard, Albeniz, Listened To

The first Symphony concert of the Friday series was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. There were no vacant seats, and the audience showed its customary degree of enthusiasm in applauding Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

The first concerts of a new Symphony season have always a flavor of their own. Subscribers of former years are wondering who their new neighbors are, and whether the Blanks have bought season tickets. They are curious about the new members of the orchestra, and doubly curious, if there is a new conductor, to see how he compares with his several distinguished predecessors.

They know from the traditions of former years that there will be no soloist at the first concerts, and that the symphony played will be by Beethoven. The audience at the opening of the season, furthermore, to judge from conversations overheard during the intermission, is more interested in the changes in the familiar routine of the concerts than it is in the music played.

Yesterday the new conductor, Mr Monteux, favorably remembered from the two concerts he led last season and from the Metropolitan Opera, confirmed previous good impressions. He was heartily applauded at the several pauses in the program and modestly insisted on the orchestra rising to share the applause after closing the symphony.

Forgets His Audience

Mr Monteux in conducting obviously forgets the presence of an audience and cares solely for securing a performance that shall be what the composer intended. Last year, by leading two programs from memory, he showed his thorough familiarity with the music to be played.

This time he had the scores before him, but no one who did not practically know them by heart could have given so careful an interpretation as his was. Yet there is nothing pedantic about his conducting.

On the contrary, if he errs, it is by making his contrasts too impetuous and his crescendi too sudden. The orchestra gives promise already of regaining under Mr Monteux the perfection and finish in detail it showed two years ago, before the upsets caused by the war. If report speaks true, the new leader is a strict disciplinarian.

The past history of the orchestra has proved that a superb ensemble can be secured only by severe drill, however brilliant solo performers the individual members may be. All things considered, the subscribers have reason to be well satisfied with the new conductor.

Beethoven's Second

The Second Symphony of Beethoven, the first number on this week's program, has been too long familiar to require detailed comment. Those who, like the present writer, love even the faults of Beethoven will always hear it gladly. Others yesterday were heard to say that they were tired of it, because it lacks the profound originality and tragic intensity of the Eroica and the C minor.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the other familiar number on this program, is fast becoming a stock piece. But as its composer's orchestral masterpiece, it deserves that distinction. The economy of means and unerring skill in orchestration shown by Debussy in gaining just the desired effect are a never-failing source of wonder to the listener.

Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" has not been played here since 1911, and was new to many in the audience. It was composed in 1888, and is based on Burger's ballad, "Der Wilde Jager." It portrays the fate of a noble huntsman who commits sacrilege by hunting on Sunday, and is pursued by a pack of demons. This subject suggests Liszt rather than Franck, and the composition sounds rather forced and bombastic. Any work of Franck is interesting to music students, but "The Wild Huntsman" cannot be numbered among his few masterpieces.

Piece by Albeniz

"Catalonia" the first number of an uncompleted suite for orchestra by the gifted Spanish composer, Albeniz, who died in 1909, was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston, though it was composed in 1898. Albeniz, known here only as a composer of vivid and rhythmic piano pieces, wrote very little for orchestra, and never fully mastered the technique of orchestration.

"Catalonia" contrasts interestingly with the familiar "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, frequently performed at Symphony concerts here. Albeniz, a born Spaniard, has the inborn vehemence and "abandon" which the great Russian lacks. But his work wants the delicacy, restraint and technical skill that distinguish Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This vigorous and often melodious number pleased the audience, and would form a desirable addition to the standard repertory of the orchestra. This program will be repeated as usual at the concert this evening.

The program for the next pair of concerts, Oct 17 and 18, includes Schumann's first symphony, Dvorak's violin concerto in A-minor, with Albert Spalding playing the solo part, and a suite by Enesco.

EVENING RECORD, SAT

OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON

Monteux Appears As Regular Conductor

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux, conductor. First concert of the season at Symphony Hall. The program:—

Beethoven—Symphony in D-major, No 2 op. 36.
Franck—"The Wild Huntsman."
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Albeniz—"Catalonia" (First Time here).

The audience was easy to please. There was an air of marked satisfaction in everything that was done. A post-war relief was apparent on all sides. How different this audience from the first audience of last season. That audience was captious of Mr. Monteux, then appearing as a special conductor. It was dubious concerning the orchestra and its future. The house was not nearly sold out. This year Mr. Monteux was welcomed most cordially with an audience that frankly wanted him to "make good." There was not only no captious criticism there was a willingness to admit that everything was right in Huntington ave.'s musical world. There was no national tune yesterday, nothing incongruous in music to stir debate over the necessity of patriotism being mingled with aesthetic enjoyment.

Mr Monteux did everything to increase this feeling of satisfaction. His music had certain definite appeal; there was the purity, the devotion, the joy, the gaiety of the Second Symphony. Who could resist it whether the performance was superlative, fine or simply satisfactory? There was the theatricalism, the bombast, the noise and yet more noise of the easily comprehended Cursed Rider, Franck version. With Debussy's "Faun," Mr. Monteux may have offended the greybeards a little (they still blush when they even think of the obscene ballet danced to the delicious music), but he was on sure ground with the youth and even the middle aged of his audience. Few pieces of iridescent, fine spun, sensitive music have found as large an audience as has this same golden music of Debussy. Last, and to end his program with almost hurdy-gurdy appeal, Mr. Monteux choose the short, dashing, smashing "Catalonia" from Albeniz, known to Americans almost exclusively through his music for the piano. To some, "Catalonia" is a musical cocktail or highball; to Mr. Monteux it is a none too subtle liquor to be taken after the musical feast.

It would be easy to say that Mr. Monteux was at his best in the "Faun," which is most familiar to him through many ballet performance, but this is hardly fair. His performance of the Debussy fragment was light-handed enough but certainly no more effective than, in its way, his playing of the "Huntsman." Certainly as an orchestral coach, patient in rehearsal, he shone in the Franck work. Possibly it was his industry in rehearsal that made the brasses almost as fine in this performance as we have ever heard them on the stage of Symphony Hall; possibly this superb playing was a heritage from Gericke and other master moulders of orchestras.

Mr. Monteux's playing will be more carefully considered from time to time; a first performance should not be the criterion of his work. At this, his first concert as regular conductor, he showed the characteristics that go with a conductor of accepted status: authority, a sure beat (the result, by the way of very little physical effort), a feeling, best shown in the Beethoven symphony, for the balance which next to tone is the most desired of all characteristics in a conductor who has to be heard week in and week out.

The Franck and Debussy works yesterday revealed him to the writer at his best. The Albernitz suite was played with a certain gorgeous abandon, but, even in its less boisterous pages, it failed to always compel the belief that it is intrinsically brilliant. The performance of the Beethoven symphony was greeted with hearty applause. Possibly this was because the break in the program came after the end of the symphony and the audience was anxious to show its appreciation of Mr. Monteux and the men under him.

At the concerts of next week Albert Spalding, violinist, will play with the orchestra the familiar Dvorak concerto. The orchestra will play Schumann's B-flat symphony and Enesco's suite for orchestra.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

OCT 1 - 19

THE THREE ARTS

MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

MAY I call your attention to the crushing musical year? First of all,

The concerts of the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will happily take place on Wednesday evenings, the dates—there are five of them—being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4, and March 16. The orchestra's season this year is to consist of 110 concerts and it is already rehearsing in Boston, for its first home concerts, which are to take place this week. Mr. Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the season to come. In France last summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, from which his choice of new music may be diverse. American works of worth he has also in mind, nor does he in any way intend to slight the classics, but will make his programs cosmopolitan, in accordance with the reputation for versatility which stretches far behind him in his career upon two continents.

Five very famous artists are to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, including two whom the fortunes of war have kept entirely from musical activity in this country—Fritz Kreisler, who has been in voluntary retirement, and Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in Bohemia (her birthplace) and unable to cross the lines of conflict. Mme. Destinn, for several seasons the foremost soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, journeyed to Bohemia in 1916, and, unable to return on account of our entrance into the war, has been witnessing desperate events, will or no, ever since. When the armistice reopened the channels of travel the famous prima donna went immediately to London, where, as Emmy Destinova, she was welcomed as a true Czecho-Slovak, and praised in no uncertain terms for her appearances with the Covent Garden Opera there. The other artists in the group are Madame Louise Homer, the famous Metropolitan contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, the popular baritone of the concert stage, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia. He is doubly welcome, for he is one of the most distinguished artists of our time.

J. O. L.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 6

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, great pianist and composer of Russia, will be the special soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its season's series of five in Baltimore. The organization announces a special soloist for each of these concerts, as follows:

Rachmaninoff, November 5; Louise Homer, contralto, December 3; Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, January 7; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, February 4, and Emmy Destinn, soprano, March 16.

Pierre Monteux will be the permanent conductor of [illegible]

From Union P OCT 6 - 1919

Springfield, Mass.

From Berlin comes the announcement that Dr. Karl Muck, former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and more recently an inmate of the internment camp for enemy aliens at Ft. Oglethorpe, has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in October, but there is nothing in the news dispatch to indicate that "The Star Spangled Banner" will have a place on the program of either concert. The Herr Doktor, by the way, complains that he is a complete nervous wreck as the result of the cruel treatment to which he was subjected in the United States. In the circumstances the German government will seem to be ungrateful if it does not award him a hero medal, or at least honor him with one of the new issue of iron crosses [illegible]

best Fall shade
Yard [illegible]

BOSTON HERALD, SAT
URDAY, OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Season Opens with Brilliant Performance and Large Audience

MR. MONTEUX GETS GREAT OVATION

By Philip Hale

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave the first concert of its 39th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a season that promises to be musically brilliant and pecuniarily successful. The hall was completely filled with an audience that was enthusiastic throughout the concert from the moment it welcomed heartily the conductor. Nor was the unusually hearty applause merely by way of compliment: it was spontaneous, a willing tribute to the indisputable talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivalled orchestra.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 2; Franck, symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia" (first time in Boston.)

It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the 24th, not the first.

Of all of Beethoven's symphonies, the second is the least interesting, the least characteristic, in 1919. The first pleases by its simplicity, by its relationship with the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart that preceded it. There are momenis in the second that are unmistakably in the incomparable manner of the great Beethoven, but on the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of "Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed." The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful. Especially worthy of praise was the treatment of the Introduction, the Scherzo and the Finale. In the Larghetto there might have been more sustained passages of truly piano effect.

Franck's symphonic poem was really heard here for the first time, although it had been played thrice at these concerts before yesterday. On previous occasions the expression of the supernatural seemed tame, almost timid. There was little suggestion of horror, terror, the demoniacal. One thought that good "Pere" Franck here, as in "The Beatitudes," was unable to express the satanic; that Weber's few measures accompanying the ride through the air of the Demon Hunter and his train in "Der Freischuetz" were far more imaginative than the many measures of Franck. Yet this demoniacal quality is in Franck's symphonic poem. It needed an imaginative, dramatic conductor to bring it out. As the music was played yesterday, the effect was well-nigh overwhelming.

Debussy's exquisite Prelude has been a stumbling block to many conductors. Ever Mr. Weingartner chose so sluggish a pace that the music was lifeless. Even Dr. Muck, singularly fortunate as a rule in his choice of tempi, erred in the same direction. The Prelude was never so beautiful as it was yesterday, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbres, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable.

"Catalonia" was heard here for the first time. The stirring reading did not conceal the inherent poverty of the musical thought and rhetoric. To put it bluntly, this music seemed common.

The piano pieces "Iberia" reveal a finer side of Albeniz's nature. Hearing "Catalonia," one is more and more convinced that the best Spanish music has been written by Frenchmen—Chabrier, Ravel, Debussy, even Bizet, although Spaniards do not accept "Carmen." We have heard records of songs sung by gypsies in Spain that have more "local color"—to use a vague phrase condemned by some, as Johannes Weber, who argued at length that there is no such thing—than is to be found in this rhapsody of Isaac Albeniz.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak's violin concerto (Albert Spalding, violinist); Enesco's Suite op. 9.

POST, SATURDAY
, OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY OPENS NEW MUSIC YEAR

First Concert Under Mr. Monteux Gives Big Promise

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first concert of the 1919-20 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience was a big one, and it applauded Mr. Monteux and his men when they finished Beethoven's Second Symphony until the orchestra rose and bowed its acknowledgements with the conductor. There is every indication from subscriptions and attendance at the opening concert of the year, when a good many subscribers have not returned to town, that the Symphony Orchestra faces one of the most successful seasons in its history.

ALBENIZ'S PIECE

Mr. Monteux's programme was very interesting; the Beethoven Symphony; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter"; Debussy's "L'Apresmidi d'un Faune," and a novelty, a movement of a suite, Catalonia, by Isaac Albeniz.

This is the first time Albeniz has appeared on a Boston Symphony programme. Piano pieces by him have been played by George Copeland and others in Boston. Many will be displeased by the music heard yesterday. They will say that it is noisy, vulgar, with instrumentation that is not merely brilliant, but gaudy. We confess to great pleasure in the virile commonness of the dance themes used, with other material, in a way which suggests some popular festival or fair. There is ribald laughter, toss-pot gayety, to the crackling of trumpets and the miauwing of 'celli. A muleteer makes love with a leer to the tavern wench. Costumes which mingle the most audacious and vulgar colors catch the rays of the blazing sun. Jests which are neither polite nor refined are exchanged. Dancers are heavy-footed. The crowd is odorous, but immensely alive. The world roars with laughter.

Lively and Vigorous

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake of varnishing this music or give it a distinction it did not possess. His lively and vigorous performance was in the right vein. In some one of Thomas Hardy's novels a peasant brings in a sandwich which has fallen in the dirt? and as some one begins to eat this sandwich some one else says that honest dirt never hurt a stomach, or words to that effect. Our stomach is not hurt by this music; we find it honest dirt.

Qualities of clearness, simplicity and a musician's understanding of the classic form showed in Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven familiar symphony—a performance which was, however, rather heavy and thick in tonal quality.

Debussy Exquisitely Played

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is a virtuoso study for a conductor, rather than one of the composer's best and most characteristic works. But Debussy of "L'Apresmidi d'un Faune"—what a miraculous master he is! How is it that one recognizes in a phrase of a flute, composed of notes which have been used countless of numbers of times with only slight variations of succession, pitch, etc., by a million composers—how is it that in the hands of a certain one of these composers the notes give us visions of antique art, of forests that never grew, and between their trees fleeting glimpses of the beings whose non-existence caused Keats such poignant and irreparable regret—how is all this? It is the miracle of genius, and that is as much as anyone will ever know of the matter.

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake which many a distinguished conductor has made of taking too slowly the tempo of this exquisite music, the performance of which was warmly applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE-
URDAY, OCTOBER 11

HAIL MONTEUX AND SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Crowd Hears the Opening Concert of the Season

Beethoven, Debussy, Franck and the Spaniard, Albeniz, Listened To

The first Symphony concert of the Friday series was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. There were no vacant seats, and the audience showed its customary degree of enthusiasm in applauding Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

The first concerts of a new Symphony season have always a flavor of their own. Subscribers of former years are wondering who their new neighbors are, and whether the Blanks have bought season tickets. They are curious about the new members of the orchestra, and doubly curious, if there is a new conductor, to see how he compares with his several distinguished predecessors.

They know from the traditions of former years that there will be no soloist at the first concerts, and that the symphony played will be by Beethoven. The audience at the opening of the season, furthermore, to judge from conversations overheard during the intermission, is more interested in the changes in the familiar routine of the concerts than it is in the music played.

Yesterday the new conductor, Mr Monteux, favorably remembered from the two concerts he led last season and from the Metropolitan Opera, confirmed previous good impressions. He was heartily applauded at the several pauses in the program and modestly insisted on the orchestra rising to share the applause after closing the symphony.

Forgets His Audience

Mr Monteux in conducting obviously forgets the presence of an audience and cares solely for securing a performance that shall be what the composer intended. Last year, by leading two programs from memory, he showed his thorough familiarity with the music to be played.

This time he had the scores before him, but no one who did not practically know them by heart could have given so careful an interpretation as his was. Yet there is nothing pedantic about his conducting.

On the contrary, if he errs, it is by making his contrasts too impetuous and his crescendi too sudden. The orchestra gives promise already of regaining under Mr Monteux the perfection and finish in detail it showed two years ago, before the upsets caused by the war. If report speaks true, the new leader is a strict disciplinarian.

The past history of the orchestra has proved that a superb ensemble can be secured only by severe drill, however brilliant solo performers the individual members may be. All things considered, the subscribers have reason to be well satisfied with the new conductor.

Beethoven's Second

The Second Symphony of Beethoven, the first number on this week's program, has been too long familiar to require detailed comment. Those who, like the present writer, love even the faults of Beethoven will always hear it gladly. Others yesterday were heard to say that they were tired of it, because it lacks the profound originality and tragic intensity of the Eroica and the C minor.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the other familiar number on this program, is fast becoming a stock piece. But as its composer's orchestral masterpiece, it deserves that distinction. The economy of means and unerring skill in orchestration shown by Debussy in gaining just the desired effect are a never-failing source of wonder to the listener.

Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" has not been played here since 1911, and was new to many in the audience. It was composed in 1888, and is based on Burger's ballad, "Der Wilde Jager." It portrays the fate of a noble huntsman who commits sacrilege by hunting on Sunday, and is pursued by a pack of demons. This subject suggests Liszt rather than Franck, and the composition sounds rather forced and bombastic. Any work of Franck is interesting to music students, but "The Wild Huntsman" cannot be numbered among his few masterpieces.

Piece by Albeniz

"Catalonia" the first number of an uncompleted suite for orchestra by the gifted Spanish composer, Albeniz, who died in 1909, was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston, though it was composed in 1898. Albeniz, known here only as a composer of vivid and rhythmic piano pieces, wrote very little for orchestra, and never fully mastered the technique of orchestration.

"Catalonia" contrasts interestingly with the familiar "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, frequently performed at Symphony concerts here. Albeniz, a born Spaniard, has the inborn vehemence and "abandon" which the great Russian lacks. But his work wants the delicacy, restraint and technical skill that distinguish Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This vigorous and often melodious number pleased the audience, and would form a desirable addition to the standard repertory of the orchestra. This program will be repeated as usual at the concert this evening.

The program for the next pair of concerts, Oct 17 and 18, includes Schumann's first symphony, Dvorak's violin concerto in A-minor, with Albert Spalding playing the solo part, and a suite by Enesco.

EVENING RECORD, SAT
OCTOBER 11,

SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON

Monteux Appears As Regular Conductor

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux, conductor. First concert of the season at Symphony Hall. The program:—

Beethoven—Symphony in D-major, No 2 op. 36.
Franck—"The Wild Huntsman."
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Albeniz—"Catalonia" (First Time here).

The audience was easy to please. There was an air of marked satisfaction in everything that was done. A post-war relief was apparent on all sides. How different this audience from the first audience of last season! That audience was captious of Mr. Monteux, then appearing as a special conductor. It was dubious concerning the orchestra and its future. The house was not nearly sold out. This year Mr. Monteux was welcomed most cordially with an audience that frankly wanted him to "make good." There was not only no captious criticism there was a willingness to admit that everything was right in Huntington Ave.'s musical world. There was no national tune yesterday, nothing incongruous in music to stir debate over the necessity of patriotism being mingled with aesthetic enjoyment.

Mr Monteux did everything to increase this feeling of satisfaction. His music had certain definite appeal; there was the purity, the devotion, the joy, the gaiety of the Second Symphony. Who could resist it whether the performance was superlatively fine or simply satisfactory? There was the theatricalism, the bombast, the noise and yet more noise of the easily comprehended Cursed Rider. Franck version. With Debussy's "Faun," Mr. Monteux may have offended the greybeards a little (they still blush when they even think of the obscene ballet danced to the delicious music), but he was on sure ground with the youth and even the middle aged of his audience. Few pieces of iridescent, fine spun, sensitive music have found so large an audience as has this same golden music of Debussy. Last, and to end his program with almost hurdy-gurdy appeal, Mr. Monteux choose the short, dashing, smashing "Catalonia" from Albeniz, known to Americans almost exclusively through his music for the piano. To some, "Catalonia" is a musical cocktail or highball; to Mr. Monteux it is a none too subtle liquor to be taken after the musical feast.

It would be easy to say that Mr. Monteux was at his best in the "Faun," which is most familiar to him through many ballet performance, but this is hardly fair. His performance of the Debussy fragment was light-handed enough but certainly no more effective than, in its way, his playing of the "Huntsman." Certainly as an orchestral coach, patient in rehearsal, he shone in the Franck work. Possibly it was his industry in rehearsal that made the brasses almost as fine in this performance as we have ever heard them on the stage of Symphony Hall; possibly this superb playing was a heritage from Gericke and other master moulders of orchestras.

Mr. Monteux's playing will be more carefully considered from time to time; a first performance should not be the criterion of his work. At this, his first concert as regular conductor, he showed the characteristics that go with a conductor of accepted status: authority, a sure beat (the result, by the way of very little physical effort), a feeling, best shown in the Beethoven symphony, for the balance which next to tone is the most desired of all characteristics in a conductor who has to be heard week in and week out.

The Franck and Debussy works yesterday revealed him to the writer at his best. The Albernitz suite was played with a certain gorgeous abandon, but, even in its less boisterous pages, it failed to always compel the belief that it is intrinsically brilliant. The performance of the Beethoven symphony was greeted with hearty applause. Possibly this was because the break in the program came after the end of the symphony and the audience was anxious to show its appreciation of Mr. Monteux and the men under him.

At the concerts of next week Albert Spalding, violinist, will play with the orchestra the familiar Dvorak concerto. The orchestra will play Schumann's B-flat symphony and Enesco's suite for orchestra.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 1 - 19

THE THREE ARTS

MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

MAY I call your attention to the onrushing musical year? First of all,

The concerts of the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will happily take place on Wednesday evenings, the dates—there are five of them—being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4, and March 16. The orchestra's season this year is to consist of 110 concerts and it is already rehearsing in Boston, for its first home concerts, which are to take place this week. Mr. Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the season to come. In France last summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, from which his choice of new music may be diverse. American works of worth he has also in mind, nor does he in any way intend to slight the classics, but will make his programs cosmopolitan, in accordance with the reputation for versatility which stretches far behind him in his career upon two continents.

Five very famous artists are to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, including two whom the fortunes of war have kept entirely from musical activity in this country—Fritz Kreisler, who has been in voluntary retirement, and Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in Bohemia (her birthplace) and unable to cross the lines of conflict. Mme. Destinn, for several seasons the foremost soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, journeyed to Bohemia in 1916, and, unable to return on account of our entrance into the war, has been witnessing desperate events, will or no, ever since. When the armistice reopened the channels of travel the famous prima donna went immediately to London, where, as Emmy Destinova, she was welcomed as a true Czecho-Slovak, and praised in no uncertain terms for her appearances with the Covent Garden Opera there. The other artists in the group are Madame Louise Homer, the famous Metropolitan contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, the popular baritone of the concert stage, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia. He is doubly welcome, for he is one of the most distinguished artists of our time.

J. O. L.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 6 19

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, great pianist and composer of Russia, will be the special soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its season's series of five in Baltimore. The organization announces a special soloist for each of these concerts, as follows:

Rachmaninoff, November 5; Louise Homer, contralto, December 3; Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, January 7; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, February 4, and Emmy Destinn, soprano, March 16.

Pierre Monteux will be the permanent conductor of the

From Union
Springfield, Mass.
OCT 6 - 1919

From Berlin comes the announcement that Dr. Karl Muck, former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and more recently an inmate of the internment camp for enemy aliens at Ft. Oglethorpe, has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in October, but there is nothing in the news dispatch to indicate that "The Star Spangled Banner" will have a place on the program of either concert. The Herr Doktor, by the way, complains that he is a complete nervous wreck as the result of the cruel treatment to which he was subjected in the United States. In the circumstances the German government will seem to be ungrateful if it does not award him a hero medal, or at least honor him with one of the new issue of iron crosses [illegible] returned

BORAH'S CHARGES

best Fall shade
Yard W...
(2nd Floor)

Hare,
Debuss vinsky'
return and possibly Richard St

ONITOR, BOSTON,

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1

MUSIC

Boston Season Begun

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is the prerogative always of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give official sanction to the opening in Boston of another musical season. True, there may first be a scattering concert or two, as has been the case this year, but nobody considers the season really begun until the first of the series of 24 symphony concerts has been given.

The Boston season is now officially open. Pierre Monteux, cordially but decorously applauded as he came on to the stage, has led his men through a program comprising Beethoven's second symphony, César Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" suite; has made his impression, favorable and otherwise, on the Friday afternoon audience, and has been duly compared with predecessors.

In some respects Mr. Monteux' task in presenting the first concert this year was not so great as it was last year, when the orchestra was more or less disorganized. A greater proportion of the old players is here now than then. Then, too, these men have had the benefit of a season's work with Mr. Rabaud, who, it may be presumed, was an exponent of the style of conducting and program making which Mr. Monteux will follow. However, last year it was a temporary position; now it is for a year. And to a certain extent, whether it is wise or fair or just, or not, the audience cannot help making a little forecast of the 23 concerts to come from the one it heard on Friday.

The Beethoven symphony received a perfunctory reading. The conductor added nothing of his own, being seemingly more occupied with holding his men to the tempo he chose than with letting his fancy run in the scherzo or the slow movement. His best work of the afternoon was in the Debussy number, for here he realized the poetry of the score. The César Franck piece, example of a day of music writing that is gone, seems an unworthy representative of the great French master because it lacks the spontaneity and authority of other works of this pioneer of modernism. It is not a very alarming moment that his portrayal of fear brings forth. Listening to the Albeniz suite was no difficult task, being filled rather with the pleasurable excitement of wondering what sort of an odd sound would next emanate from the orchestra.

we often wish that conductors would take the Scherzo at a less mad pace; we think that it would gain by less rush and more daintiness. M. Monteux was twice heartily recalled at the end of the symphony, and the orchestra compelled to rise.

"The Accursed Huntsman" is a German count who sacrilegiously hunts on a Sunday morning and is in turn hunted by some very chromatic fiends. Of course, Caesar Franck was best in his portrayal of the Sunday calm which forms the first part of the work, and the religious chorale (cellos) over an organ-point, the pealing church bells, and the striking horn theme which is carried through the work, were all well given. The trouble, however, soon begins and the count behaves so badly that he is finally cursed by a bass tuba, cursed several times over.

After that the piccolo does a little hunting on its own account and the count learns what it is like to be at the other end of the hunting party. In this last part one might occasionally long for the style of a Liszt, a Berlioz, or even of a Saint-Saens, for Franck was not dramatic to the manner born, yet M. Monteux made as much of the climax as was possible, and the piece should recommend itself to the League for the Preservation of the Sabbath. It was very finely read.

It takes a Frenchman to bring out the finest points of Debussy, and M. Monteux made the Faun's afternoon both pensive and poetic. Its quiet melancholy made an excellent contrast to the hunting of the German count, and the performance was commendable.

Posthumous fame comes to Albeniz, who during his life was held to be strongly under French influence. Both of his suites, "Iberia" and "Catalonia," are classed by many Spaniards as being Gallic in style, but we certainly found a new flavovr in this number which ended the concert. Being Spanish it presented many marked rhythmic characteristics, but it was more exciting than some of the French and Russian treatments of similar subjects.

Albeniz lived about as vagrant a life as William Vincent Wallace or Moussorgsky, and it was natural that this musical tramp should give forth somethting as riotous as Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad." Under the Bolero swing which is often prominent one can hear suggestions of scrimmages, of a street band playing for humble dancers, and it is all very intoxicating in its frenzy.

M. Monteux read it splendidly. In fact, in the reading of the contrasted numbers, in the skilful makeup of the interesting program, and in the playing of the orchestra this was as good a "first concert" as we have had for years—a very promising beginning.

SUNDAY ADVERT

LSER, OCTOBER 12,

Opening of Symphony Season

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven ..... Second Symphony
Franck ..... "Le Chasseur Maudit" Symphonic Poem
Debussy ..... "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun"
Albeniz ..... "Catalonia" ..... Tone Picture

IN accordance with the usual custom, the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, were entirely orchestral. There are some musical auditors who would not regret if all the Symphony concerts were so, for our great orchestra is surely attraction enough in itself, and sometimes the solo artists only disturb the artistic impression. A good augury too, three nations were represented in the four numbers of the program and even the two French numbers were of widely different character. We have been over-fed on Saint-Saens during the last season and were glad to miss him for once.

Beethoven's second symphony is not a difficult work for our orchestra, nor is it difficult for the conductor. It is plain sailing all through, in spite of the fact that it contains the first symphonic Scherzo ever written. When M. Monteux came forward to conduct this he received an enthusiastic welcome, and signified it by a very good reading of the work. It was a little [illegible] at times, but Beethoven [illegible] of that pale

BOSTON AMERICAN -

OCTOBER 11,

NEW SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Pierre Monteux's Musicians Get Ovation and Play Interesting Program

Pierre Monteux, returning to Boston as conductor of the Symphony Orcestra, inaugurated his first full season here in that capacity by directing the opening concert in Symphony Hall.

The program was: Beethoven, Second Symphony, in D major; Cesar Franck, symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia," Part I. of folk suite.

WARMLY GREETED.

There was a large audience, which greeted Mr. Monteux with marked warmth. The applause was prolonged both on his first appearance and at the end of the symphony, when the conductor brought the members of the orchestra to their feet to share in the tribute.

The program was a brilliant one, and followed the arrangement inaugurated a few seasons ago, of placing the symphony first and the shorter works after the intermission. A wise plan; for few except the academic would enjoy a Symphony after such works as any of the three that followed.

In the program notes, Berlioz is quoted as saying that the first part of the first movement of the symphony "puts the hearer in an emotional mood." Perhaps there are hearers so affected today; but in the lover of modern music Beethoven's score arouses contemplation rather than emotion.

A BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE.

It is Debussy's music that stirs a "mood." The work by Chausson is exciting and that by Albeniz captivating by its very vulgarity and marked rhythms.

The performance was brilliant throughout. Auditors are not in critical vein at the first concert of the season; it was a gala occasion.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after many trials and a season of strikes which have intruded into the musical world, has been referred to slightingly at times by self-appointed critics in other cities; but it still remains "an orchestra of virtuosi," and under the gifted leadership of Mr. [illegible] will [illegible] so.

CONCERT NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux's Next Programme with Mr. Spalding as Assisting Violinist—Mr. Elman Reappears and Mme. Schumann-Heink Returns

THREE pieces fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, and Saturday evening, Oct. 18, at Symphony Hall—Schumann's symphony in B-flat, Dvorák's concerto for violin and orchestra and Enesco's suite. To these concerts also comes Mr. Spalding, the violinist, as the first "assisting artist" of the new season. At service in the late war he has been absent through two years from the American stage. Presumably he returns to it with the adept hand, the discerning mind, the warming feeling, the just poise into which he had matured and which were carrying him to higher and higher place. His chosen piece, Dvorák's concerto, has been seldom played in recent years at the Symphony Concerts. No more has Enesco's suite been lately heard there, though it is easy to recall for the sturdy progress of the first movement through the strings in unison and for the melancholy fancy of a subsequent section. Schumann's symphony is, of course, that in which he sings his joyous zest in the return of spring.

Travelu Oct 11

SPALDING FOR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program will be: Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Dvorak's violin concerto, and the Enesco suite, so well received at the 1914 concerts.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 12,

Debussy's Romance and Tragedy

Story Told by New Symphony Member Who Introduced Composer to First Wife

Events have sent to Boston the man who unconsciously inaugurated the tragic romance of the first marriage of the famous composer, the immortal, Claude Achille Debussy. He is Mr. Denayer, the new leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Debussy was first a genius, then a man. He married a poor woman—he was himself penniless—a woman, very beautiful, who slaved for him during the early stages of his career, while the composer dreamed his dreams and composed his operatic masterpiece, "Pelleas et Melisande."

Then there was a divorce. Debussy re-married—an elderly woman who was rich. The first wife attempted to shoot herself, but was saved, and lives today. What she felt when the man whose genius she sheltered in the hard years of struggle and discouragement passed from this life, no one will know. But the motives of the composer, when he left the companion of his poverty to her fate, seem rather painfully clear. The affair will go down in history, without doubt, as another one of the countless instances in which artists were selfishly willing to sacrifice anyone and anything to gain their ends.

THE MEETING

"What would I have done," said Mr. Denayer, "had I known what I was bringing about? I introduced Lili, as she was known to a group of us young people—she was then working as a mannequin at the Maison Doeilly, Place Vendome—to Debussy one night after the play. I was a student in Paris at the time and was courting a friend of Lili's who was with us that evening. Debussy came over and as a matter of course was introduced. He went out to a little restaurant to have a sandwich and a 'bock'. Debussy that night was the Debussy known only to his intimate friends and fellow-musicians—an incomparable companion, irresistible in talk and in play. He was evidently interested in Lili. Then I saw neither of them for some weeks and later I heard they were married.

"Still later I visited at their house. Let me tell you that no woman ever slaved for a man more happily and more willingly than that young wife for her cherished husband. And Debussy even then was no easy man to please. He was an intellectual but also a sensualist of the most refined type. He was a gourmand, very fastidious about food, and, when the viands and the wine pleased him, very fond of eating. He had a unique taste in color as well as in music. He was extremely lazy, always willing to borrow money and quite consciousless about returning it to those whom he had promised to pay.

"This is truth. I yield to no one in my admiration of Debussy's music, and even certain traits of his character and, above all, his supreme, unique intelligence. But the facts are as I mention them. I never understood, in those days, how Debussy contrived to live. Still less do I understand how his wife, without funds, without any help I knew of, made his home the heaven of comfort and beauty which it was.

"And then it all vanished in a day. The heroic young wife fought and prayed for the preservation of her home. It was useless. Debussy seemed to have no heart. There would be a divorce. I think it was secured by Debussy living apart from his wife for some time, during which period he gave her no money. He had tired of his old way of living. He wanted security, and more—he wanted luxuries and the ease from the frets of living which money, judiciously applied—and he knew how to spend it—may bring about. He went on his way. Henri Robert, the lawyer, helped the former wife materially by contriving through the Society of Authors and Musicians to bring an attachment on Debussy's royalties and other possessions, by which means the composer was forced to pay alimony as long as he lived. Otherwise the companion of the earlier years might have starved.

"Well,"—he shrugged his shoulders—"who shall judge? You say this was a crime of desertion and ingratitude—a base crime. I agree, so far as facts are concerned. At the same time I confess I am unwilling to try to decide what was right and what was wrong in that life; what obligations such an intelligence, such a genius, should be held under, so far as human relations are concerned. I cannot. You could not, had you known Debussy as some knew him. He was a unique spirit. He knew secrets of beauty which had escaped all other men. I would venture to say that his first wife feels this today strongly enough at least forever to keep her counsel about what she knows. As for Debussy, he was the last man to explain himself to the public. Whether these things, so unfortunate, so cruel, have any real lesson or profit for anybody, what right is and what wrong is, who shall say?"

If Dr. Karl Muck was so anxious to leave America, as he said, why did he sail for Denmark instead of Germany?

Dr. Muck went to Denmark only as a port from which he could quickly reach Germany. He has been engaged, if report is true, to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in October.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season in Sander Theatre, Cambridge, will take pla Thursday evening. The program i cludes Schumann's Symphony No. Dvorak's violin concerto; Enesco Suite. Albert Spalding will be the so violinist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the second pair of Boston Symphon concerts next Friday and Saturday (few seats are to be had for the Satur day evening concert) Mr. Monteux ha arranged an engrossing program, to be gin with Schumann's "Spring" symphony (No. 1) and to close with the Suite by Enesco. The concerts will also mark the return to Boston of Albert Spalding, who will play Dvorak's violin Concerto in A minor. In 1917 he forfeited many engagements (including one with this orchestra) to enlist in the army. He was commissioned as lieutenant in the aviation corps of the A. E. F. in Italy and decorated for his active and honorable service. Reports of his enthusiastic reception in concerts in Rome, Paris and London have crossed the Atlantic.

Globe Oct 12

Spalding Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert

Albert Spalding, the noted American violinist, will play Dvorak's Concerto in A minor at this week's Symphony concerts.

Mr Spalding returned to America last Spring after two years' war service in Italy. Those who remember his fine performance of Beethoven's concerto with the Symphony Orchestra several years ago will welcome his reappearance.

The remainder of the program includes Schumann's familiar and well liked First Symphony (the so-called "Spring" Symphony), and a suite by the Parisian composer, Enesco, a Rumanian by birth. This suite was played here in 1914.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for 110 concerts scheduled this season, of which 10 will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual, the New York visits starting Nov 6 and 8. Also, as usual, the seats for these concerts are engaged in advance. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription

om HERALD

ddress New York City

te..... OCT 5 191

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall, as usual, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6-8, December 4-6, January 8-10, February 5-7, March 18-20. Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor, is sparing no pains to make the season exceptional. In France during the last summer he collected a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian, from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius, much may be expected. He also has in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slight the classics, nor will he bar Wagner or any great music which the American public desires. Rehearsals are under way in Boston for the initial concerts there on October 10 and 11.

NORTH AMERICAN

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 12 1919

The season of Boston symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 8, under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. The indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores fro France last summer that he will unable to perform more than a sma proportion of them. He has hint at new works by Saint-Saens a Rabaud, and definitely announc new symphonies by d'Indy and Jea Hure, symphonic performances of De bussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawin sky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be re-admitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer—Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak, and Tschaikowsky.

CITIZEN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The pending season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will begin here at the Academy of Music on Nov. 7, opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. Indeed, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores with him from France last summer that he will be able to perform only a small portion of them.

He has hinted at new works by Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Prokoviev, Turina and Casella, and definitely announced for production new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Stravinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will play several American scores which he has found by means of conferences with composers. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner is to be readmitted immediately, and Strauss later if public opinion is so inclined.

By no means will he neglect the best music of the past. In addition to two choral works, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Franck's "Beatitudes," which he hopes to give in Boston, he has specifically mentioned the following great composers: Haydn, Mozart, Schubert Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn Liszt, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Dvora and Smetana.

Transcript Oct 12

CORRECTION

On another page of this paper, Mr. F. Denayer, the newly-appointed first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is described as "the new leader of the second violins." Mr. Denayer is the first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. F. Thillois remains the admirable leader of the second violins.

The programme of the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall will consist of Schumann's joyous symphony of the spring, in B-flat; Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Albert Spalding, and the singular and fascinating suite of Enesco, often played at these concerts, op. 9.

HISTORY OF THE

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1

MUSIC

Boston Season Begun

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is the prerogative always of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give official sanction to the opening in Boston of another musical season. True, there may first be a scattering concert or two, as has been the case this year, but nobody considers the season really begun until the first of the series of 24 symphony concerts has been given.

The Boston season is now officially open. Pierre Monteux, cordially but decorously applauded as he came on to the stage, has led his men through a program comprising Beethoven's second symphony, César Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" suite; has made his impression, favorable and otherwise, on the Friday afternoon audience, and has been duly compared with predecessors.

In some respects Mr. Monteux' task in presenting the first concert this year was not so great as it was last year, when the orchestra was more or less disorganized. A greater proportion of the old players is here now than then. Then, too, these men have had the benefit of a season's work with Mr. Rabaud, who, it may be presumed, was an exponent of the style of conducting and program making which Mr. Monteux will follow. However, last year it was a temporary position; now it is for a year. And to a certain extent, whether it is wise or fair or just, or not, the audience cannot help making a little forecast of the 23 concerts to come from the one it heard on Friday.

The Beethoven symphony received a perfunctory reading. The conductor added nothing of his own, being seemingly more occupied with holding his men to the tempo he chose than with letting his fancy run in the scherzo or the slow movement. His best work of the afternoon was in the Debussy number, for here he realized the poetry of the score. The César Franck piece, example of a day of music writing that is gone, seems an unworthy representative of the great French master because it lacks the spontaneity and authority of other works of this pioneer of modernism. It is not a very alarming moment that his portrayal of fear brings forth. Listening to the Albeniz suite was no difficult task, being filled rather with the pleasurable excitement of wondering what sort of an odd sound would next emanate from the orchestra.

we often wish that conductors would take the Scherzo at a less mad pace; we think that it would gain by less rush and more daintiness. M. Monteux was twice heartily recalled at the end of the symphony, and the orchestra compelled to rise.

"The Accursed Huntsman" is a German count who sacrilegiously hunts on a Sunday morning and is in turn hunted by some very chromatic fiends. Of course, Caesar Franck was best in his portrayal of the Sunday calm which forms the first part of the work, and the religious chorale (cellos) over an organ-point, the pealing church bells, and the striking horn theme which is carried through the work, were all well given. The trouble, however, soon begins and the count behaves so badly that he is finally cursed by a bass tuba, cursed several times over.

After that the piccolo does a little hunting on its own account and the count learns what it is like to be at the other end of the hunting party. In this last part one might occasionally long for the style of a Liszt, a Berlioz, or ecen of a Saint-Saens, for Franck was not dramatic to the manner born, yet M. Monteux made as much of the climax as was possible, and the piece should recommend itself to the League for the Preservation of the Sabbath. It was very finely read.

It takes a Frenchman to bring out the finest points of Debussy, and M. Monteux made the Faun's afternoon both pensive and poetic. Its quiet melancholy made an excellent contrast to the hunting of the German count, and the performance was commendable.

Posthumous fame comes to Albeniz, who during his life was held to be strongly under French influence. Both of his suites, "Iberia" and "Catalonia," are classed by many Spaniards as being Gallic in style, but we certainly found a new flavovr in this number which ended the concert. Being Spanish it presented many marked rhythmic characteristics, but it was more exciting than some of the French and Russian treatments of similar subjects.

Albeniz lived about as vagrant a life as William Vincent Wallace or Moussorgsky, and it was natural that this musical tramp should give forth somethting as riotous as Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad." Under the Bolero swing which is often prominent one can hear suggestions of scrimmages, of a street band playing for humble dancers, and it is all very intoxicating in its frenzy.

M. Monteux read it splendidly. In fact, in the reading of the contrasted numbers, in the skilful makeup of the interesting program, and in the playing of the orchestra this was as good a "first concert" as we have had for years—a very promising beginning.

SUNDAY ADVERT

ISER, OCTOBER 12,

Opening of Symphony Season

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven ..... Second Symphony
Franck..."Le Chasseur Maudit" Symphonic Poem
Debussy..."L'Apres-midi d'un Faun
Albenis ..."Catalonia" ..... Tone Picture

IN accordance with the usual custom, the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, were entirely orchestral. There are some musical auditors who would not regret if all the Symphony concerts were so, for our great orchestra is surely attraction enough in itself, and sometimes the solo artists only disturb the artistic impression. A good augury too, three nations were represented in the four numbers of the program and even the two French numbers were of widely different character. We have been over-fed on Saint-Saens during the last season and were glad to miss him for once.

Beethoven's second symphony is not a difficult work for our orchestra, nor is it difficult for the conductor. It is plain sailing all through, in spite of the fact that it contains the first symphonic Scherzo ever written. When M. Monteux came forward to conduct this he received an enthusiastic welcome, and justified it by a very good [illegible] of the work. It was a little [illegible] at times, but Beethoven [illegible] approved of that, only

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux's Next Programme with Mr. Spalding as Assisting Violinist—Mr. Elman Reappears and Mme. Schumann-Heink Returns

THREE pieces fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, and Saturday evening, Oct. 18, at Symphony Hall—Schumann's symphony in B-flat, Dvorák's concerto for violin and orchestra and Enesco's suite. To these concerts also comes Mr. Spalding, the violinist, as the first "assisting artist" of the new season. At service in the late war he has been absent through two years from the American stage. Presumably he returns to it with the adept hand, the discerning mind, the warming feeling, the just poise into which he had matured and which were carrying him to higher and higher place. His chosen piece, Dvorák's concerto, has been seldom played in recent years at the Symphony Concerts. No more has Enesco's suite been lately heard there, though it is easy to recall for the sturdy progress of the first movement through the strings in unison and for the melancholy fancy of a subsequent section. Schumann's symphony is, of course, that in which he sings his joyous zest in the return of spring.

Traveler Oct 11

SPALDING FOR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program will be: Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Dvorak's violin concerto, and the Enesco suite, so well received at the 1914 concerts.

BOSTON AMERICAN -

OCTOBER 11,

NEW SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Pierre Monteux's Musicians Get Ovation and Play Interesting Program

Pierre Monteux, returning to Boston as conductor of the Symphony Orcestra, inaugurated his first full season here in that capacity by directing the opening concert in Symphony Hall.

The program was: Beethoven, Second Symphony, in D major; Cesar Franck, symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia," Part I. of folk suite.

WARMLY GREETED.

There was a large audience, which greeted Mr. Monteux with marked warmth. The applause was prolonged both on his first appearance and at the end of the symphony, when the conductor brought the members of the orchestra to their feet to share in the tribute.

The program was a brilliant one, and followed the arrangement inaugurated a few seasons ago, of placing the symphony first and the shorter works after the intermission. A wise plan; for few except the academic would enjoy a Symphony after such works as any of the three that followed.

In the program notes, Berlioz is quoted as saying that the first part of the first movement of the symphony "puts the hearer in an emotional mood." Perhaps there are hearers so affected today; but in the lover of modern music Beethoven's score arouses contemplation rather than emotion.

A BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE.

It is Debussy's music that stirs a "mood." The work by Chausson is exciting and that by Albeniz captivating by its very vulgarity and marked rhythms.

The performance was brilliant throughout. Auditors are not in critical vein at the first concert of the season; it was a gala occasion.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after many trials and a season of strikes which have intruded into the musical world, has been referred to slightingly at times by self-appointed critics in other cities; but it still remains "an orchestra of virtuosi," and under the gifted leadership of Mr. Monteux, will remain so.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season in Sander Theatre, Cambridge, will take pla Thursday evening. The program i cludes Schumann's Symphony No. Dvorak's violin concerto; Enesco Suite. Albert Spalding will be the so violinist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the second pair of Boston Symphon concerts next Friday and Saturday few seats are to be had for the Satur day evening concert) Mr. Monteaux ha arranged an engrossing program, to be gin with Schumann's "Spring" symphony (No. 1) and to close with the Suite by Enesco. The concerts will also mark the return to Boston of Albert Spalding, who will play Dvorak's violin Concerto in A minor. In 1917 he forfeited many engagements (including one with this orchestra) to enlist in the army. He was commissioned as lieutenant in the aviation corps of the A. E. F. in Italy and decorated for his active and honorable service. Reports of his enthusiastic reception in concerts in Rome, Paris and London have crossed the Atlantic.

Globe Oct 12

Spalding Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert

Albert Spalding, the noted American violinist, will play Dvorak's Concerto in A minor at this week's Symphony concerts.

Mr Spalding returned to America last Spring after two years' war service in Italy. Those who remember his fine performance of Beethoven's concerto with the Symphony Orchestra several years ago will welcome his reappearance.

The remainder of the program includes Schumann's familiar and well liked First Symphony (the so-called "Spring" Symphony), and a suite by the Parisian composer, Enesco, a Rumanian by birth. This suite was played here in 1914.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for 110 concerts scheduled this season, of which 10 will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual, the New York visits starting Nov 6 and 8. Also, as usual, the seats for these concerts are engaged in advance. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription

om HERALD

ldress New York City

te..... OCT 5 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall, as usual, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6-8, December 4-6, January 8-10, February 5-7, March 18-20. Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor, is sparing no pains to make the season exceptional. In France during the last summer he collected a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian, from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius, much may be expected. He also has in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slight the classics, nor will he bar Wagner or any great music which the American public desires. Rehearsals are under way in Boston for the initial concerts there on October 10 and 11.

NORTH AMERICAN

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

The season of Boston symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3, under Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. The indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be re-admitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer—Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak, and Tschaikowsky.

CITIZEN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 12,

Debussy's Romance and Tragedy

Story Told by New Symphony Member Who Introduced Composer to First Wife

Events have sent to Boston the man who unconsciously inaugurated the tragic romance of the first marriage of the famous composer, the immortal, Claude Achille Debussy. He is Mr. Denayer, the new leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Debussy was first a genius, then a man. He married a poor woman—he was himself penniless—a woman, very beautiful, who slaved for him during the early stages of his career, while the composer dreamed his dreams and composed his operatic masterpiece, "Pelleas et Melisande."

Then there was a divorce. Debussy re-married—an elderly woman who was rich. The first wife attempted to shoot herself, but was saved, and lives today. What she felt when the man whose genius she sheltered in the hard years of struggle and discouragement passed from this life, no one will know. But the motives of the composer, when he left the companion of his poverty to her fate, seem rather painfully clear. The affair will go down in history, without doubt, as another one of the countless instances in which artists were selfishly willing to sacrifice anyone and anything to gain their ends.

THE MEETING

"What would I have done," said Mr. Denayer, "had I known what I was bringing about? I introduced Lili, as she was known to a group of us young people—she was then working as a mannequin at the Maison Doeilly, Place Vendome—to Debussy one night after the play. I was a student in Paris at the time and was courting a friend of Lili's who was with us that evening. Debussy came over and as a matter of course was introduced. He went out to a little restaurant to have a sandwich and a 'bock'. Debussy that night was the Debussy known only to his intimate friends and fellow-musicians—an incomparable companion, irresistible in talk and in play. He was evidently interested in Lili. Then I saw neither of them for some weeks and later I heard they were married.

"Still later I visited at their house. Let me tell you that no woman ever slaved for a man more happily and more willingly than that young wife for her cherished husband. And Debussy even then was no easy man to please. He was an intellectual but also a sensualist of the most refined type. He was a gourmand, very fastidious about food, and, when the viands and the wine pleased him, very fond of eating. He had a unique taste in color as well as in music. He was extremely lazy, always willing to borrow money and quite consciousless about returning it to those whom he had promised to pay.

"This is truth. I yield to no one in my admiration of Debussy's music, and even certain traits of his character and, above all, his supreme, unique intelligence. But the facts are as I mention them. I never understood, in those days, how Debussy contrived to live. Still less do I understand how his wife, without funds, without any help I knew of, made his home the heaven of comfort and beauty which it was.

"And then it all vanished in a day. The heroic young wife fought and prayed for the preservation of her home. It was useless. Debussy seemed to have no heart. There would be a divorce. I think it was secured by Debussy living apart from his wife for some time, during which period he gave her no money. He had tired of his old way of living. He wanted security, and more—he wanted luxuries and the ease from the frets of living which money, judiciously applied—and he knew how to spend it—may bring about. He went on his way. Henri Robert, the lawyer, helped the former wife materially by contriving through the Society of Authors and Musicians to bring an attachment on Debussy's royalties and other possessions, by which means the composer was forced to pay alimony as long as he lived. Otherwise the companion of the earlier years might have starved.

"Well,"—he shrugged his shoulders—"who shall judge? You say this was a crime of desertion and ingratitude—a base crime. I agree, so far as facts are concerned. At the same time I confess I am unwilling to try to decide what was right and what was wrong in that life; what obligations such an intelligence, such a genius, should be held under, so far as human relations are concerned. I cannot. You could not, had you known Debussy as some knew him. He was a unique spirit. He knew secrets of beauty which had escaped all other men. I would venture to say that his first wife feels this today strongly enough at least forever to keep her counsel about what she knows. As for Debussy, he was the last man to explain himself to the public. Whether these things, so unfortunate, so cruel, have any real lesson or profit for anybody, what right is and what wrong is, who shall say?"

If Dr. Karl Muck was so anxious to leave America, as he said, why did he sail for Denmark instead of Germany?

Dr. Muck went to Denmark only as a port from which he could quickly reach Germany. He has been engaged, if report is true, to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in October.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The pending season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will begin here at the Academy of Music on Nov. 7, opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. Indeed, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores with him from France last summer that he will be able to perform only a small portion of them.

He has hinted at new works by Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Prokoviev, Turina and Casella, and definitely announced for production new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Stravinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will play several American scores which he has found by means of conferences with composers. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be readmitted immediately, and Strauss later if public opinion is so inclined.

By no means will he neglect the best music of the past. In addition to two choral works, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Franck's "Beatitudes," which he hopes to give in Boston, he has specifically mentioned the following great composers: Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Dvorak and Smetana.

Transcript Oct 12

CORRECTION

On another page of this paper, Mr. F. Denayer, the newly-appointed first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is described as "the new leader of the second violins." Mr. Denayer is the first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. F. Thillois remains the admirable leader of the second violins.

The programme of the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall will consist of Schumann's joyous symphony of the spring, in B-flat; Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Albert Spalding, and the singular and fascinating suite of Enesco, often played at these concerts, op. 9.

HISTORY OF THE

Boston Symphony's Conductor and Soloists

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1919

EMILIO DE GOGORZA — RACHMANINOFF

PIERRE MONTEUX

© DUPONT — LOUISE HOMER

FRITZ KREISLER © U & U.

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the orchestra at the five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music. The assisting artists at the various concerts are: Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

COMING EVENTS

Since the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony concerts take place earlier in other cities than in Philadelphia, where season tickets will be available one week from tomorrow, it is possible to predict one of the busiest and most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra. A schedule of 110 concerts lies ahead. A great interest attaches to the new conductor, Pierre Monteux—in several cities virtually every seat is sold out in advance.

There promises to be a similar interest in Philadelphia, where, beginning October 13, at Heppe's Music Store, 1119 Chestnut Street, tickets for the five evening concerts on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17, may be had for the same nominal price at which they were sold last year.

In Boston the orchestra is already rehearsing for the initial concerts take place there next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the seasons to come. In France last Summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, which he will produce for the first time in America. Surely five more interesting programmes than the famous conductor will present with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919-20, could not be devised. The misfortunes of war have prevented many fine musicians from musical activity in this country—Fritz Kreisler, who has been in voluntary retirement, and Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in Bohemia (her birthplace) and unable to cross the lines of conflict. Engaged as soloists for the coming season. Fritz Kreisler will soon be heard again, and Mme. Destinn recently arrived in New York.

If Mme. Destinn was an indispensable soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Louise Homer is no less its indispensable contralto. The personal charm of her voice and personality, which the freshness of youth and the character of maturity are blended, needs no emphasis. Emilio de Gogorza, the most popular barytone of the concert stage, unlike Mme. Homer, is not familiar here as a soloist with this orchestra. His American birth makes the American public his own, while his Spanish aristocrataic descent lends a distinctive color to his voice and his interpretations.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia, is the only soloist of last year to return, and surely his performance then marks him as the first choice among the artists of the season past.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, SUNDAY
OCTOBER 12.

Monteux Opens Boston Season

THE season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Lyric Theatre on November 5 opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasion Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce.

As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript, "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diagilev's Russian ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last Summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by D'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers—among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

From Address
Date

MUSIC REBORN.

Pollyanna, distractedly searching the [illegible] musical bodies a confirmation of her grams of interest and variety:

Just to prove that other cities besides out own can produce bands of symphonic caliber, New York and Boston will share with us, as formerly, Mr. Damrosch and his admirable players, and M. Monteux and his associates from the Hub. The operatic season,

BALTIMORE NEWS
Sunday, Oct. 12, 1919

Boston Symphony Concert Series.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought a number of new scores with him when he returned a short time ago from France, and his program this season will comprise some striking works of recent composition representing different schools.

He will direct his first Baltimore concert of the season on November 5, and at this and the succeeding four engagements distinguished soloists will be heard.

Among these is Emmy Destinn, who is again in New York after having been abroad for several years, and who, it is said, now prefers to be called Destinnova. The difficulties she experienced as a virtual prisoner of war were much discussed in the public press of this country and a great deal of sympathy for her aroused.

She is considered one of the best artists the Metropolitan Opera has had in recent years and her return to its boards is being eagerly anticipated. When travel was resumed last spring she went to London and made a number of appearances at

EAGLE OCT 12 1919
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its customary series of concerts in the Academy, the first scheduled for November 7, opened its season last Friday and Saturday in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux plans many a novelty for the coming year including new symphonies by d'Indy and Hure, and orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet "Play," and of Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." Wagner is to return and possibly Richard Str[illegible]

om BROOKLYN EDITION
ddress New York City
te OCT 12 1919

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger in no previous season, and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities.

There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which [illegible] France last summer [illegible] new scores, French, [illegible] Several new Ameri[illegible]rticularly in mind to [illegible]t bar Wagner, nor [illegible]ld for the new. In [illegible]ery epoch and every [illegible], and with an ex[illegible]versatile and cos[illegible]s well able to carry [illegible]oups of soloists have [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] no group has been [illegible] the five selected for [illegible] Fritz Kreisler is [illegible]m his voluntary re[illegible]composition. The re[illegible] of violinists to the [illegible]erly awaited by an

DRAFT DO[illegible] FACE

Charged with [illegible] I. Rome, prom[illegible] face trial at t[illegible] ment, July 6. [illegible] yesterday afte[illegible] arraigned befo[illegible] tial. He is bel[illegible] pending the h[illegible]

[illegible]nn, erstwhile prima [illegible]politan Opera Com[illegible]etained in Bohemia [illegible]rn) and unable for [illegible]ross the lines of con[illegible] where she has her [illegible] When the channels [illegible] immediately went to [illegible]has been enjoying an [illegible]s in the leading rôles [illegible] She arrived in New [illegible]o.

[illegible]r, as a contralto, has [illegible]ay of the Metropolitan [illegible]er devoted following. [illegible] her former appear[illegible] with the Boston Sym[illegible]rd, grow in enthusiasm sea[illegible] season.

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish-American baritone, will be welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts by those who admire his mellow voice and his distinctive interpretative powers in recital.

Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return. Landing unexpectedly in New York last autumn, a virtual exile from Russia, where the Bolsheviki had requisitioned his estate, the great Russian musician convinced his American audiences in a few hearings that his pre-eminent place among pianists is relatively as high as his place among composers.

HERALD
ew York City
P 12 1919

Five Great Or[illegible] Talk wit[illegible]

New Symphony Under Bodanzky
Contender for Supremacy with th[illegible]
Philharmonic and Symphony.

By PAUL MORRIS.

Formerly two local symphony orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Society, were in competition with the Boston Orchestra for local supremacy. But with the upheaval in the ranks of the Boston musicians which followed the overthrow of its German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and a reorganization of the personnel, two series rival organizations have been attracting the attention of the musical world. Frequently the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, comes to Carnegie Hall to challenge comparison with local orchestras, and the comparison is not unfavorable to the visitors. And now a new and serious contender has sprung up in New York, the New Symphony Orchestra, which opened its second season last Thursday night.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
e K OCT 11

ORCHESTRAL PROJECTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has one hundred and ten concerts scheduled, ten to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday [illegible]

[illegible]aturday afternoons beginning Nov[illegible]ember 6. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has brought from France a large number of new scores—French, Italian and Russian.

[illegible]ABLISHED 1881
[illegible]om
[illegible]LADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

The session of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music, November third (season tickets to be had at Heppe's opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. As Horatio T. Parker has recently written in "The Boston Transcript," "The trustees of the Orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that tages the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last Summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play, and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak, and Techaikowsky.

* * *

From American
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 12 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Lyric Theater, on November 5 (season tickets to be had at Albaugh's). There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra will produce under his eminent leadership. As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux for conductor. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghiley's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the symphony orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

n INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
[illegible] 12 1919

The season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3, (season tickets to be had at Heppe's), opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his leadership will produce.

The Matinee Musical Club of Philadelphia offers a prize of one hundred dollars ($100) for a cantata, subject to be selected by the composer, suitable for women's chorus with incidental solo parts. The cantata shall not exceed forty nor less than twenty minutes in length. Manuscripts must be submitted with piano score. It is imperative that all manuscripts be sent to the secretary by November 1, 1919, at which time the contest closes. Manuscript music is first-class mail.

RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 18 19[illegible]

—The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, brought a large number of scores from France last summer. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and has definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is fa[illegible]

Boston Symphony's Conductor and Soloists

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1919

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the orchestra at the five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music. The assisting artists at the various concerts are: Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

COMING EVENTS

Since the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony concerts take place earlier in other cities than in Philadelphia, where season tickets will be available one week from tomorrow, it is possible to predict one of the busiest and most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra. A schedule of 110 concerts lies ahead. A great interest attaches to the new conductor, Pierre Monteux—in several cities virtually every seat is sold out in advance.

There promises to be a similar interest in Philadelphia, where, beginning October 13, at Heppe's Music Store, 1119 Chestnut Street, tickets for the five evening concerts on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17, may be had for the same nominal price at which they were sold last year.

In Boston the orchestra is already rehearsing for the initial concerts take place there next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the seasons to come. In France last Summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, from which his choice new music may be diverse. America works of worth he has also in mind, n does he in any way intened to slight t classics. In short, he inteneds to ma his programs cosmopolitan in accor ance with the reputation for versatili which stretches far behind him in h career upon two continents. Every n tion will have its showing and eve epoch.

Surely five soloists, more illustrio than the famous artists who are to a pear with the Boston Symphony Orche tra in 1919-20, could not be found. T misfortunes of war have prevented t fine musicians from musical activity this country—Fritz Kreisler, who h been in voluntary retirement, and Emm Destinn, who has been bottled up in B hemia (her birthplace) and unable cross the lines of conflict. Engaged soloists for the coming season. Fr Kreisler will soon be heard again, a Mme. Destinn recently arrived in N York.

If Mme. Destinn was an indispensa soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co pany, Madame Louise Homer is no its indispensable contralto. The per nial charm of her voice and person, which the freshness of youth and character of maturity are blended, ne no emphasis. Emilio de Gogorza, th most popular barytone of the concer stage, unlike Mme. Homer, is not fa miliar here as a soloist with this orches tra. His American birth makes the American public his own, while his Spanish aristocrataic descent lends a distinctive color to his voice and his interpretations.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia, is the only soloist of last year to return, and surely his performance then marks him as the first choice among the artists of the season past.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, SUND
OCTOBER 12.

Monteux Opens Boston Season

THE season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Lyric Theatre on November 5 opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasion Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce.

As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript, "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diagilev's Russian ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed, the indefatigable conductor

From PRESS
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

MUSIC REBORN.

Pollyanna, distractedly searching the musical bodies for confirmation of her hopes of interest and variety, [illegible]

Just to prove that other cities besides our own can produce bands of symphonic caliber, New York and Boston will share with us, as formerly, Mr. Damrosch and his admirable players, and M. Monteux and his associates [illegible] The operatic season,

BALTIMORE NEWS
Sunday, Oct. 12, 1919

Boston Symphony Concert Series.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought a number of new scores with him when he returned a short time ago from France, and his program this season will comprise some striking works of recent composition representing different schools.

He will direct his first Baltimore concert of the season on November 5, and at this and the succeeding four engagements distinguished soloists will be heard.

Among these is Emmy Destinn, who is again in New York after having been abroad for several years, and who, it is said, now prefers to be called Destinnova. The difficulties she experienced as a virtual prisoner of war were much discussed in the public press of this country and a great deal of sympathy for her aroused.

She is considered one of the best artists the Metropolitan Opera has had in recent years and her return to its boards is being eagerly anticipated. When travel was resumed last spring she went to London and made a number of appearances at

EAGLE OCT 12 1919
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its customary series of concerts in the Academy, the first scheduled for November 7, opened its season last Friday and Saturday in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux plans many a novelty for the coming year including new symphonies by d'Indy and Ibert, and orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet "Play," and of Stravinsky's "Bird of Fire." Wagner is to return and possibly Richard St[illegible]

om BROOKLYN EDITION
dress New York City
te OCT 12 1919

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger in no previous season, and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities.

There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which lies ahead of him. In France last summer he collected many new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. In short, "the best of every epoch and every school" is his motto, and with an extensive reputation for versatile and cosmopolitan tastes, he is well able to carry out such a motto.

Although notable groups of soloists have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past, no group has been more illustrious than the five selected for the season to come. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement—devoted to composition. The return of the greatest of violinists to the concert stage is eagerly awaited by an expectant public.

Mme. Emmy Destinn, erstwhile prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been detained in Bohemia (where she was born) and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the West, where she has her stronger affiliations. When the channels of travel opened she immediately went to London, where she has been enjoying an unprecedented success in the leading rôles at Covent Garden. She arrived in New York a few days ago.

Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Her devoted following, who will remember her former appearances in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, grow in enthusiasm season after season.

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish-American baritone, will be welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts by those who admire his mellow voice and his distinctive interpretative powers in recital.

Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return. Landing unexpectedly in New York last autumn, a virtual exile from Russia, where the Bolsheviki had requisitioned his estate, the great Russian musician convinced his American audiences in a few hearings that his pre-eminent place among pianists is relatively as high as his place among composers.

HERALD
ew York City
OCT 12 1919

Five Great Or... Talk wit...

New Symphony Under Bodanzky Contender for Supremacy with th... Philharmonic and Symphony.

By PAUL MORRIS.

Formerly two local symphony orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Society, were in competition with the Boston Orchestra for local supremacy. But with the upheaval in the ranks of the Boston musicians which followed the overthrow of its German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and a reorganization of the personnel, two series rival organizations have been attracting the attention of the musical world. Frequently the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, comes to Carnegie Hall to challenge comparison with local orchestras, and the comparison is not unfavorable to the visitors. And now a new and serious contender has sprung up in New York, the New Symphony Orchestra, which opened its second season last Thursday night.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
e K OCT 11

ORCHESTRAL PROJECTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has one hundred and ten concerts scheduled, ten to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday [illegible]

Saturday afternoons beginning November 8. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has brought from France a large number of new scores—French, Italian and Russian.

ABLISHED 1801
rom PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

The session of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music, November third (season tickets to be had at Heppe's opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierce Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. As Horatio T. Parker has recently written in "The Boston Transcript," "The trustees of the Orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that tages the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last Summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play, and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak, and Techaikowsky.

* * *

From American
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 12 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Lyric Theater, on November 5 (season tickets to be had at Albaugh's). There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra will produce under his eminent leadership. As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux for conductor. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghiley's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the symphony orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

n INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
12 1919

The season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3, (season tickets to be had at Heppe's), opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his leadership will produce.

The Matinee Musical Club of Philadelphia offers a prize of one hundred dollars ($100) for a cantata, subject to be selected by the composer, suitable for women's chorus with incidental solo parts. The cantata shall not exceed forty nor less than twenty minutes in length. Manuscripts must be submitted with piano score. It is imperative that all manuscripts be sent to the secretary by November 1, 1919, at which time the contest closes. Manuscript music is first-class mail.

RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 12

—The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 8. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, brought a large number of scores from France last summer. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and has definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public

Boston Symphony's Conductor and Soloists

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1919

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the orchestra at the five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music. The assisting artists at the various concerts are: Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

COMING EVENTS

Since the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony concerts take place earlier in other cities than in Philadelphia, where season tickets will be available one week from tomorrow, it is possible to predict one of the busiest and most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra. A schedule of 110 concerts lies ahead. A great interest attaches to the new conductor, Pierre Monteux—in several cities virtually every seat is sold out in advance.

There promises to be a similar interest in Philadelphia, where, beginning October 13, at Heppe's Music Store, 1119 Chestnut Street, tickets for the five evening concerts on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17, may be had for the same nominal price at which they were sold last year.

In Boston the orchestra is already rehearsing for the initial concerts take place there next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the seasons to come. In France last Summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, from which his choice new music may be diverse. America works of worth he has also in mind, n does he in any way intened to slight t classics. In short, he inteneds to mal his programs cosmopolitan in accor ance with the reputation for versatili which stretches far behind him in career upon two continents. Every n tion will have its showing and eve epoch.

Surely five soloists, more illustrio than the famous artists who are to a pear with the Boston Symphony Orche tra in 1919-20, could not be found. T misfortunes of war have prevented tw fine musicians from musical activity this country—Fritz Kreisler, who h been in voluntary retirement, and Emm Destinn, who has been bottled up in B hemia (her birthplace) and unable cross the lines of conflict. Engaged soloists for the coming season. Fr Kreisler will soon be heard again, a Mme. Destinn recently arrived in N York.

If Mme. Destinn was an indispensab soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co pany, Madame Louise Homer is no l its indispensable contralto. The per nial charm of her voice and person, which the freshness of youth and character of maturity are blended, nee no emphasis. Emilio de Gogorza, the most popular barytone of the concer stage, unlike Mme. Homer, is not fa miliar here as a soloist with this orches tra. His American birth makes the American public his own, while his Spanish aristocrataic descent lends a distinctive color to his voice and his interpretations.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia, is the only soloist of last year to return, and surely his performance then marks him as the first choice among the artists of the season past.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, SUND
OCTOBER 12.

Monteux Opens Boston Season

THE season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Lyric Theatre on November 5 opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasion Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce.

As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript, "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diagilev's Russian ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed, the indefatigable conductor

From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

MUSIC REBORN.

Pollyanna, distractedly searching the [illegible] confirmation of her musical bodies a programs of interest and variety.

Just to prove that other cities besides out own can produce bands of symphonic caliber, New York and Boston will share with us, as formerly, Mr. Damrosch and his admirable players, and M. Monteux and his associates from the Hub. The operatic season,

BALTIMORE NEWS
Sunday, Oct. 12, 1919

Boston Symphony Concert Series.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought a number of new scores with him when he returned a short time ago from France, and his program this season will comprise some striking works of recent composition representing different schools.

He will direct his first Baltimore concert of the season on November 5, and at this and the succeeding four engagements distinguished soloists will be heard.

Among these is Emmy Destinn, who is again in New York after having been abroad for several years, and who, it is said, now prefers to be called Destinnova. The difficulties she experienced as a virtual prisoner of war were much discussed in the public press of this country and a great deal of sympathy for her aroused.

She is considered one of the best artists the Metropolitan Opera has had in recent years and her return to its boards is being eagerly anticipated. When travel was resumed last spring she went to London and made a number of appearances at

EAGLE OCT 12 1919
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its customary series of concerts in the Academy, the first scheduled for November 7, opened its season last Friday and Saturday in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux plans many novelty for the coming year including new symphonies by d'Indy and Jure, and orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet "Play," and of Strainsky's "Bird of Fire." Wagner is to return and possibly Richard St

om BROOKLYN EDITION
dress New York City
te OCT 12 1919

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger in no previous season, and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities.

There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which lies ahead of him. In France last summer he collected many new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. In short, "the best of every epoch and every school" is his motto, and with an extensive reputation for versatile and cosmopolitan tastes, he is well able to carry out such a motto.

Although notable groups of soloists have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past, no group has been more illustrious than the five selected for the season to come. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement—devoted to composition. The return of the greatest of violinists to the concert stage is eagerly awaited by an expectant public.

Mme. Emmy Destinn, erstwhile prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been detained in Bohemia (where she was born) and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the West, where she has her stronger affiliations. When the channels of travel opened she immediately went to London, where she has been enjoying an unprecedented success in the leading rôles at Covent Garden. She arrived in New York a few days ago.

Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has long been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Her devoted following, who will remember her former appearances in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, grow in enthusiasm season after season.

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish-American baritone, will be welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts by those who admire his mellow voice and his distinctive interpretative powers in recital.

Taking the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, Sergei Rachmaninoff is surely the right one to return. Landing unexpectedly in New York last autumn, a virtual exile from Russia, where the Bolsheviki had requisitioned his estate, the great Russian musician convinced his American audiences in a few hearings that his pre-eminent place among pianists is relatively as high as his place among composers.

HERALD
ew York City
P 12 1919

Five Great Or... Talk wit...

New Symphony Under Bodanzky Contender for Supremacy with th... Philharmonic and Symphony.

By PAUL MORRIS.

Formerly two local symphony orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Society, were in competition with the Boston Orchestra for local supremacy. But with the upheaval in the ranks of the Boston musicians which followed the overthrow of its German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and a reorganization of the personnel, two series rival organizations have been attracting the attention of the musical world. Frequently the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, comes to Carnegie Hall to challenge comparison with local orchestras, and the comparison is not unfavorable to the visitors. And now a new and serious contender has sprung up in New York, the New Symphony Orchestra, which opened its second season last Thursday night.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
e K OCT 11

ORCHESTRAL PROJECTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has one hundred and ten concerts scheduled, ten to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday ev... Saturday afternoons beginning November 6. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has brought from France a large number of new scores—French, Italian and Russian.

ABLISHED 1861 PRESS
rom PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

The session of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music, November third (season tickets to be had at Heppe's opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. As Horatio T. Parker has recently written in "The Boston Transcript," "The trustees of the Orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that tages the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan| In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last Summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Itabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play, and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak, and Tschaikowsky.

* * *

From American Baltimore, Md.

OCT 12 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Lyric Theater, on November 5 (season tickets to be had at Albaugh's). There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra will produce under his eminent leadership. As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux for conductor. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghiley's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the symphony orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

n INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
12 1919

The season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3, (season tickets to be had at Heppe's), opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his leadership will produce.

The Matinee Musical Club of Philadelphia offers a prize of one hundred dollars ($100) for a cantata, subject to be selected by the composer, suitable for women's chorus with incidental solo parts. The cantata shall not exceed forty nor less than twenty minutes in length. Manuscripts must be submitted with piano score. It is imperative that all manuscripts be sent to the secretary by November 1, 1919, at which time the contest closes. Manuscript music is first-class mail.

RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 12 19

—The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 8. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, brought a large number of scores from France last summer. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and has definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public

Boston Symphony's Conductor and Soloists

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1919

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the orchestra at the five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music. The assisting artists at the various concerts are: Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Emmy Destinn, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

COMING EVENTS

Since the subscription sales for the Boston Symphony concerts take place earlier in other cities than in Philadelphia, where season tickets will be available one week from tomorrow, it is possible to predict one of the busiest and most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra. A schedule of 110 concerts lies ahead. A great interest attaches to the new conductor, Pierre Monteux—in several cities virtually every seat is sold out in advance.

There promises to be a similar interest in Philadelphia, where, beginning October 13, at Heppe's Music Store, 1119 Chestnut Street, tickets for the five evening concerts on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 17, may be had for the same nominal price at which they were sold last year.

In Boston the orchestra is already rehearsing for the initial concerts take place there next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteux, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but could not leave his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House except for a short time, when he conducted the opening concerts here and elsewhere, has been indefatigable in preparations for the seasons to come. In France last Summer he collected a large number of new scores by French, Russian and Italian composers, from which his choice new music may be diverse. America works of worth he has also in mind, n does he in any way intened to slight t classics. In short, he inteneds to ma his programs cosmopolitan in accor ance with the reputation for versatil which stretches far behind him in h career upon two continents. Every n tion will have its showing and eve epoch.

Surely five soloists, more illustrious than the famous artists who are to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919-20, could not be found. The misfortunes of war have prevented two fine musicians from musical activity in this country—Fritz Kreisler, who has been in voluntary retirement, and Emmy Destinn, who has been bottled up in Bohemia (her birthplace) and unable to cross the lines of conflict. Engaged as soloists for the coming season. Fritz Kreisler will soon be heard again, and Mme. Destinn recently arrived in New York.

If Mme. Destinn was an indispensable soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Louise Homer is no less its indispensable contralto. The perennial charm of her voice and person, in which the freshness of youth and the character of maturity are blended, needs no emphasis. Emilio de Gogorza, the most popular barytone of the concer stage, unlike Mme. Homer, is not familiar here as a soloist with this orchestra. His American birth makes the American public his own, while his Spanish aristocratic descent lends a distinctive color to his voice and his interpretations.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the greatest pianist of Russia, is the only soloist of last year to return, and surely his performance then marks him as the first choice among the artists of the season past.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, SUND
OCTOBER 12.

Monteux Opens Boston Season

THE season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Lyric Theatre on November 5 opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasion Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce.

As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript, "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diagilev's Russian ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed, the indefatigable conductor

From PRESS
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

MUSIC REBORN.

Pollyanna, distractedly searching the [illegible] musical bodies a confirmation of her grams of interest and variety.

Just to prove that other cities besides our own can produce bands of symphonic caliber, New York and Boston will share with us, as formerly, Mr. Damrosch and his admirable players, and M. Monteux and his associates [illegible]. The operatic season,

BALTIMORE NEWS
Sunday, Oct. 12, 1919
Boston Symphony Concert Series.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought a number of new scores with him when he returned a short time ago from France, and his program this season will comprise some striking works of recent composition representing different schools.

He will direct his first Baltimore concert of the season on November 5, and at this and the succeeding four engagements distinguished soloists will be heard.

Among these is Emmy Destinn, who is again in New York after having been abroad for several years, and who, it is said, now prefers to be called Destinnova. The difficulties she experienced as a virtual prisoner of war were much discussed in the public press of this country and a great deal of sympathy for her aroused.

She is considered one of the best artists the Metropolitan Opera has had in recent years and her return to its boards is being eagerly anticipated. When travel was resumed last spring she went to London and made a number of appearances at

EAGLE OCT 17 1919
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its customary series of concerts in the Academy, the first scheduled for November 7, opened its season last Friday and Saturday in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux plans many a novelty for the coming year including new symphonies by d'Indy and Ilure, and orchestral performances of Debussy's ballet "Play," and of Strainsky's "Bird of Fire." Wagner is to turn and possibly Richard St

LEDGER—PHILA[illegible]
DELPHIA, SUNDAY
NING, OCTOBER 12

The season of Boston Symphony concerts, which begins here in the Academy of Music November 3 (season tickets to be had at Heppe's), opened in Phonhy Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Mohteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this city and in every other city where the orchestra is to perform. As H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more prom ising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music. In the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years the symphony orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background." Indeed, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud and definitely announced new symphonies by D'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He hopes to perform Franck's "Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers—among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

om BROOKLYN EDITION
dress New York City
te OCT 12 1919

From every sign of the last subscription sales in various cities for the coming season of the Boston Symphony concerts, the orchestra is about to enter upon one of its busiest and most successful seasons. The subscription sales in the various cities have been larger in no previous season, and an exceptionally eager interest is manifest in Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who, it will be remembered, was offered the conductorship last year, but unable to relinquish his duties as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, except temporarily, directed the first eleven Boston Symphony concerts in this and other cities.

There are to be in all 110 concerts, and five of these in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 18.

Since the concerts begin in Boston next Friday and Saturday, rehearsals are already under way. Mr. Monteux has spared no labor in preparing for the season which lies ahead of him. In France last summer he collected many new scores, French, Italian and Russian. Several new American works he has particularly in mind to perform. He will not bar Wagner, nor will he neglect the old for the new. In short, "the best of every epoch and every school" is his motto, and with an extensive reputation for versatile and cosmopolitan tastes, he is well able to carry out such a motto.

Although notable groups of soloists have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past, no group has been more illustrious than the five selected for the season to come. Fritz Kreisler is about to emerge from his voluntary retirement—devoted to composition. The return of the greatest of violinists to the concert stage is eagerly awaited by an expectant public.

Mme. Emmy Destinn, erstwhile prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been detained in Bohemia (where she was born) and unable for several seasons to cross the lines of conflict to the West, where she has her stronger affiliations. When the channels of travel opened she immediately went to London, where she has been enjoying an unprecedented success in the leading rôles at Covent Garden. She arrived in New York a few days ago.

Mme. Louise Homer, as a contralto, has been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Company. Her devoted following, remember her former appearis city with the Boston Symgrow in enthusiasm sea- the popular Spanishll be welcomed as a concerts by those ce and his dis- in recital. applause at the Rachreturn. ork last Russia, itioned his sician conces in a few t place among as his place

HERALD
ew York City
1 2 1919

Five Great Or Talk with

New Symphony Under Bodanzky a Contender for Supremacy with the Philharmonic and Symphony.

By PAUL MORRIS.

Formerly two local symphony orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Society, were in competition with the Boston Orchestra for local supremacy. But with the upheaval in the ranks of the Boston musicians which followed the overthrow of its German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and a reorganization of the personnel, two series rival organizations have been attracting the attention of the musical world. Frequently the Philadelphia orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, comes to Carnegie Hall to challenge comparison with local orchestras, and the comparison is not unfavorable to the visitors. And now a new and serious contender has sprung up in New York, the New Symphony Orchestra, which opened its second season last Thursday night.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
e K OCT 11

ORCHESTRAL PROJECTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has one hundred and ten concerts scheduled, ten to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday [illegible]

ABLISHED 1861
rom PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 12 1919

The session of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music, November third (season tickets to be had at Heppe's opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierce Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his eminent leadership will produce. As Horatio T. Parker has recently written in "The Boston Transcript," "The trustees of the Orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name he strove manfully against the routine that tages the regular and the easier way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan| In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

Indeed the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last Summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Itabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play, and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire"; he hopes to perform Franck's Beatitudes" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred. Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahma, Liszt, Dvorak, and Techaikowsky.

* * *

From American
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 12 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Lyric Theater, on November 5 (season tickets to be had at Albaugh's). There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra will produce under his eminent leadership. As Mr. H. T. Parker has recently written in the Boston Transcript: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardhave made a more promising choice Mr. Monteux for conductor. He open-minded as he is widely symphonic music; in the days oncerts in Paris that bore his strove manfully against the hat takes the regular and the way. Not for nothing did he own Europe as the chief Mr. Diaghiley's Russian for nothing has he been French opera for two he eclectic Metropolitan. ears, the symphony orhardly had a conductor nopolitan a background."

INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 12 1919

The season of Boston Symphony concerts which will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3, (season tickets to be had at Heppe's), opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, on which occasions Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, was received with great enthusiasm. There is an exceptional interest in this and each city where the orchestra is to perform, in the results which his leadership will produce.

The Matinee Musical Club of Philadelphia offers a prize of one hundred dollars ($100) for a cantata, subject to be selected by the composer, suitable for women's chorus with incidental solo parts. The cantata shall not exceed forty nor less than twenty minutes in length. Manuscripts must be submitted with piano score. It is imperative that all manuscripts be sent to the secretary by November 1, 1919, at which time the contest closes. Manuscript music is first-class mail.

RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 12 1919

—The season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin here in the Academy of Music November 3. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, brought a large number of scores from France last summer. He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and has definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure, symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet, "Play," and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He will produce several American scores for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm. The music of no school or land will be barred—Wagner will be readmitted immediately and Strauss later if public

TIGHT BINDING

MON

NCERT-CHRONICLE

SAT

SY WEEK-END TO BEGIN THE SEASON

Another Auspicious Audience for Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra—Two Generations and Mme. Schumann-Heink—The New Elman Who Has Conquered His Own Excesses—D'Indy's Symphony of the War in Near Prospect—Mr. Malkin Passes to Chicago

THE audience assembled last Saturday at the first evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra received Mr. Monteux as conductor with a more confident and, therefore, heartier warmth than had the company of Friday afternoon. Slightly cynical bystanders have been known to remark that the applause of the listeners by day to the Symphony Concerts is often hesitant, unless piece or performer much pleases or much bores them; whereas the hearers by night let their hands speak their minds more frankly, more firmly. By further hint of these cynics, the second audience of the week is the more assertive in likes or dislikes because it has been prepared and fortified in opinion by the judgments of the reviewers upon the concert of Friday afternoon. True, those judgments do not always agree one with another; but—to cite the cynics yet again—many a listener of Saturday has guide, counsellor and friend in the newspapers and distributes plaudits accordingly, comfortable in the faith that they fall upon the right person or the right thing. Needless, almost, to say, only young and innocent reviewers smile with honest pleasure at these sayings of the cynics. Out of long experience, the elders know that they influence readers—to use a large word for a small matter—only when those readers discover in print a reason for their own predilections. All this, however, is neither here nor there beside the obvious fact that the audience of Saturday gave many and repeated signs of clear good-will for Mr. Monteux and of sincere pleasure in the music he chose and the performance he brought to pass. As stimulating to see were the numbers and the quality of this applausive company, on both scores excelling the assemblages of Saturday evenings for two seasons past. In particular hardly a seat at moderate prices stood empty; while youth was pleasantly visible throughout the hall. In that youth and possibly in those seats sits the future of the Symphony Concerts.

As agreeable to note were he rising plaudits for the rising band when Mr. Monteux called the orchestra to its feet at the end of Beeethoven's symphony. For, if the conductor is the keystone of the Symphony Concerts, the men are no less the arch upholding them. It was a large orchestra, moreover, that Mr. Monteux employed in this relatively slender music—the full string choir, the wood-winds doubled and tripled. Thereby he not only balanced his forces but the more readily persuaded hearers that this symphony in D major, early Beethoven though it is, is clearly of the Beethoven who was to write the seven of the future. With such an orchestra and at the conductor's speeding pace, the first movement gained a truly Beethovenish ardor of stride and fervor of progress; while the scherzo sounded with an equally Beethovenish brusquerie. In the slow movement, likewise, Mr. Monteux's ear and imagination guided his many voices to that golden warmth and depth of instrumental song which are as truly of Beethoven—and of hardly another. And yet, and yet, it was possible to feel, here and there in the first movement and in the finale, that a finer flexibility would better have served the music than this vigor seldom relaxed.

Upon some ears listening to Albeniz's suite, "Catalonia," for a second time, it hardly bettered the impression of the first hearing as a rude, thick-fingered, monotonous music. Yet those ears may be overaccustomed to the teeming pictorial fancies, to the subtleties of treatment, in which the Debussy of "Iberia" or the Ravel of a "Spanish Rhapsody" dresses his Spanish music. Or else they expect the glamours of instrumental color with which Wolf in his opera, "Der Corregidor," or Rimsky-Korsakov in his "Spanish Caprice," wove his more distant imaginings of Spain. Our colleague of The Post may [illegible] he true notion of Albeniz's mus[illegible] finds next it image of a jostling, [illegible] of pot-bellied folk, lusty in [illegible] way and byway, or leering [illegible] ern to the rhythms of ro[illegible] reiterated dance. Yet Cha[illegible]er did not lack these vigors—and a great gulf fixed separates "Catalonia" from his "España." No more does Laparra in his suite, "A Basque Sunday," heard only last spring in Boston, miss this starkness—and he is incisively graphic where Albeniz merely smudges.

[illegible] voice. [illegible]e out of [illegible] Elman song- [illegible]dy of Chaikov- [illegible]ranscription of the "The Mastersingers." [illegible] he over-accent, smear or [illegible] as in older, less continent [illegible]al days. Rather, the best of [illegible]nat ever told Walther's dream of [illegible]night have envied the violinist's voice, [illegible]king phrase to phrase in ascending chain of ecstatic song, warming, undulating it as with inner emotion glowing into tonal speech. And there are those who would still this Richard Wagner!

Items and Announcements

The new symphony that the late war stirred Mr. d'Indy to write will be played for the first times in the United States at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, and Saturday evening, Oct. 25. By exception, it bears Latin title, "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico, MCMXVI-MCMXIX," which is to say, "Short Symphony About the War of the French 1916-1919." The music runs in four divisions labelled thus:

I. Slow and Tranquil: Slow and Anxious.
II. With Sufficient Speed.
III. Slow.
IV. Very Amendedly: Slow: Majestic.

Mr. Monteux completes the programme with the overture to Beethoven's one and only ballet "Prometheus's Folk" and a single slow dance, with Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyl" and with Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." As ironic coincidence has it, the mature d'Indy and the mature Wagner reënter the Symphony Concerts simultaneously.

The first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, for the new season, befalls on Thursday evening next. The programme is that announced by Mr. Monteux for the concerts of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall—Enesco's many-voiced suite; Schumann's glowing "Spring" symphony and Dvoràk's concerto for violin with Mr. Spalding playing the solo part.

Mr. Josef Malkin, the departed first violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra, has passed to the like chair in the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Stock. Early in November he will play his annual concerto.

The Apollo Club of [illegible] singers [illegible]

PUBLISHED 1881 SEP 21 1919

rom
Journal
Providence, R. I.

To-day's events may fairly be said to inaugurate the local musical season, with a concert of most unusual interest and the first meeting of the Community Chorus. And although the two principal concert series around which the year's musical programme centres do not open till November, the various clubs and other organizations are beginning their active work for the winter. The churches, too, are looking forward to greater attention to musical phases of worship than has been possible for the past two winters, and numerous special programmes are to be provided.

A preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence season shows the concert dates to be Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6. The soloists are not yet scheduled for this series, but the presence of the orchestra's new conductor, Pierre Monteaux, will lend the early concerts especial interest. M. Monteaux has brought a number of new scores from France, but has promised a cosmopolitan policy of programme making which will slight no school of interest, whether American or foreign, old or new. His musicians are now assembled in Boston and rehearsals will begin this week.

The Steinert Sunday afternoon series

According to another of these traveller's tales, Mr. Toscanini "had heard that important changes in the personnel and the repertory of the Boston Orchestra had been made, for political reasons, and he has no patience with his association of art with politics. 'I think it is ridiculous,' he said, 'to claim that any political propaganda can be, or ever is, made through the medium of any form of art. You will see that Wagner will have his triumphant reentry into the civilized world in all countries, and that very shortly. People are hungry for his music. And, you know, anything the public wants it generally gets in the end.'"

MR. MONTEUX NEWLY TESTED

Conductor and Orchestra in the Unsparing Acoustics of Sanders Theatre at Cambridge—A Concerto for Another Side of His Abilities—A Feat for the Strings in Enesco's Music

FOR many a year the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, under the auspices of the university, have usually been a repetition of pieces recently played in Boston. Last evening, when a new series began in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Monteux, who has the courage of his own ways, reversed precedent and proposed to his hearers the programme of the concerts today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, with the "assisting artist"—Mr. Spalding, the violinist—summoned to them. Those hearers filled every place in the concert-room, as they did not always do last winter under the dispensation of Rabaud. Many were the "officers of instruction and government"; not too few were the instructed, governed and, this time, pleasured students. For both, following Mr. Higginson's precept and practice, the cost of the concerts is kept low—lower probably, than for any series of similar quality and prestige the country over. Therefore, do the miscellaneous folk of Cambridge flock to them and occasional outlanders from Boston over the Charles

As one of the university dowagers affirmed last evening in a carrying, even a circumambient, voice, "There were many persons in the house whom she had never seen in her life!" In spite of that predicament, they were none the less good to see. The wider, the more various the public of the Symphony Concerts in either Boston or Cambridge, the firmer is the present and the future. On both sides of the Charles, one and another who would enjoy them stays away in mistaken notion that they are for the elect only. They are not—in spite even of marvelling and distressed dowagers.

With courtesy, interest, good will, this company applauded Mr. Monteux when he came to his place; then warmed to him, as he well deserved, through the course of the concert—best of rewards for a conductor newly come to a practised audience. Being also an audience in Cambridge, it recalled Mr. Spalding twice and thrice, again according to his deserts; while at the end of Schumann's "Spring" symphony, it clapped heartily the standing orchestra. For it, in some respects, the wooden walls and the consequent resonance of Sanders Theatre were a severer test than Symphony Hall had been a week ago. Across the Charles, every detail of music and performance stands as clear as conductor and orchestra may make it. There also the listener hears quality of tone unclouded, undiminished. Moreover, one of the pieces upon the programme happened to be Enesco's suite. The first division falls to the string-choir only, plus a kettle-drum toward the end and throughout in unison. Enesco has written it in bold and incisive phrases, in sharp contrasts, vivid transitions, mounting periods.

Continued on Following Page

MONTEUX NEWLY TESTED

Continued from Preceding Page

The writers of music in the eighteenth century loved this propulsive force, the penetrating power of striding strings singing in a single voice. Enesco, instructed musician, has assimilated their proud affection, but he is also musician with an individual ardor, a barbaric tang of his own. So does the first division of his suite cut the air with these united strings and cleaving it, strike fire. As the choir of the orchestra played it, as Mr. Monteux led it, the music rang upon the ear, strode across the imagination. Up and down the choir, power, pliancy, precision were at one. The conductor perceived the breadth of Enesco's pattern, caught the intensity with which the composer weaves it. The audience knew the sweep, even the splendor, of this naked music.

In the relative routine of the rest of the chosen music, the strings equally pleasured the ear—in euphony with Mr. Spalding's violin or in bright background for it through Dvoràk's concerto; in the warmly phrased instrumental song of Schumann's symphony; in the reiterated and heightened emphases and ascents of Enesco's sharp-set finale. The wood-winds were as fortunate in the unsparing acoustics of Sanders Theatre, especially when some single voice among them isolated a few measures of the songful Schumann or threaded about the main stem of the music one or another of his fanciful ornaments. Full-throated and rich-voiced were the horns also with his song; while they, the trumpets and Mr. Monteux as well, warmed to that exuberant phrase in which he proclaims the coming of the spring. If the Symphony Orchestra is still to be accounted a "new" Symphony Orchestra seldom has it better proved individual and collective quality than it did last evening. Add to the music then played Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" of last week at Symphony Hall; recall the performance and not an essential and scarcely a distinction of orchestral playing seems now lacking to it.

The conductor bore as well the sharp test of Sanders Theatre and the new test of a concerto in which the orchestra partners a solo instrument. Mr. Monteux has gathered long experience with dancers, mimes and singers in opera houses. Therefore he accompanies well in the glorified sense in which the word designates the orchestral part of a concerto. He was considerately sympathetic, stimulating with Mr. Spalding; he had a keen ear for the "solo violin" in relation to the other instrumental voices; yet he was mindful of the progress, the unity of the concerto as a whole. As operatic conductor, also, Mr. Monteux knows and cherishes the large, keen, direct impression upon his hearers. So he swept through Enesco's "prelude in unison" and his glinting, snapping finale; and so he caught the exuberance of Schumann's symphony of the spring. He made the music "sound," even when the composer's clumsiness or artlessness of hand momentarily dulls it—"sound" with the sheer eagerness of outpoured song at the beginning, with the sheer happy fancy of the scherzo of the folk at play; with the gentler song that suffuses the slow division, with the gayer song of the finale. Whatever French conductors do or fail to do with Germa[illegible] romantic music, they have ears for instrumental song. In Mr. Monteux are also the perception and the skill can exercise fine as well as large to this end. He can use the adroit he has the sensitive ear. Now and only does he yield to the temptat set his orchestra in too firm, too cut masses of tone.

H. T. P[illegible]

In Full Tide of Music and Mood

(Photograph by Matzene)

Albert Spalding

As He Comes Back From the Wars to the Concert-Halls

rom[illegible]

ddress New York City

Date[illegible]

K 100

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsing. One hundred and certs are scheduled, and New Yo of several cities where the series sold out in advance. For the ten to take place in Carnegie Hall on T evenings and Saturday afternoons ber 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, Ja and 10, February 5 and 7, March 20), all seats are engaged; however cations may be filed with W. H. R Symphony Hall, Boston. Pierre Mo the new conductor, has been indefa in his efforts to assure a season of tional interest. Returning from late in August, he brought with him a number of new scores, French, Italian Russian. He bears also in mind American works of merit. Withal, announced a cosmopolitan policy, will exclude no schools. The great phonists of the past are by no means slighted.

(Continued on Page 11)

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16,

musical

Ending a Chapter

Conductors and other members of the company at the Metropolitan Opera House, returning from summer journeys to Italy bring back interesting word from Mr. Toscanini, about his dealings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the trustees invited him to lead it—presumably in the summer of 1918, possibly later. "He told me," says one of these gossippers, "that he would have liked to accept the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that he would certainly have come to America in response to the [illegible] were it not that the proposition was [illegible] too late. He had already made his [illegible] for the year, and they could not be [illegible]ed. He seems to have given up any [illegible]r operatic work, and is devoting [illegible] the concert field, especially to

TIGHT BINDING

...NCERT-CHRONICLE

SAT...

...SY WEEK-END TO BEGIN THE SEASON

Another Auspicious Audience for Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra—Two Generations and Mme. Schumann-Heink—The New Elman Who Has Conquered His Own Excesses—D'Indy's Symphony of the War in Near Prospect—Mr. Malkin Passes to Chicago

THE audience assembled last Saturday at the first evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra received Mr. Monteux as conductor with a more confident and, therefore, heartier warmth than had the company of Friday afternoon. Slightly cynical bystanders have been known to remark that the applause of the listeners by day to the Symphony Concerts is often hesitant, unless piece or performer much pleases or much bores them; whereas the hearers by night let their hands speak their minds more frankly, more firmly. By further hint of these cynics, the second audience of the week is the more assertive in likes or dislikes because it has been prepared and fortified in opinion by the judgments of the reviewers upon the concert of Friday afternoon. True, those judgments do not always agree one with another; but—to cite the cynics yet again—many a listener of Saturday has guide, counsellor and friend in the newspapers and distributes plaudits accordingly, comfortable in the faith that they fall upon the right person or the right thing. Needless, almost, to say, only young and innocent reviewers smile with honest pleasure at these sayings of the cynics. Out of long experience, the elders know that they influence readers—to use a large word for a small matter—only when those readers discover in print a reason for their own predilections. All this, however, is neither here nor there beside the obvious fact that the audience of Saturday gave many and repeated signs of clear good-will for Mr. Monteux and of sincere pleasure in the music he chose and the performance he brought to pass. As stimulating to see were the numbers and the quality of this applausive company, on both scores excelling the assemblages of Saturday evenings for two seasons past. In particular hardly a seat at moderate prices stood empty; while youth was pleasantly visible throughout the hall. In that youth and possibly in those seats sits the future of the Symphony Concerts.

As agreeable to note were the rising plaudits for the rising band when Mr. Monteux called the orchestra to its feet at the end of Beeethoven's symphony. For, if the conductor is the keystone of the Symphony Concerts, the men are no less the arch upholding them. It was a large orchestra, moreover, that Mr. Monteux employed in this relatively slender music—the full string choir, the wood-winds doubled and tripled. Thereby he not only balanced his forces but the more readily persuaded hearers that this symphony in D major, early Beethoven though it is, is clearly of the Beethoven who was to write the seven of the future. With such an orchestra and at the conductor's speeding pace, the first movement gained a truly Beethovenish ardor of stride and fervor of progress; while the scherzo sounded with an equally Beethovenish brusquerie. In the slow movement, likewise, Mr. Monteux's ear and imagination guided his many voices to that golden warmth and depth of instrumental song which are as truly of Beethoven—and of hardly another. And yet, and yet, it was possible to feel, here and there in the first movement and in the finale, that a finer flexibility would better have served the music than this vigor seldom relaxed.

Upon some ears listening to Albeniz's suite, "Catalonia," for a second time, it hardly bettered the impression of the first hearing as a rude, thick-fingered, monotonous music. Yet those ears may be overaccustomed to the teeming pictorial fancies, to the subtleties of treatment, in which the Debussy of "Iberia" or the Ravel of a "Spanish Rhapsody" dresses his Spanish music. Or else they expect the glamours of instrumental color with which Wolf in his opera, "Der Corregidor," or Rimsky-Korsakov in his "Spanish Caprice," wove his more distant imaginings of Spain. Our colleague of The Post may [illegible] he true motion of Albeniz's mus[illegible] finde[illegible]xt it image of a jostling, ... of pot-bellied folk, lusty in ... way and byway, or leering ... ern to the rhythms of ro... reiterated dance. Yet Cha...er did not lack these vigors—and a great gulf fixed separates "Catalonia" from his "España." No more does Laparra in his suite, "A Basque Sunday," heard only last spring in Boston, miss this starkness—and he is incisively graphic where Albeniz merely smudges.

...

...TRANSCRIPT, THURS...

musical

...DAY, OCTOBER 16,

Ending a Chapter

Conductors and other members of the company at the Metropolitan Opera House, returning from summer journeys to Italy bring back interesting word from Mr. Toscanini, about his dealings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the trustees invited him to lead it—presumably in the summer of 1918, possibly later. "He told me," says one of these gossippers, "that he would have liked to accept the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that he would certainly ... come to America in response to the ... were it not that the proposition was ... too late. He had already made his ... for the year, and they could not be ...ed. He seems to have given up any ...r operatic work, and is devoting ... the concert field, especially to ...

...voice. ...e out of ... Elman song- ...ody of Chaikov- ...anscription of the "The Mastersingers." ...he over-accent, smear or ... as in older, less continent ...al days. Rather, the best of ...hat ever told Walther's dream of ...night have envied the violinist's voice, ...king phrase to phrase in ascending chain of ecstatic song, warming, undulating it as with inner emotion glowing into tonal speech. And there are those who would still this Richard Wagner!

Items and Announcements

The new symphony that the late war stirred Mr. d'Indy to write will be played for the first times in the United States at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, and Saturday evening, Oct. 25. By exception, it bears Latin title, "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico, MCMXVI-MCMXIX," which is to say, "Short Symphony About the War of the French 1916-1919." The music runs in four divisions labelled thus:

I. Slow and Tranquil: Slow and Anxious.
II. With Sufficient Speed.
III. Slow.
IV. Very Amendedly: Slow: Majestic.

Mr. Monteux completes the programme with the overture to Beethoven's one and only ballet "Prometheus's Folk" and a single slow dance, with Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyl" and with Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." As ironic coincidence has it, the mature d'Indy and the mature Wagner reënter the Symphony Concerts simultaneously.

The first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, for the new season, befalls on Thursday evening next. The programme is that announced by Mr. Monteux for the concerts of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall—Enesco's many-voiced suite; Schumann's glowing "Spring" symphony and Dvorák's concerto for violin with Mr. Spalding playing the solo part.

Mr. Josef Malkin, the departed first violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra, has passed to the like chair in the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Stock. Early in November he will play his annual concerto.

The Apollo Club of ... men singers ...

...to ...ne ...of ...po... ...as... ...lis... ...st... ...f... ...h... ...k... ...c... ...t... ...I... ...v... ...t... ...I... ...f... ...c... ...l... ...e... ...n... ...c... ...s... ...a... ...ur... ...pe... ...s... ...ll a... ...t. ...e... ...n... ...h... ...y... ...f... ...e... ...e... ...s... ...or... ...se...

According to another of these traveller's tales, Mr. Toscanini "had heard that important changes in the personnel and the repertory of the Boston Orchestra had been made, for political reasons, and he has no patience with this association of art with politics. 'I think it is ridiculous,' he said, 'to claim that any political propaganda can be, or ever is, made through the medium of any form of art. You will see that Wagner will have his triumphant reentry into the civilized world in all countries, and that very shortly. People are hungry for his music. And, you know, anything the public wants it generally gets in the end.'"

MR. MONTEUX NEWLY TESTED

Conductor and Orchestra in the Unsparing Acoustics of Sanders Theatre at Cambridge—A Concerto for Another Side of His Abilities—A Feat for the Strings in Enesco's Music

FOR many a year the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, under the auspices of the university, have usually been a repetition of pieces recently played in Boston. Last evening, when a new series began in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Monteux, who has the courage of his own ways, reversed precedent and proposed to his hearers the programme of the concerts today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, with the "assisting artist"—Mr. Spalding, the violinist—summoned to them. Those hearers filled every place in the concert-room, as they did not always do last winter under the dispensation of Rabaud. Many were the "officers of instruction and government"; not too few were the instructed, governed and, this time, pleasured students. For both, following Mr. Higginson's precept and practice, the cost of the concerts is kept low—lower probably, than for any series of similar quality and prestige the country over. Therefore, do the miscellaneous folk of Cambridge flock to them and occasional outlanders from Boston over the Charles

PUBLISHED 1881
SEP 21 ...
rom
Journal
Providence, R. I.

To-day's events may fairly be said to inaugurate the local musical season, with a concert of most unusual interest and the first meeting of the Community Chorus. And although the two principal concert series around which the year's musical programme centres do not open till November, the various clubs and other organizations are beginning their active work for the winter. The churches, too, are looking forward to greater attention to musical phases of worship than has been possible for the past two winters, and numerous special programmes are to be provided.

A preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence season shows the concert dates to be Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6. The soloists are not yet scheduled for this series, but the presence of the orchestra's new conductor, Pierre Monteaux, will lend the early concerts especial interest. M. Monteaux has brought a number of new scores from France, but has promised a cosmopolitan policy of programme making which will slight no school of interest, whether American or foreign, old or new. His musicians are now assembled in Boston and rehearsals will begin this week.

The Steinert Sunday afternoon series

In Full Tide of Music and Mood

(Photograph by Matzene)

Albert Spalding

As He Comes Back From the Wars to the Concert-Halls

As one of the university dowagers affirmed last evening in a carrying, even a circumambient, voice, "There were many persons in the house whom she had never seen in her life!" In spite of that predicament, they were none the less good to see. The wider, the more various the public of the Symphony Concerts in either Boston or Cambridge, the firmer is the present and the future. On both sides of the Charles, one and another who would enjoy them stays away in mistaken notion that they are for the elect only. They are not—in spite even of marvelling and distressed dowagers.

With courtesy, interest, good will, this company applauded Mr. Monteux when he came to his place; then warmed to him, as he well deserved, through the course of the concert—best of rewards for a conductor newly come to a practised audience. Being also an audience in Cambridge, it recalled Mr. Spalding twice and thrice, again according to his deserts; while at the end of Schumann's "Spring" symphony, it clapped heartily the standing orchestra. For it, in some respects, the wooden walls and the consequent resonance of Sanders Theatre were a severer test than Symphony Hall had been a week ago. Across the Charles, every detail of music and performance stands as clear as conductor and orchestra may make it. There also the listener hears quality of tone unclouded, undiminished. Moreover, one of the pieces upon the programme happened to be Enesco's suite. The first division falls to the string-choir only, plus a kettle-drum toward the end and throughout in unison. Enesco has written it in bold and incisive phrases, in sharp contrasts, vivid transitions, mounting periods.

Continued on Following Page

MONTEUX NEWLY TESTED

Continued from Preceding Page

The writers of music in the eighteenth century loved this propulsive force, this penetrating power of striding strings singing in a single voice. Enesco, instructed musician, has assimilated their proud affection, but he is also musician with an individual ardor, a barbaric tang of his own. So does the first division of his suite cut the air with these united strings and cleaving it, strike fire. As the choirs of the orchestra played it, as Mr. Monteux led it, the music rang upon the ear, strode across the imagination. Up and down the choir, power, pliancy, precision, were at one. The conductor perceived the breadth of Enesco's pattern, caught the intensity with which the composer weaves it. The audience knew the sweep, even the splendor, of this naked music.

In the relative routine of the rest of the chosen music, the strings equally pleasured the ear—in euphony with Mr. Spalding's violin or in bright background for it through Dvorák's concerto; in the warmly phrased instrumental song of Schumann's symphony; in the reiterated and heightened emphases and ascents of Enesco's sharp-set finale. The wood-winds were as fortunate in the unspairing acoustics of Sanders Theatre, especially when some single voice among them isolated a few measures of the songful Schumann or threaded about the main stem of the music one or another of his fanciful ornaments. Full-throated and rich-voiced were the horns also with his song; while they, the trumpets and Mr. Monteux as well, warmed to that exuberant phrase in which he proclaims the coming of the spring. If the Symphony Orchestra is still to be accounted a "new" Symphony Orchestra, seldom has it better proved individual and collective quality than it did last evening. Add to the music then played Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" of last week at Symphony Hall; recall the performance and not an essential and scarcely a distinction of orchestral playing seems now lacking to it.

The conductor bore as well the sharp tests of Sanders Theatre and the new test of a concerto in which the orchestra partners a [illegible] instrument. Mr. Monteux has gathered long experience with dancers, mimes and singers in opera houses. Therefore he accompanies well in the glorified sense in which the word designates the orchestral part of a concerto. He was considerate, sympathetic, stimulating with Mr. Spalding. He had a keen ear for the "solo voice" in relation to the other instrumental choirs; yet he was mindful of the progression the unity of the concerto as a whole. As operatic conductor, also, Mr. Monteux knows and cherishes the large, keen, direct impression upon his hearers. So he swept with Enesco's "prelude in unison" and its [illegible]. Anting, snapping finale; and so he [illegible] the exuberance of Schumann's [illegible]able hymn of the spring. He made the [illegible] sound," even when the composer's [illegible]ss or artlessness of hand momentarily ills it—"sound" with the sheer eager-[illegible] What outpoured song at the beginning, [illegible]us a sheer happy fancy of the scherzo [illegible] great folk at play; with the gentler song [illegible] play uses the slow division, with the [illegible] many[illegible]g of the finale. Whatever French [illegible] of the[illegible]rs do or fail to do with Germa[illegible] romantic music, they have ears for instrumental song. In Mr. Monteux are also the perception and the [illegible] can exercise fine as well as large to this end. He can use the adroit he has the sensitive ear. Now and only does he yield to the temptat[illegible] set his orchestra in too firm, too [illegible] cut masses of tone.

H. T. P...

...rom.....

...ddress New York City

...Date.....

K ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] rehearsing. One hundred and [illegible] certs are scheduled, and New Yo[illegible] of several cities where the series [illegible]s out in advance. For the ten[illegible] his place in Carnegie Hall on T[illegible] a c[illegible] and Saturday afternoons [illegible] ...ape ...s, December 4 and 6, J[illegible] ...uary 5 and 7, March [illegible] ...'s alive ...re engaged; however, [illegible] ...out, he p...filled with W. H. P[illegible] ...ped his c...oston. Pierre M[illegible] ...his eyes, has been indefi[illegible] ...hen I came, ...e a season of [illegible] ...s would indi... Page 11) ...yours one ...ing from P[illegible] ...with him a[illegible] ...ch, Italian[illegible] ...mind a[illegible] ...hal, Ju[illegible] ...city, [illegible] ...he great-[illegible] ...by no means

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON HERALD ROTOGRAVURE SECTION OCTOBER 19, 1919

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WAS A PRIVATE IN THE FRENCH TERRITORIAL INFANTRY

(Photograph by Garo)

Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Spent at Least Two Years of His Life in Other Than Musical Engagements. Called Out in the First Week of French Mobilization, He Fought as a Private of the 35th Territorial Infantry in the Fiercest Battles of Verdun, Soissons and the Argonne

STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
OCT

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

"Music of no school or land will be barred," a Boston Symphony Orchestra announcement for the current season says, in speaking of its repertoire as outlined by Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor. "Wagner is to be readmitted immediately, and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

"Sparing no pains to search out the best music extant for his programs, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them.

"He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure and symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet "Play" and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He hopes to perform Franck's Beatitudes and Beethoven's ninth symphony. He will produce several American scores, for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm."

May Baltimore have a large share of the new scores in the five concerts the orchestra is to give here this season.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be special soloist in Baltimore with two concert orchestras this season—at the third New York Symphony Orchestra concert on December 17, and at the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on February 4, 1920.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
ess: New York City
K SEP 30 1919

A new slant was given to the definition of a Pessimist by Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, while discussing musical tastes of Americans. "The New Yorker," Monteux said, "it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something he has heard before. He is what you might call a Pessimist, while we (the Bostonians) are Optimists. He finds out the bad; we find out the good." Do not

Boston Record Fri-Oct-10

EVENING GLOBE
ss: New York City
OCT 15 19

"Catalonia," a symphonic poem by he Spaniard Albeniz had what seems have been its first public performnce in America at the opening conrts of the Boston Symphony Orchesra in Boston last week. Albeniz is avorably known here from his piano ieces. Mr. Stransky once put "Catania" into rehearsal with the Philharonic Society, but abstained from a ublic performance. Perhaps he greed with Philip Hale, who writes s disapproval in the Boston Herald: "'Catalonia' was heard here for the irst time. The stirring reading did ot conceal the inherent poverty of he musical thought and rhetoric. To ut it bluntly, this music seemed com-onplace. . . . . Hearing 'Catalonia' one ime more and more convinced that the reat Spanish music has been written y Frenchmen—Chabrier, Ravel, Debussy, even Bizet, although Spaniards do not accept 'Carmen.'" To these renchmen Mr. Hale should have ided certainly Raoul Laparra, the inal prophet of Spain, and perhaps lso, he of the "Symphonie Espagnole," which every fiddler fiddles; lso certainly the Italian Zandonai, hose Spanish opera "Conchita" is a more notable work than his "Francesca di Rimini."

Besides, other listeners might differ ith Mr. Hale. It is to be hoped that r. Monteux will give New York a hance to judge "Catalonia" for itself when he brings the Boston band ver here, or that Mr. Stransky will nally give it at a Philharmonic conert, or both. At least it deserves a ocal hearing, for the interest in Spansh music here is growing.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
ess: New York City
K OCT 16 19

With the Musicians.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, and Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony, have solved the problem of unnecessary duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts. During his visit to Paris last summer Mr. Damrosch suggested to Mr. Monteux that the home orchestra send its program scheme to the visiting conductor at the earliest possible time. A practical result of the arrangement is already seen in the fact that Monsieur Monteux withdrew his performance of the d'Indy Symphony for his November visit to New York, because Mr. Damrosch had announced it for the same week. In turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Nov. 9, instead of the 2d, as announced, leaving the performance for Mr. Monteux in his concert of Nov. 8.

Examiner
San Francisco, Cal.
OCT 5 1919

Karl Muck, the deported former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Sweden. He has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic in October.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4

BRILLIANT SEASON

Interesting Prospectus of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One week from Monday the sale of subscription tickets for the usual series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theatre in Baltimore will begin. The orchestra is now in active preparation for one of the fullest seasons in its history, and from every sign one of the finest, for the cities where the subscription sales befall earlier than in Baltimore, virtually every seat for the winter's concerts have already been taken. A schedule of no less than 110 concerts has been arranged

From EVENING SUN OCT 17 1919
Address New York City
Date

Albert Spalding appeared this last week as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Cambridge.

From TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now rehearsing in Boston for what promises to be one of the busiest seasons in its history. One hundred and ten concerts are scheduled. Ten concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons (November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 5 and 7, and March 18 and 20).

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season of exceptional interest. Returning from France late in August, he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian.

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

REVIEW
s New York City
OCT 18 1919 A

Albert Spalding appeared this last week as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Cambridge.

COMMERCIAL TRI
s: Cincinnati, Ohio
EP 14 19

Modest Aloo, the new trombo Symphony Orchestra and wh seven years was a membe Boston Symphony Orchestra, rived in Cincinnati from his Cambridge, Mass. He has house in Avondale. His fam have been summering at San are expected here this week. Eugene Ysaye

Spalding Is First Symphony Soloist

ALBERT SPALDING

Albert Spalding, the youthful American violinist, will be the first soloist of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concerts of next week. He will play the favorite Dvorak concerto. Mr. Spalding has just returned from two years of service with the A. E. F. in Italy. He was decorated by the Italian Government.

The orchestra will play Schumann's First, or Spring, symphony, and a suite by Enesco, the Roumanian composer.

ESTABLISHED 1851
From News
Baltimore, Md.
SEP 21 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux director, will appear on November 5, December 3, January 7, Febuary 4 and March 17.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON HERALD ROTOGRAVURE SECTION OCTOBER 19, 1919

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WAS A PRIVATE IN THE FRENCH TERRITORIAL INFANTRY

(Photograph by Garo)

Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Spent at Least Two Years of His Life in Other Than Musical Engagements. Called Out in the First Week of French Mobilization, He Fought as a Private of the 35th Territorial Infantry in the Fiercest Battles of Verdun, Soissons and the Argonne

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

"Music of no school or land will be barred," a Boston Symphony Orchestra announcement for the current season says, in speaking of its repertoire as outlined by Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor. "Wagner is to be readmitted immediately, and Strauss later if public opinion is favorably inclined. No conductor is fonder of the older symphonic composers, among whom he mentioned particularly to an interviewer Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky.

"Sparing no pains to search out the best music extant for his programs, the indefatigable conductor brought so large a number of scores from France last summer that he will be unable to perform more than a small proportion of them.

"He has hinted at new works by Saint-Saens and Rabaud, and definitely announced new symphonies by d'Indy and Jean Hure and symphonic performances of Debussy's ballet "Play" and Strawinsky's "Bird of Fire." He hopes to perform Franck's Beatitudes and Beethoven's ninth symphony. He will produce several American scores, for which he has expressed a special enthusiasm."

May Baltimore have a large share of the new scores in the five concerts the orchestra is to give here this season.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be special soloist in Baltimore with two concert orchestras this season—at the third New York Symphony Orchestra concert on December 17, and at the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on February 4, 1920.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
ess: New York City

A new slant was given to the definition of a Pessimist by Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, while discussing musical tastes of Americans. "The New Yorker," Monteux said, "it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something he has heard before. He is what you might call a Pessimist, while we (the Bostonians) are Optimists. He finds out the bad; we find out the good."

Boston Record Fri. Oct 10

COMMERCIAL TRI
s: Cincinnati, Ohio
SEP 14 19

Modest Aloo, the new trombo[ne] Symphony Orchestra and who[m] seven years was a membe[r] Boston Symphony Orchestra, [ar]rived in Cincinnati from his [home] Cambridge, Mass. He has [a] house in Avondale. His fam[ily] have been summering at Sand[wich] are expected here this week.

Eugene Ysaye

Spalding Is First Symphony Soloist

ALBERT SPALDING

Albert Spalding, the youthful American violinist, will be the first soloist of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concerts of next week. He will play the favorite Dvorak concerto. Mr. Spalding has just returned from two years of service with the A. E. F. in Italy. He was decorated by the Italian Government.

The orchestra will play Schumann's First, or Spring, symphony, and a suite by Enesco, the Roumanian composer.

EVENING GLOBE
ss: New York City

"Catalonia," a symphonic poem by [Al]beniz had what seems [to] have been its first public performance in America at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last week. Albeniz is favorably known here from his piano pieces. Mr. Stransky once put "Catalonia" into rehearsal with the Philharmonic Society, but abstained from a public performance. Perhaps he agreed with Philip Hale, who writes his disapproval in the Boston Herald: "'Catalonia' was heard here for the first time. The stirring reading did not conceal the inherent poverty of the musical thought and rhetoric. To put it bluntly, this music seemed common. . . . Hearing 'Catalonia' one is more and more convinced that the best Spanish music has been written by Frenchmen—Chabrier, Ravel, Debussy, even Bizet, although Spaniards do not accept 'Carmen.'" To these Frenchmen Mr. Hale should have added certainly Raoul Laparra, the final prophet of Spain, and perhaps Malo, he of the "Symphonie Espagnole," which every fiddler fiddles; also certainly the Italian Zandonai, whose Spanish opera "Conchita" is a far more notable work than his "Francesca di Rimini."

Besides, other listeners might differ with Mr. Hale. It is to be hoped that Mr. Monteux will give New York a chance to judge "Catalonia" for itself when he brings the Boston band over here, or that Mr. Stransky will finally give it at a Philharmonic concert, or both. At least it deserves a local hearing, for the interest in Spanish music here is growing.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
ess: New York City
K OCT 16 19

With the Musicians.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, and Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony, have solved the problem of unnecessary duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts. During his visit to Paris last summer Mr. Damrosch suggested to Mr. Monteux that the home orchestra send its program scheme to the visiting conductor at the earliest possible time. A practical result of the arrangement is already seen in the fact that Monsieur Monteux withdrew his performance of the d'Indy Symphony for his November visit to New York, because Mr. Damrosch had announced it for the same week. In turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Nov. 9, instead of the 2d, as announced, leaving the performance for Mr. Monteux in his concert of Nov. 8.

Examiner
San Francisco, Cal.
OCT 5 1919

Karl Muck, the deported former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Sweden. He has been engaged to conduct two concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic in October.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4

BRILLIANT SEASON

Interesting Prospectus of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One week from Monday the sale of subscription tickets for the usual series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theatre in Baltimore will begin. The orchestra is now in active preparation for one of the fullest seasons in its history, and from every sign one of the finest, for the cities where the subscription sales befall earlier than in Baltimore, virtually every seat for the winter's concerts have already been taken. A schedule of no less than 110 concerts has been arranged.

From EVENING SUN OCT 17 1919
Address New York City
Date

Albert Spalding appeared this last week as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Cambridge.

From TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now rehearsing in Boston for what promises to be one of the busiest seasons in its history. One hundred and ten concerts are scheduled. Ten concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons (November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 5 and 7 and March 18 and 20).

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season of exceptional interest. Returning from France late in August, he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian.

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

s New York City
OCT 1 0 1919 A

Albert Spalding appeared this last week as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Cambridge.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From News
SEP 21
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux director, will appear on November 5, December 3, January 7, Febuary 4 and March 17.

PHONY GIVES ECOND CONCERT

Enthusiastic Audience, Filling Hall, Enjoys Schumann's Spring Symphony

SPALDING HEARD IN DVORAK CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Enesco, Suite for orchestra, op. 9.

Schumann's symphony, popularly known as the "Spring" symphony, has been played as a rule at these concerts in a fall or a winter month. It has thus shared the fate of overtures entitled "Spring." Thus may music cheer one by the force of contrast.

"And the spring comes slowly up this way." It does not in Schumann's symphony. It comes impetuously, with a mad rush, with the sound of waters released and exulting. Schumann's Spring is a romantic one, known chiefly by poets and musicians. Mr. Monteux gave an appropriately romantic interpretation. Seldom, if ever, have we heard so engrossing a performance, one that was from the beginning to the end so lyrically dramatic. While various episodes were adroitly introduced and dismissed, there was no halt in the continuity of the musical thought. It is an old story that while Schumann's instrumentation is generally maladroit, attempts at re-orchestration have failed. Schumann's lovely ideas must wear his dress. Yesterday this dress did not seem so drab, so rudely cut. The musical thought for once caused the orchestral clothing to be forgotten.

The pages of Dvorak's concerto that please the most are those in which the composer remembers the folk songs and dances of his Bohemia. The finale is the movement in which we recognize the true Dvorak. When he would be scholastic, when he would appear to be writing with one eye on a college of learned professors, he is labored and dull, as in the first movement of this concerto. He then seems to lose even his birthright of rhythm and color. Dvorak the naive peasant, richly endowed by nature is nearer and dearer to us than the Dvorak that was forced to be serious and profound. By what is he known today? By "From the New World" Symphony, a few songs, and transcription for violin of a Humoresral. Yet there are early orchestral works by Dvorak that might give pleasure and stir the blood if they were revived.

Mr. Albert Spalding, the solo violinist of yesterday, first thought of playing Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," but many are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the "Intellectuals" early in the war; who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame. Mr. Spalding wisely decided not to play this Fantasia. It is said that he finds Dvorak's Concerto good. There are concertos that appeal to a violinist, when they are caviare to the general. The quotation will serve, although we by no means would put Dvorak's Concerto on a level with caviare, for it is for the most part futile music. No doubt Mr. Spalding is interested in technical problems contained in it; it surely does not make demands upon his emotional nature. He played the music skilfully and modestly, and was loudly applauded for his pains.

The first movement of Enesco's Suite displayed the noble sonority and the beautiful quality of the strings, as Schumann's symphony showed the marked improvement in the section of the second violins. The minuet is curiously invented, with its suggestions of archaic form and color, while the Intermere charms by reason of its hypnotizing drone and its memories of oriental arabesques.

The hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. The season has, indeed, opened brilliantly.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: D'Indy's new symphony No. 3 ("De Bello Gallico"), which will be performed for the first time in America; Beethoven overture and Ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Liszt, "The Preludes."

OCTOBER 18, 1919

OSTON POST, SATU

YOUTHFUL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Schumann's "Spring" Given—Spalding as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Albert Spalding, the young American violinist, who recently returned to this country after service as an aviator and as a musician in the war, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The orchestral compositions were the poetic "Spring" symphony of Schumann, and the Suite, op. 9, of Enesco—a singular and fascinating piece of music.

SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY

The performance of Schumann's Symphony was, on the whole, the finest the writer has heard. To many a celebrated conductor this music is a stumbling block. It is too simple for a leader who relies on striking effects to pull him through. It is too sincere, too youthful, too poetic for one without youth and poetry in him to hope to interpret. Then there is the question of orchestral effect. Schumann, who wrote this symphony with spring and love in his heart, knew what orchestral effects he wanted, but did not always know how to secure them in a practical way. This is acknowledged. Unfortunately, there are many conductors who are content to excuse a dull performance on these grounds.

The conductor cannot so easily relinquish his own responsibility when he interprets this lovely work. He must get the full value of every note in the score, make every detail susceptible of color tell, develop the hints of what the composer wants into concrete effects, meet the creator of the music half way and assist him to deliver his message.

Glowing With Color

Mr. Monteux did all this. He is not a man to take another man's word for what is or is not in a score. He reads the score for himself, hence generally knows what is in it. How many admirable things he did which commonly escape notice! How one tone of a horn or a flute told in the color scheme.

The orchestra glowed with color, a kind of color particularly characteristic of Schumann, native to him, inimitable by anyone else. Nor was the symphony a succession of more or less disconnected episodes, as it so often sounds. The thought was continuous, the spirit romantic. The rustles and stirrings of spring agitated the instruments. Now the music was full of a vague and beautiful melancholy, like the earth when it is burdened with the prescience of an eternity of deaths and resurrections to come, and again there was the impetuous surge of youthful emotion, warmth, love.

Simply and Eloquently Rendered

Never was the dreamy song of the violins in the second part so simply and eloquently rendered. Seldom has there been such vigor, such healthy folk-spirit, so much humor and fancy in the scherzo. The choice of tempi was singularly happy. In certain places, as in the allegro of the first movement, as in one of the strains of the scherzo, it was a trifle slower, a trifle more sturdy, than with other conductors, and to the writer this conception was ideal.

To do all this, with a simple and well-known work, is a very great thing. One must have for the time the heart of a child, with the skill and the expert knowledge of orchestral instruments, which Mr. Monteux possesses in an unusual degree.

Mr. Spaulding's Playing

It was a brilliant concert of familiar compositions. Mr. Spaulding, who long since showed himself a serious artist of marked talent, displayed on this occasion more authority and individuality in his performance than ever before. The Dvorak concerto, which has many beautiful ideas in it, is diffuse and overlengthy, but it was vitalized and each episode given meaning and significance by the player.

It is a pleasure to add that Mr. Spaulding has never lost the straightforwardness and sincerity which distinguished his playing from the beginning. And he no longer performs like a gifted, earnest, well-trained youth. He has a man's conviction and purpose in his task. He was warmly applauded at the end of the concerto.

Enesco's Suite

A foil to the frank lyricism of Schumann and Dvorak was the strange, haunted, twilight music of Enesco. He is a peculiar individuality, a musician who engrosses some and repels others.

SPALDING HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Leader Scores in the Handling of Orchestra

Mr Monteux and the orchestra confirmed at yesterday's Symphony concert the promise of the first concerts last week. The subscribers may look forward to a brilliant Symphony season. Last week there were still a few ragged spots in the performance of the Beethoven Symphony and of Franck's "Wild Huntsman," which betrayed the fact that rehearsals had only been going on for a couple of weeks. The concert yesterday, however, might have been the 24th instead of the second.

Schumann's B-flat major Symphony is one of those stock pieces in the regular repertory of all orchestras which are religiously, but often apathetically, played every other season to politely applausive, but slightly bored audiences. But yesterday's performance might have been the first in Boston. The spontaneity of the applause showed that the listeners felt the new life and vigor Mr Monteux was putting into the familiar music.

When Mr Spalding came out to play the solo part in Dvorak's violin concerto, the warmth of the greeting proved that his former appearances here, and especially his admirable performance of the Beethoven concerto at a pair of Symphony concerts in 1917, were favorably remembered. At least one of his hearers yesterday wished that he had again elected to play the Beethoven, instead of resurrecting the Dvorak concerto, which can scarcely be numbered among the great masterpieces.

For Dvorak never learned the most important secret of the art of composition. He did not know what to leave out. This concerto shows his amazing fertility of melodic invention, but it is diffuse and in the end wearisome. Not all Mr Spalding's careful eloquence could quite save it.

Yet it contains the materials for a masterpiece, if only Dvorak had been able to cull and to arrange them in an inevitable order. Mr Spalding's tone is more luscious and less pure than it used to be. Nor has he quite regained his former easy mastery of technique, after his recent war service. He achieves an excellent performance, but with obvious effort.

The other item on the program, a Suite for orchestra by Georges Enesco, has been played here several times. It is doubtful, however, whether many of the people in yesterday's audience who had heard it before remembered it, save possibly by the fact that the first of the four sections is for strings in unison, a distinctly unusual circumstance.

This composition, written 10 years ago, is dedicated to Camille Saint-Saens. It might be the work of a rejuvenated and lessened Saint-Saens, with its many suggestions of other composers ranging all the way from Brahms to Ravel, its competent workmanship, and its lack of rugged force. It is agreeable to hear, but impossible to remember. The performance did it more than justice.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week's concerts bring D'Indy's new symphony on the war in France, selections from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus," Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Liszt's "Preludes."

Traveler Sat. Oct. 18

MONTEUX GIVES SCHUMANN NUMBER

Mr. Monteux certainly had his courage with him when he arranged that two-hour program for the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. There was Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra, with Albert Spalding as soloist, and Enesco's suite for orchestra. While it was a long program the concert was anything but dull. It afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Monteux's reading of Schumann. That reading gave such pleasure that the conductor was recalled and recalled until he had the players stand up. The concert also afforded another opportunity of hearing Albert Spalding, the much admired violinist. His sterling artistry aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the afternoon. One might well have wished for less orchestra at times in this selection.

The Enesco suite gave such pleasure that Mr. Monteux had to return to the stage in response to the applause, a signal tribute, particularly after such a long concert. The first violins were not quite all that could be wished in the suite. It was pleasant to note less abruptness in emphasizing the main points of the selections.

This music has a strangely personal melancholy faithfully reflected in the composition and very difficult to define at all in words. A twilight zone of the composer's consciousness seems to be revealed. Here in Enesco, a Rumanian, a lover of the music of Brahms and Wagner, the Germans, and grown up as a composer in modern France. Is this suite Slavic? It seems to be so in the last movement, which is very fantastical. One does not know where the other movements come from. They come from Enesco. They are suggestive of the style of music of a day long past, but in spite of the suggestion of music in the old style this composition is ultra-modern in spirit. A modern man peers back through vistas of ages which have seen so many men hope and struggle and die. Music has its message for every hearer. To many Enesco's music will be music, made of notes, well made, and yesterday very well performed under Mr. Monteux, especially as regards the playing of the strings in the open unison movement.

BOSTON AMERICAN

SPALDING PLAYS AT SECOND SYMPHONY

Violinist Warmly Greeted in Connection with Monteux's Excellent Program

Albert Spalding, violinist, lately in the aviation service in Italy, was the soloist at the second Symphony Concert, Mr. Monteux conducting. He played Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, in three movements.

The rest of the program consisted of Schumann's symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, and an orchestral suite by Georges Enesco.

Mr. Spalding, with a war record that appealed to the public imagination, and a reputation already established here as a violinist of the first rank, was warmly greeted. He gave a musicianly performance of the conerto, and was recalled again and again at its close. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant, sympathetically led by Mr. Monteux with due regard for the degree to which the tone of a solo violin blends with the ensemble.

Schumann's symphony, familiar as it is here, made a profound impression. The work is as suggestive to- ever, as when first performed in manuscript nearly eighty years ago. In marked contrast was the modern suite of Enesco, the Roumanian violinist, a brilliant work, without marked characteristics of any one school, but positive in character, and performed with fine spirit and distinction.

The program for the concerts next week will be: Short symphony based on the war in France, by d'Indy, the first performance in America; Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

OCTOBER 18, 1919

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MON

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is pleasant to note the cordiality of the welcome given to Albert Spalding, when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This young American, who has sacrificed much in the way of material well-being for the sake of becoming a violinist, will some day be regarded as a pioneer, for he devoted himself to art when friends and family expected, nay, almost insisted, that he hew out a commercial career. And not only did he undergo a long and hard apprenticeship, but he did it at a time when the American musician had little to hope for from a public which could see slight value in anything that did not come from Europe, and preferably from Germany. He was not taken seriously, but that did not bother him, outwardly, at least. He kept on, and now he has reached the point where, in a generation of violinists, he may rightfully occupy a prominent rank. So his welcome at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston orchestra was pleasant to see, and even more pleasant was the warm recognition of his good work in the Dvořák concerto in A minor, Op. 53. No violinist could well help getting a beautiful tone out of the instrument which Mr. Spalding plays, but this player has reached the point where he is concerned with his tone chiefly for the use he can put it to in conveying the musical ideas of the composer as he feels them. So he was able to set forth the joy and contemplative beauty of the Dvořák concerto with conviction both to himself and his audience.

The symphony was the B flat, No. 1, Op. 38 of Schumann, a thing of joy and satisfying in its harmonies because of the genius of Schumann for orchestration. If Mr. Monteux is given to repetitions, it would be interesting to hear this later in the season, when the players have settled down a little more into the unity and precision that is still somewhat lacking.

Enesco's suite for orchestra Op. 9 was the concluding number of the program, and was found mildly interesting by the audience.

EVENING SUN

dress New York City

te OCT 4 - 191

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now rehearsing in Boston for what promises to be one of the busiest seasons in its history. One hundred and ten concerts are scheduled, and New York is one of several cities where the series will be sold out in advance. For the ten concerts to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons (Nov. 6 and 8; Dec. 4 and 6; Jan. 9 and 10; Feb. 5 and 7; March 18 and 20), all seats are engaged as usual. However, applications may be filed with W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season of exceptional interest. Returning from France late in August he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He bears also in mind several American works of merit. Withal he has announced a cosmopolitan policy, which will exclude no schools. The great symphonists of the past are by no means to be slighted.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

OCT 4 - 191

At the First Regiment Armory in Newark is to be presented a series of "Word-Famous Artists" concerts, beginning with Galli-Curci on Saturday evening, Oct. 11. Following will come the Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by Grainger, Rachmaninoff, Gluck, and Zimbalist, Casals and Lazzari, Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ganz, Jascha Heifetz, and John McCormack.

News Leader

Cleveland, Ohio

SEP 21 1919

Mrs. Sanders Has a Notable Program.

MY text this morning is Mrs. Franklyn B. Sanders. She has been in the local managerial field for several years. Many of her past successes have been jointly with Mrs. Hughes. They still are jointly responsible to be an unusually fine

December 9 is the date for the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has not been heard here for several years and which will not make its appearance in the visiting orchestra series, as was formerly the case. This famous organization is now directed by Pierre Monteux, who was heard here with the Nijinsky company and who directed the performance of "Siegfried" at League park, when the gala performance was given.

MON

MPHONY GIVES ECOND CONCERT

SAT

Enthusiastic Audience, Filling Hall, Enjoys Schumann's Spring Symphony

SPALDING HEARD IN DVORAK CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Enesco, Suite for orchestra, op. 9.

Schumann's symphony, popularly known as the "Spring" symphony, has been played as a rule at these concerts in a fall or a winter month. It has thus shared the fate of overtures entitled "Spring." Thus may music cheer one by the force of contrast.

"And the spring comes slowly up this way." It does not in Schumann's symphony. It comes impetuously, with a mad rush, with the sound of waters released and exulting. Schumann's Spring is a romantic one, known chiefly by poets and musicians. Mr. Monteux gave an appropriately romantic interpretation. Seldom, if ever, have we heard so engrossing a performance, one that was from the beginning to the end so lyrically dramatic. While various episodes were adroitly introduced and dismissed, there was no halt in the continuity of the musical thought. It is an old story that while Schumann's instrumentation is generally maladroit, attempts at re-orchestration have failed. Schumann's lovely ideas must wear his dress. Yesterday this dress did not seem so drab, so rudely cut. The musical thought for once caused the orchestral clothing to be forgotten.

The pages of Dvorak's concerto that please the most are those in which the composer remembers the folk songs and dances of his Bohemia. The finale is the movement in which we recognize the true Dvorak. When he would be scholastic, when he would appear to be writing with one eye on a college of learned professors, he is labored and dull, as in the first movement of this concerto. He then seems to lose even his birthright of rhythm and color. Dvorak the naive peasant, richly endowed by nature is nearer and dearer to us than the Dvorak that was forced to be serious and profound. By what is he known today? By "From the New World" Symphony, a few songs, and transcription for violin of a Humoresral. Yet theire are early orchestral works by Dvorak that might give pleasure and stir the blood if they were revived.

Mr. Albert Spalding, the solo violinist of yesterday, first thought of playing Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," but many are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the "Intellectuals" early in the war; who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame. Mr. Spalding wisely decided not to play this Fantasia. It is said that he finds Dvorak's Concerto good. There are concertos that appeal to a violinist, when they are caviare to the general. The quotation will serve, although we by no means would put Dvorak's Concerto on a level with caviare, for it is for the most part futile music. No doubt Mr. Spalding is interested in technical problems contained in it; it surely does not make demands upon his emotional nature. He played the music skilfully and modestly, and was loudly applauded for his pains.

The first movement of Enesco's Suite displayed the noble sonority and the beautiful quality of the strings, as Schumann's symphony showed the marked improvement in the section of the second violins. The minuet is curiously invented, with its suggestions of archaic form and color, while the Intermere charms by reason of its hypnotizing drone and its memories of oriental arabesques.

The hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. The season has, indeed, opened brilliantly.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: D'Indy's new symphony No. 3 ("De Bello Gallico"), which will be performed for the first time in America; Beethoven overture and Ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Liszt, "The Preludes."

OCTOBER 18, 1919

OSTON POST, SATU

YOUTHFUL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Schumann's "Spring" Given—Spalding as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Albert Spalding, the young American violinist, who recently returned to this country after service as an aviator and as a musician in the war, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The orchestral compositions were the poetic "Spring" symphony of Schumann, and the Suite, op. 9, of Enesco—a singular and fascinating piece of music.

SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY

The performance of Schumann's Symphony was, on the whole, the finest the writer has heard. To many a celebrated conductor this music is a stumbling block. It is too simple for a leader who relies on striking effects to pull him through. It is too sincere, too youthful, too poetic for one without youth and poetry in him to hope to interpret. Then there is the question of orchestral effect. Schumann, who wrote this symphony with spring and love in his heart, knew what orchestral effects he wanted, but did not always know how to secure them in a practical way. This is acknowledged. Unfortunately, there are many conductors who are content to excuse a dull performance on these grounds.

The conductor cannot so easily relinquish his own responsibility when he interprets this lovely work. He must get the full value of every note in the score, make every detail susceptible of color tell, develop the hints of what the composer wants into concrete effects, meet the creator of the music half way and assist him to deliver his message.

Glowing With Color

Mr. Monteux did all this. He is not a man to take another man's word for what is or is not in a score. He reads the score for himself, hence generally knows what is in it. How many admirable things he did which commonly escape notice! How one tone of a horn or a flute told in the color scheme.

The orchestra glowed with color, a kind of color particularly characteristic of Schumann, native to him, inimitable by anyone else. Nor was the symphony a succession of more or less disconnected episodes, as it so often sounds. The thought was continuous, the spirit romantic. The rustles and stirrings of spring agitated the instruments. Now the music was full of a vague and beautiful melancholy, like the earth when it is burdened with the prescience of an eternity of deaths and resurrections to come, and again there was the impetuous surge of youthful emotion, warmth, love.

Simply and Eloquently Rendered

Never was the dreamy song of the violins in the second part so simply and eloquently rendered. Seldom has there been such vigor, such healthy folk-spirit, so much humor and fancy in the scherzo. The choice of tempi was singularly happy. In certain places, as in the allegro of the first movement, as in one of the strains of the scherzo, it was a trifle slower, a trifle more sturdy, than with other conductors, and to the writer this conception was ideal.

To do all this, with a simple and well-known work, is a very great thing. One must have for the time the heart of a child, with the skill and the expert knowledge of orchestral instruments, which Mr. Monteux possesses in an unusual degree.

Mr. Spaulding's Playing

It was a brilliant concert of familiar compositions. Mr. Spaulding, who long since showed himself a serious artist of marked talent, displayed on this occasion more authority and individuality in his performance than ever before. The Dvorak concerto, which has many beautiful ideas in it, is diffuse and overlengthy, but it was vitalized and each episode given meaning and significance by the player.

It is a pleasure to add that Mr. Spaulding has never lost the straightforwardness and sincerity which distinguished his playing from the beginning. And he no longer performs like a gifted, earnest, well-trained youth. He has a man's conviction and purpose in his task. He was warmly applauded at the end of the concerto.

Enesco's Suite

A foil to the frank lyricism of Schumann and Dvorak was the strange, haunted, twilight music of Enesco. He is a peculiar individuality, a musician who engrosses some and repels others.

SPALDING HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Leader Scores in the Handling of Orchestra

Mr Monteux and the orchestra confirmed at yesterday's Symphony concert the promise of the first concerts last week. The subscribers may look forward to a brilliant Symphony season. Last week there were still a few ragged spots in the performance of the Beethoven Symphony and of Franck's "Wild Huntsman," which betrayed the fact that rehearsals had only been going on for a couple of weeks. The concert yesterday, however, might have been the 24th instead of the second.

Schumann's B-flat major Sympheny is one of those stock pieces in the regular repertory of all orchestras which are religiously, but often apathetically, played every other season to politely applausive, but slightly bored audiences. But yesterday's performance might have been the first in Boston. The spontaneity of the applause showed that the listeners felt the new life and vigor Mr Monteux was putting into the familiar music.

When Mr Spalding came out to play the solo part in Dvorak's violin concerto, the warmth of the greeting proved that his former appearances here, and especially his admirable performance of the Beethoven concerto at a pair of Symphony concerts in 1917, were favorably remembered. At least one of his hearers yesterday wished that he had again elected to play the Beethoven, instead of resurrecting the Dvorak concerto, which can scarcely be numbered among the great masterpieces.

For Dvorak never learned the most important secret of the art of composition. He did not know what to leave out. This concerto shows his amazing fertility of melodic invention, but it is diffuse and in the end wearisome. Not all Mr Spalding's careful eloquence could quite save it.

Yet it contains the materials for a masterpiece, if only Dvorak had been able to cull and to arrange them in an inevitable order. Mr Spalding's tone is more luscious and less pure than it used to be. Nor has he quite regained his former easy mastery of technique, after his recent war service. He achieves an excellent performance, but with obvious effort.

The other item on the program, a Suite for orchestra by Georges Enesco, has been played here several times. It is doubtful, however, whether many of the people in yesterday's audience who had heard it before remembered it, save possibly by the fact that the first of the four sections is for strings in unison, a distinctly unusual circumstance.

This composition, written 10 years ago, is dedicated to Camille Saint-Saens. It might be the work of a rejuvenated and lessened Saint-Saens, with its many suggestions of other composers ranging all the way from Brahms to Ravel, its competent workmanship, and its lack of rugged force. It is agreeable to hear, but impossible to remember. The performance did it more than justice.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week's concerts bring D'Indy's new symphony on the war in France, selections from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus," Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Liszt's "Preludes."

Traveler Sat. Oct. 18

MONTEUX GIVES SCHUMANN NUMBER

Mr. Monteux certainly had his courage with him when he arranged that two-hour program for the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. There was Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra, with Albert Spalding as soloist, and Enesco's suite for orchestra. While it was a long program the concert was anything but dull. It afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Monteux's reading of Schumann. That reading gave such pleasure that the conductor was recalled and recalled until he had the players stand up. The concert also afforded another opportunity of hearing Albert Spalding, the much admired violinist. His sterling artistry aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the afternoon. One might well have wished for less orchestra at times in this selection.

The Enesco suite gave such pleasure that Mr. Monteux had to return to the stage in response to the applause, a signal tribute, particularly after such a long concert. The first violins were not quite all that could be wished in the suite. It was pleasant to note less abruptness in emphasizing the main points of the selections.

This music has a strangely personal melancholy faithfully reflected in the composition and very difficult to define at all in words. A twilight zone of the composer's consciousness seems to be revealed. Here in Enesco, a Rumanian, a lover of the music of Brahms and Wagner, the Germans, and grown up as a composer in modern France. Is this suite Slavic? It seems to be so in the last movement, which is very fantastical. One does not know where the other movements come from. They come from Enesco. They are suggestive of the style of music of a day long past, but in spite of the suggestion of music in the old style this composition is ultra-modern in spirit. A modern man peers back through vistas of ages which have seen so many men hope and struggle and die. Music has its message for every hearer. To many Enesco's music will be music, made of notes, well made, and yesterday very well performed under Mr. Monteux, especially as regards the playing of the strings in the open unison movement.

BOSTON AMERICAN

SPALDING PLAYS AT SECOND SYMPHONY

Violinist Warmly Greeted in Connection with Monteux's Excellent Program

Albert Spalding, violinist, lately in the aviation service in Italy, was the soloist at the second Symphony Concert, Mr. Monteux conducting. He played Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, in three movements.

The rest of the program consisted of Schumann's symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, and an orchestral suite by Georges Enesco.

Mr. Spalding, with a war record that appealed to the public imagination, and a reputation already established here as a violinist of the first rank, was warmly greeted. He gave a musicianly performance of the conerto, and was recalled again and again at its close. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant, sympathetically led by Mr. Monteux with due regard for the degree to which the tone of a solo violin blends with the ensemble.

Schumann's symphony, familiar as it is here, made a profound impression. The work is as suggestive to ... ever.. as when first performed in manuscript nearly eighty years ago. In marked contrast was the modern suite of Enesco, the Roumanian violinist, a brilliant work, without marked characteristics of any one school, but positive in character, and performed with fine spirit and distinction.

The program for the concerts next week will be: Short symphony based on the war in France, by d'Indy, the first performance in America; Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

OCTOBER 18, 1919

IRISTIAN SCIENCE MON

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is pleasant to note the cordiality of the welcome given to Albert Spalding when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This young American, who has sacrificed much in the way of material well-being for the sake of becoming a violinist, will some day be regarded as a pioneer, for he devoted himself to art when friends and family expected, nay, almost insisted, that he hew out a commercial career. And not only did he undergo a long and hard apprenticeship, but he did it at a time when the American musician had little to hope for from a public which could see slight value in anything that did not come from Europe, and preferably from Germany. He was not taken seriously, but that did not bother him, outwardly, at least. He kept on, and now he has reached the point where, in a generation of violinists, he may rightfully occupy a prominent rank. So his welcome at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston orchestra was pleasant to see, and even more pleasant was the warm recognition of his good work in the Dvořák concerto in A minor, Op. 53. No violinist could well help getting a beautiful tone out of the instrument which Mr. Spalding plays, but this player has reached the point where he is concerned with his tone chiefly for the use he can put it to in conveying the musical ideas of the composer as he feels them. So he was able to set forth the joy and contemplative beauty of the Dvořák concerto with conviction both to himself and his audience.

The symphony was the B flat, No. 1, Op. 38 of Schumann, a thing of joy and satisfying in its harmonies because of the genius of Schumann for orchestration. If Mr. Monteux is given to repetitions, it would be interesting to hear this later in the season, when the players have settled down a little more into the unity and precision that is still somewhat lacking.

Enesco's suite for orchestra Op. 9 was the concluding number of the program, and was found mildly interesting by the audience.

m EVENING SUN

dress New York City

te OCT 4 - 191

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now rehearsing in Boston for what promises to be one of the busiest seasons in its history. One hundred and ten concerts are scheduled, and New York is one of several cities where the series will be sold out in advance. For the ten concerts to take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons (Nov. 6 and 8; Dec. 4 and 6; Jan. 9 and 10; Feb. 5 and 7; March 18 and 20), all seats are engaged as usual. However, applications may be filed with W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has been indefatigable in his efforts to assure a season of exceptional interest. Returning from France late in August he brought with him a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He bears also in mind several American works of merit. Withal he has announced a cosmopolitan policy, which will exclude no schools. The great symphonists of the past are by no means to be slighted.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

OCT 4 - 191

At the First Regiment Armory in Newark is to be presented a series of "Word-Famous Artists" concerts, beginning with Galli-Curci on Saturday evening, Oct. 11. Following will come the Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by Grainger, Rachmaninoff, Gluck, and Zimbalist, Casals and Lazzari, Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ganz, Jascha Heifetz, and John McCormack.

News Leader

Cleveland, Ohio

SEP 21 1919

Mrs. Sanders Has a Notable Program.

MY text this morning is Mrs. Franklyn B. Sanders. She has been in the local managerial field for several years. Many of her past successes have been jointly with Mrs. Hughes. They still are jointly respon- is said to be an unusually fine

December 9 is the date for the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has not been heard here for several years and which will not make its appearance in the visiting orchestra series, as was formerly the case. This famous organization is now directed by Pierre Monteux, who was heard here with the Nijinsky company and who directed the performance of "Siegfried" at League park, when the gala performance was given.

Concert

CONCERTS AND PLAYS

NEW PROGRAMMES AND OLD FOR NEXT WEEK

D'Indy's War-Time Symphony in First Performance in America — Returning Singers — Light Con Offenbach Pieces and REGRETTABLE but unavoidable circumstances compel this department of the Transcript to shorten materially today its usual announcements of concerts, plays and programmes at the vaudeville and picture houses for the week to come. A passing mischance forces it to depart for the day from its custom to which it will return next Saturday. As it is the custom to say in the theatre when such mischances befall, it asks the indulgence for the moment of both readers and the theatres and concert-halls concerned.

Concerts Next Week

At the third pair of Symphony Concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play for the first times in America the "short symphony" written by d'Indy out of his own emotions and experiences in the late war and the emotions and the experiences of his countrymen—music for which there is lively anticipation and about which more will be said in this place. Another item of the programme, "A Siegfried Idyl" will restore Wagner, happily and timely, to the Symphony Concerts. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes" and the overture and a single dance from Beethoven's one and only ballet, "The Folk of Prometheus" will also be heard.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY

OCTOBER 18, 1919

Symphony Concert

The review of the Symphony Concert, which usually appears in this place on Saturdays, is deferred by unavoidable circumstances until Monday next.

ADVERTISER, OCTOBER

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for this week's Symphony concerts features the first performance in this country of a new symphony by Vincent d'Indy, based on the war. "A Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," are listed.

Post Oct 19

D'INDY TRIUMPHAL SYMPHONY

The programme which Pierre Monteux has made for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday (Oct. 24-25) will include the first performance in this country of a new symphony by the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, based on the war. Its title page is inscribed thus in Latin: "Sinfonia Brevis de Belle Gallico—1916-1918—No. 3, Opus 70." It is in four movements, and its close is marked "Majestueux."

The same programme will bring the music of Wagner back to these concerts, according to the expressed policy of Mr. Monteux, to include the best music of all schools and lands. "A Siegfried Idyll," the poetic composition which Wagner derived from his music drama, is the choice. Other numbers will be two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"—the overture, and ballet No. 5, which is an adajio, written for five solo instruments—'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp—and Liszt's most popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes," after Lamartine, will close the programme.

Globe Oct 19

Wagner and d'Indy to Be Heard at Symphony Concert

The chief item on the program of the Symphony concerts this week is d'Indy's new Third Symphony, to be performed for the first times in America. The title page of the orchestral score bears a Latin inscription, "Sinfonia Brevis De Bello Gallico, 1916-1918." The symphony is in the orthodox four movements, however, and not exceptionally brief. It is to be hoped that it will prove to have more lasting musical merit than most of the other compositions inspired by the war.

At last we are to hear Wagner again at the Symphony. Mr Monteux, carrying out his announced intention of giving the best music irrespective of the nationality of the composer, has included "A Siegfried Idyll" in this program. Living Germans will presumably still be excluded, however.

The remaining numbers on the program are Beethoven's Overture to his Ballet "Prometheus," and one of the numbers therefrom, with Liszt's familiar "Les Preludes." There is no soloist.

Trav. Oct. 18

MONTEUX TO GIVE WAR SYMPHONY

At next week's Symphony concerts will be heard for the first time in America D'Indy's symphony based on the world war. Mr. Monteux will also give Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," marking the return of this composer's works to the Symphony programs; the fifth ballet from Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," for 'cello, flute, bassoon, clarinet and harp, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

CAMBRIDGE

631 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE

SENTINEL

Somehow there is a widespread feeling of approbation in Cambridge musical circles that the coming Symphony concert season will include Wagner. If Conductor Monteux, a patriotic Frenchman, is loth to stifle a certain magnanimity for the sake of art, why should Americans continue a feeling of hostility, because Wagner, after the war of 1870, did not show much sympathy for the plight of the French people. It might be as well to remember that Wagner was forced to flee from Saxony in 1849 for his liberal views, and then dismiss Wagner the man as a matter of no consequence beside the glorious fact of Wagner the artist in music. It is very easy to overdo many things, especially a discriminating pose, but when Conductor Monteux sets an example in magnanimity for true art's sake, it ill becomes you and I, who have not his reasons for resentment, to cavil. Wagner the man is submerged in Wagner the musician—and there's an end.

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows: D'Indy, symphony No. 3; "De Bello Gallico" (first time in America); Beethoven, overture and ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus;" Wagner, A Siegfried Idyll; Liszt, the Preludes, symphonic poem No. 3.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert in Washington at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30. The sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's, 13th and G streets.

The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, who will play his Third Concerto. For the purely orchestral numbers on this program Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and the Oriental Suite by Enesco, the Roumanian composer.

Monteux === Spalding

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ENESCO, SCHUMANN, MONTEUX, SPALDING

A Perversely Interesting Suite That Dressed Ancient Forms in Modern Vesture—Music of the Spring Glorified by a Conductor Able to Set It on the Stage of the Imagination — A Dull Concerto Animated by a Violinist Without Other Choice

NOT the least happy incident of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was the absence of French music from the programme. It is quite as possible to be over-fed with French music as it is with German or Russian, or, as befell the other day no farther away than Worcester, with American. Too much of the ancients, like too much of the ultra-moderns, may easily cloy the ear. Overfed with the music of Paris many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts was last season, because a passing conductor was not widely read in other musics and because he seemed fondly to believe that a mediocre plebe was somehow less mediocre, if Paris had given it birth. Mr. Monteux, cultivated and cosmopolitan musician, harbors no such illusion. As he said aptly in an interview early in the autumn, French music of high desert needs no propaganda. It speaks for itself the world around and—he might have added—gloriously. As for mediocre or cut-moded music, which has been and is still written in Paris, exactly as in Berlin, Vienna, Moscow, Rome or even Boston, there is no good reason why it should be played anywhere, least of all in the abundance in which it fell upon many an ear last winter. The more, then, the reason to applaud a programme that began with the singing Schumann of the "Spring" symphony, proceeded with the serviceable Dvorák of the concerto for violin, and ended with the highly individual Enesco of the orchestral suite with a prelude for strings in unison. True, Enesco dwells and works in Paris, but he is Roumanian by blood, while Vienna first trained him. Much more significantly, in youth and in maturity he has worked to his own ends in his own way.

So it was, perhaps, that to practised and therefore the more curious ears, his music was the most interesting of the evening. Added to the repertory of the orchestra eight years ago and then played twice within as many months, it has been subsequently repeated only once, so that recollection could do hardly more than whet anticipation. Fulfilment came quickly with the large sweep, the incisive voices, the diversified progress of the prelude for the stripped and unified strings—a naked music, if the hearer chooses, but heated by fire of invention and spurred by imaginative energy, of an Enesco who in his own way will follow a way of the ancients. Surely of the day and year in which the suite was written, say at the beginning of the twentieth century, is the succeeding minuet—again an ancient form, but again also, a modern an individual handling. Not only is the harmonic and the instrumental coloring Enesco's own and of Enesco's time, but as much of both is the fancy it releases. To more than one ear, this minuet is a dance of phantoms, of ghosts recalled to life and pleasure in a chateau tumbling to ruin, snatching their hasty, dusty hour. The ensuing interlude, yet again, seeks an archaic austerity of form, progress, phrase, yet speaks with the richer, diversifying voice of our own day in music-making. With a lively finale in dance-rhythm ended many an ancient suite. Enesco chooses to end his with what seems a Roumanian folk-tune, rhythmed, repeated, variegated, interrupted in ready and spirited modern fashion. A perverse music—again if the hearer chooses—in the clothing of forms of the eighteenth century with the tonal vesture of the early twentieth, but so much the more individual of imagination and accomplishment and with many a stimulating tang for the ear that would escape the endless bore of the regular thing in the regular way. Fortunate, wise, happy Enesco to possess and cherish a native wildness.

Our fathers fancied that Dvorak possessed this native wildness. Possibly he did, possibly it survives still in some of his music, like the Hussite overture and this or that chamber-piece. Their sons, however, are incredulous as our sons may be when—and if—they read praises of it in Enesco. Certainly to old and to young, hardly any sort of native wildness touches the concerto that Mr. Spalding was compelled to play. Compelled, indeed, is written advisedly. His original choice, it seems, was Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," a much more animated, artful and amusing music. Now Bruch in these days is a doddering old man, dragging out life in a suburb of Berlin. During the war, it appears, he blasphemed the English in senile furies. Other old men nearer Boston still resent these follies. There were alarums and excursions even as there were last spring when Miss Braslau would sing certain music of Bruch. The "Scottish Fantasia" was "banned" and Mr. Spalding took shelter in Dvorák's dull concerto. Evidently there are "high quarters" in Symphony Hall, as in the Senate of the United States, in which the war has not yet ended. Not wisely, indeed, might sundry senators present themselves at the Symphony Concerts, even the father of one of the trustees of the orchestra itself. He has passed middle age; by report of recent debates in Washington, he has been known to speak despitefully of the English.

To the saving Dvorak, Mr. Spalding returned much. Through the "thoughtful," the painstaking music-making of the first movement, through the smooth and long-drawn song of the second, through the warmer motivs and the livelier progress of the finale he made his way as though the whole piece were enkindling the play of his finest powers. He melted technical exaction into flowing and decorative detail. He clothed dull and repetitious measures with the rich body, the warm glow, the flowing progress of his tone. He touched off prosaic figures with a gentle flourish. Where the music gave off neither light nor heat, it received the radiance of his tone, his ardor for the violin—and even for this concerto of Dvorák. From him and from Mr. Monteux, in deft and sympathetic accompaniment came the moments of tranquil, simple, songful beauty in the slow division and from both, with a little more aid and comfort from the composer, the moments of rhythmic life in the finale. The music might easily have led Mr. Spalding into a dry, a super-refined tone. As it was, the very shortcomings of the concerto seemed to warm and deepen his voice. Like the ancient masters of the violin, he touched—and glorified.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra did like service to Schumann's symphony of the return of spring; but therein was music to put them to their mettle. It were a late day to rehearse anew the songful rapture of the beginning, the songful ecstasy of the succeeding movement, the songful brightness of the scherzo, the songful gayety of the finale. If ever there was instrumental song, from first measure to last, it is this symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, as paltry prose labels it. Twenty times conductors and orchestras have sung it more or less rapturously into Bostonian ears. It were as late a day to traverse anew the details of the music in which Schumann's hand, less graced than his imagination, has dulled or nearly stifled his voice. As many times conductors and orchestras have more or less aptly or energetically made him articulate. Mr. Monteux lagged no whit behind his predecessors in songful eloquence, in illuminating stroke of pace or accent. For himself, his orchestra, his audience, he did more. Before them he unrolled the music as though it were glowing pageant of the coming of spring and of the poetized emotions that advent is presumed to send beating high. His pace and progress through the symphony set the first movement, as it were, in flood upon the countryside. The poet, in the second, saw, dreamed and flowed with tender fancies. Through the third skipped the playful folk. In the fourth the whole awakening world was merry, antic. Mr. Monteux visualized the music, set the stage of imagination with it. Symphonic music gains when a conductor of parts and spirit has served also in the opera house.

H. T. PARKER

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNES
SDAY, OCTOBER 22,

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fire-Bird," at the Symphony Concerts Next Week—New Work for the Chicago Orchestra—Victor Herbert's Venture

A SYMPHONY by Haydn, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Rakhmaninov with the composer himself playing in it, and the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Fire-Bird," fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—the last pair before the orchestra resumes its journeys to New York. Seemingly, the symphony, though it is a hundred and thirty years old, has never before been heard in Boston. It is one of the set that Haydn wrote between 1784 and 1786 for the Concerts Spirituels in Paris; it bears title "The Queen of France" for cause that the erudite programme-book will, doubtless, disclose; it is in the key of B-flat and it is numbered 85 in Breitkoff and Haertel's edition of Haydn's music. Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto, his third, in D minor, will likewise be new to Bostonian ears. Of old, the composer liked to say that, while he had written it, the piece was too difficult technically for him to play. Now apparently he has mastered it. From the theatre The Fire-Bird" is readily and warmly remembered by frequenters of the performances, a few years ago, of the Russian Ballet. By all accounts the music bears well transfer to the concert-hall, since it has intrinsic sensuous beauty and pictorial suggestion. In fact, Stravinsky himself arranged the suite that Mr. Monteux has in hand. It epitomizes the whole "Conte dansé," beginning with the prelude of the magic garden and the dance of the Fire-Bird; continuing with her entreaties, the game of the captive princesses with the golden apples, their lullaby and dance, and ending with whirling measures of the magician's evil and exorcised train. Long since the suite shou'd have been added to the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra.

Items of the Day

In a review of the first concerts of the Chicago Orchestra for the new season, on Friday and Saturday last, Mr. W. L. Hubbard writes pleasantly in The Tribune about Mr. Malkin now become the first violoncellist of Mr. Stock's band as he used to be under Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud at Symphony Hall. "Chief among the newcomers," says Mr. Hubbard, "was Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist, who comes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose personality and playing of a fragment of obbligato in Elgar's Variations hinted of popularity and musical good

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 15 19

THE THREE ARTS
MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

When Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, went to France last summer to see his mother and father, his country and his countrymen for the first time since he was released from military service two years after the war started, he went with an eye peculiarly keen for new scores of interest, and voluminous indeed, is the music he brought back with him in order that he might have a wide choice among the best that is novel for his forthcoming programs. He is also awaiting the arrival of several scores in manuscript and some that are now "in press." Of course, some of these may not reach him in time for this winter's presentment but he hopes to be able to play works by Casella and Furina, young Italian composers; by Prokofieff, the youthful Russian, and by Roussel and Ravel, the French writers. He is also planning to play Stravinsky's much-discussed "Fire Bird" music; symphonies by Vincent d'Indy and Jean Hure and "Play," by Debussey. In Boston, in addition to the usual number of classic symphonies, he is planning to give two choral works, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Cæsar Franck's "Beatitudes." He also proposes to play some American music, in which he is said to be greatly interested.

"We may in time develop a true 'American music,'" Mr. Monteux said recently, "but that time has not arrived yet. At present American music is impregnated with the influence of Old-World music—of the Italian and the German, and the Russian composer. Unlike the music of these nations, you cannot recognize American music at once as typically characteristic. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American comes there will be no doubt of the nationality. It will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—but with a different style—an American style. I think it will come. It will be very original. Very American."

Mr. Monteux strongly believes that the public wants the music of Wagner, and he intends to give Wagner a due place on his programs—which is not large in symphony concerts.

"I think the time has come to regard music and war as two different things. I want to forget the war and my part in it," he is reported to have said. (It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France as one of them—in the trenches.) "To me the war is now very far off, and very unhappy. Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met in the thick of an engagement. I fired: oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck in loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind his rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy.

"Hardly a Sunday passed when I did not furnish the music for some rough-and-ready religious service. Sometimes I played a harmonium, sometimes, when fortune smiled, a real organ in a ruined church. Sometimes I had only my violin.

"Wagner is dead, but Strauss is living," he said, when questioned about the latter composer. "Still, I would very much like to play his music. During the conflict it seemed to me entirely wrong. But Strauss' music was not due to the war and the war is over. People's feelings are sensitive and their feelings, I wish above all, to respect. Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but fair, to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programs. Not to play his music is a definite loss, because even Strauss' poorer music is extremely effective and brilliant in orchestration. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory; the state, following the cataclysm, of the nerves of the world."

It has been pointed out that Mr. Monteux is always keen to please his public and that he is not ashamed of the fact. "I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one. I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners. The people do not always know what is best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to win out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?"

They say in France that there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects, the other is concerned first and last with the men before him, and he is wholly occupied with the music to the exclusion of superficialities. Those who know Monteux say that Monteux is in no sense a "gallery" conductor, but

Concert

CONCERTS AND PLAYS

NEW PROGRAMMES AND OLD FOR NEXT WEEK

D'Indy's War-Time Symphony in First Performance in America — Returning Singers — Light Con Offenbach Pieces and REGETTABLE but unavoidable circumstances compel this department of the Transcript to shorten materially today its usual announcements of concerts, plays and programmes at the vaudeville and picture houses for the week to come. A passing mischance forces it to depart for the day from its custom to which it will return next Saturday. As it is the custom to say in the theatre when such mischances befall, it asks the indulgence for the moment of both readers and the theatres and concert-halls concerned.

Concerts Next Week

At the third pair of Symphony Concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play for the first times in America the "short symphony" written by d'Indy out of his own emotions and experiences in the late war and the emotions and the experiences of his countrymen—music for which there is lively anticipation and about which more will be said in this place. Another item of the programme, "A Siegfried Idyl" will restore Wagner, happily and timely, to the Symphony Concerts. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes" and the overture and a single dance from Beethoven's one and only ballet, "The Folk of Prometheus" will also be heard.

Post Oct 19

D'INDY TRIUMPHAL SYMPHONY

The programme which Pierre Monteux has made for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday (Oct. 24-25) will include the first performance in this country of a new symphony by the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, based on the war. Its title page is inscribed thus in Latin: "Sinfonia Brevis de Belle Gallico—1916-1918—No. 3, Opus 70." It is in four movements, and its close is marked "Majestueux."

The same programme will bring the music of Wagner back to these concerts, according to the expressed policy of Mr. Monteux, to include the best music of all schools and lands. "A Siegfried Idyll," the poetic composition which Wagner derived from his music drama, is the choice. Other numbers will be two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"—the overture, and ballet No. 5, which is an adajio, written for five solo instruments—'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp—and Liszt's most popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes," after Lamartine, will close the programme.

Trav. Oct. 18

MONTEUX TO GIVE WAR SYMPHONY

At next week's Symphony concerts will be heard for the first time in America D'Indy's symphony based on the world war. Mr. Monteux will also give Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," marking the return of this composer's works to the Symphony programs; the fifth ballet from Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," for 'cello, flute, bassoon, clarinet and harp, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows: D'Indy, symphony No. 3; "De Bello Gallico" (first time in America); Beethoven, overture and ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus;" Wagner, A Siegfried Idyll; Liszt, the Preludes, symphonic poem No. 3.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert in Washington at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30. The sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's, 13th and G streets.

The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, who will play his Third Concerto. For the purely orchestral numbers on this program Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and the orchestral Suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

Herald Sun. 19 Oct.
...Kochanski and Wieniawsky.

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY

The program that Mr. Monteux has made for the third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts Friday and Saturday brings the first performance in this country of a new symphony by Vincent d'Indy, based on the war. Its title page is inscribed thus in Latin: "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico—1916-1918—No. 2, Opus 70." It is in four movements.

The program also includes Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," two selections from Beethoven's Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"—the overture, and Ballet No. 5, which is an adagio, written for six solo instruments—violin, cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp. Liszt's Symphonic Poem "The Preludes."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY

OCTOBER 18, 1919

Symphony Concert

The review of the Symphony Concert, which usually appears in this place on Saturdays, is deferred by unavoidable circumstances until Monday next.

ADVERTISER, OCTOBER

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for this week's Symphony concerts features the first performance in this country of a new symphony by Vincent d'Indy, based on the war. "A Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," are listed.

Globe Oct 19

Wagner and d'Indy to Be Heard at Symphony Concert

The chief item on the program of the Symphony concerts this week is d'Indy's new Third Symphony, to be performed for the first times in America. The title page of the orchestral score bears a Latin inscription, "Sinfonia Brevis De Bello Gallico, 1916-1918." The symphony is in the orthodox four movements, however, and not exceptionally brief. It is to be hoped that it will prove to have more lasting musical merit than most of the other compositions inspired by the war.

At last we are to hear Wagner again at the Symphony. Mr Monteux, carrying out his announced intention of giving the best music irrespective of the nationality of the composer, has included "A Siegfried Idyll" in this program. Living Germans will presumably still be excluded, however.

The remaining numbers on the program are Beethoven's Overture to his Ballet "Prometheus," and one of the numbers therefrom, with Liszt's familiar "Les Preludes." There is no soloist.

CAMBRIDGE

631 MASSACHUSETTS ...ated
...endid
SENTINEL
...man's a AVENUE

Somehow there is a widespread feeling of approbation in Cambridge musical circles that the coming Symphony concert season will include Wagner. If Conductor Monteux, a patriotic Frenchman, is loth to stifle a certain magnanimity for the sake of art, why should Americans continue a feeling of hostility, because Wagner, after the war of 1870, did not show much sympathy for the plight of the French people. It might be as well to remember that Wagner was forced to flee from Saxony in 1848 for his liberal views, and then dismiss Wagner the man as a matter of no consequence beside the glorious fact of Wagner the artist in music. It is very easy to overdo many things, especially a discriminating pose, but when Conductor Monteux sets an example in magnanimity for true art's sake, it ill becomes you and I, who have not his reasons for resentment, to cavil. Wagner the man is submerged in Wagner the musician—and there's an end.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, OCTOBER 20,

Monteux === Spalding

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ENESCO, SCHUMANN, MONTEUX, SPALDING

A Perversely Interesting Suite That Dressed Ancient Forms in Modern Vesture—Music of the Spring Glorified by a Conductor Able to Set It on the Stage of the Imagination — A Dull Concerto Animated by a Violinist Without Other Choice

NOT the least happy incident of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was the absence of French music from the programme. It is quite as possible to be over-fed with French music as it is with German or Russian, or, as befell the other day no farther away than Worcester, with American. Too much of the ancients, like too much of the ultra-moderns, may easily cloy the ear. Overfed with the music of Paris many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts was last season, because a passing conductor was not widely read in other musics and because he seemed fondly to believe that a mediocre piece was somehow less mediocre, if Paris had given it birth. Mr. Monteux, cultivated and cosmopolitan musician, harbors no such illusion. As he said aptly in an interview early in the autumn, French music of high desert needs no propaganda. It speaks for itself the world around and—he might have added—gloriously. As for mediocre or cut-moded music, which has been and is still written in Paris, exactly as in Berlin, Vienna, Moscow, Rome or even Boston, there is no good reason why it should be played anywhere, least of all in the abundance in which it fell upon many an ear last winter. The more, then, the reason to applaud a programme that began with the singing Schumann of the "Spring" symphony, proceeded with the serviceable Dvorák of the concerto for violin, and ended with the highly individual Enesco of the orchestral suite with a prelude for strings in unison. True, Enesco dwells and works in Paris, but he is Roumanian by blood, while Vienna first trained him. Much more significantly, in youth and in maturity he has worked to his own ends in his own way.

So it was, perhaps, that to practised and therefore the more curious ears, his music was the most interesting of the evening. Added to the repertory of the orchestra eight years ago and then played twice within as many months, it has been subsequently repeated only once, so that re-election could do hardly more than whet anticipation. Fulfilment came quickly with the large sweep, the incisive voices, the diversified progress of the prelude for the stripped and unified strings—a naked music, if the hearer chooses, but heated by fire of invention and spurred by imaginative energy, of an Enesco who in his own way will follow a way of the ancients. Surely of the day and year in which the suite was written, say at the beginning of the twentieth century, is the succeeding minuet—again an ancient form, but again also, a modern an individual handling. Not only is the harmonic and the instrumental coloring Enesco's own and of Enesco's time, but as much of both is the fancy it releases. To more than one ear, this minuet is a dance of phantoms, of ghosts recalled to life and pleasure in a chateau tumbling to ruin, snatching their hasty, dusty hour. The ensuing interlude, yet again, seeks an archaic austerity of form, progress, phrase, yet speaks with the richer, diversifying voice of our own day in music-making. With a lively finale in dance-rhythm ended many an ancient suite. Enesco chooses to end his with what seems a Roumanian folk-tune, rhythmed, repeated, variegated, interrupted in ready and spirited modern fashion. A perverse music—again if the hearer chooses—in the clothing of forms of the eighteenth century with the tonal vesture of the early twentieth, but so much the more individual of imagination and accomplishment and with many a stimulating tang for the ear that would escape the endless bore of the regular thing in the regular way. Fortunate, wise, happy Enesco to possess and cherish a native wildness.

Our fathers fancied that Dvorák possessed this native wildness. Possibly he did, possibly it survives still in some of his music, like the Hussite overture and this or that chamber-piece. Their sons, however, are incredulous as our sons may be when—and if—they read praises of it in Enesco. Certainly to old and to young, hardly any sort of native wildness touches the concerto that Mr. Spalding was compelled to play. Compelled, indeed, is written advisedly. His original choice, it seems, was Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," a much more animated, artful and amusing music. Now Bruch in these days is a doddering old man, dragging out life in a suburb of Berlin. During the war, it appears, he blasphemed the English in senile furies. Other old men nearer Boston still resent these follies. There were alarums and excursions even as there were last spring when Miss Braslau would sing certain music of Bruch. The "Scottish Fantasia" was "banned" and Mr. Spalding took shelter in Dvorák's dull concerto. Evidently there are "high quarters" in Symphony Hall, as in the Senate of the United States, in which the war has not yet ended. Not wisely, indeed, might sundry senators present themselves at the Symphony Concerts, even the father of one of the trustees of the orchestra itself. He has passed middle age; by report of recent debates in Washington, he has been known to speak despitefully of the English.

To the saving Dvorak, Mr. Spalding returned much. Through the "thoughtful," the painstaking music-making of the first movement, through the smooth and long-drawn song of the second, through the warmer motivs and the livelier progress of the finale he made his way as though the whole piece were enkindling the play of his finest powers. He melted technical exaction into flowing and decorative detail. He clothed dull and repetitious measures with the rich body, the warm glow, the flowing progress of his tone. He touched off prosaic figures with a gentle flourish. Where the music gave off neither light nor heat, it received the radiance of his tone, his ardor for the violin—and even for this concerto of Dvorák. From him and from Mr. Monteux, in deft and sympathetic accompaniment came the moments of tranquil, simple, songful beauty in the slow division and from both, with a little more aid and comfort from the composer, the moments of rhythmic life in the finale. The music might easily have led Mr. Spalding into a dry, a super-refined tone. As it was, the very shortcomings of the concerto seemed to warm and deepen his voice. Like the ancient masters of the violin, he touched—and glorified.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra did like service to Schumann's symphony of the return of spring: but therein was music to put them to their mettle. It were a late day to rehearse anew the songful rapture of the beginning, the songful ecstasy of the succeeding movement, the songful brightness of the scherzo, the songful gayety of the finale. If ever there was instrumental song, from first measure to last, it is this symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, as paltry prose labels it. Twenty times conductors and orchestras have sung it more or less rapturously into Bostonian ears. It were as late a day to traverse anew the details of the music in which Schumann's hand, less graced than his imagination, has dulled or nearly stifled his voice. As many times conductors and orchestras have more or less aptly or energetically made him articulate. Mr. Monteux lagged no whit behind his predecessors in songful eloquence, in illuminating stroke of pace or accent. For himself, his orchestra, his audience, he did more. Before them he unrolled the music as though it were glowing pageant of the coming of spring and of the poetized emotions that advent is presumed to send beating high. His pace and progress through the symphony set the first movement, as it were, in flood upon the countryside. The poet, in the second, saw, dreamed and flowed with tender fancies. Through the third skipped the playful folk. In the fourth the whole awakening world was merry, antic. Mr. Monteux visualized the music, set the stage of imagination with it. Symphonic music gains when a conductor of parts and spirit has served also in the opera house.

H. T. PARKER

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNES
SDAY, OCTOBER 22,

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fire-Bird," at the Symphony Concerts Next Week—New Work for the Chicago Orchestra—Victor Herbert's Venture

A SYMPHONY by Haydn, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Rakhmaninov with the composer himself playing in it, and the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Fire-Bird," fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—the last pair before the orchestra resumes its journeys to New York. Seemingly, the symphony, though it is a hundred and thirty years old, has never before been heard in Boston. It is one of the set that Haydn wrote between 1784 and 1786 for the Concerts Spirituels in Paris; it bears title "The Queen of France" for cause that the erudite programme-book will, doubtless, disclose; it is in the key of B-flat and it is numbered 85 in Breitkoff and Haertel's edition of Haydn's music. Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto, his third, in D minor, will likewise be new to Bostonian ears. Of old, the composer liked to say that, while he had written it, the piece was too difficult technically for him to play. Now apparently he has mastered it. From the theatre "The Fire-Bird" is readily and warmly remembered by frequenters of the performances, a few years ago, of the Russian Ballet. By all accounts the music bears well transfer to the concert-hall, since it has intrinsic sensuous beauty and pictorial suggestion. In fact, Stravinsky himself arranged the suite that Mr. Monteux has in hand. It epitomizes the whole "Conte dansé," beginning with the prelude of the magic garden and the dance of the Fire-Bird; continuing with her entreaties, the game of the captive princesses with the golden apples, their lullaby and dance, and ending with whirling measures of the magician's evil and exorcised train. Long since the suite should have been added to the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra.

Items of the Day

In a review of the first concerts of the Chicago Orchestra for the new season, on Friday and Saturday last, Mr. W. L. Hubbard writes pleasantly in The Tribune about Mr. Malkin now become the first violoncellist of Mr. Stock's band as he used to be under Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud at Symphony Hall. "Chief among the newcomers," says Mr. Hubbard, "was Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist, who comes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose personality and playing of a fragment of obbligato in Elgar's Variations hinted of popularity and musical good ...ing ... come."

From t... Oct 15 19...
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS
MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

When Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, went to France last summer to see his mother and father, his country and his countrymen for the first time since he was released from military service two years after the war started, he went with an eye peculiarly keen for new scores of interest, and voluminous indeed, is the music he brought back with him in order that he might have a wide choice among the best that is novel for his forthcoming programs. He is also awaiting the arrival of several scores in manuscript and some that are now "in press." Of course, some of these may not reach him in time for this winter's presentment but he hopes to be able to play works by Casella and Furina, young Italian composers; by Prokofieff, the youthful Russian, and by Roussel and Ravel, the French writers. He is also planning to play Stravinsky's much-discussed "Fire Bird" music; symphonies by Vincent d'Indy and Jean Hure and "Play," by Debussey. In Boston, in addition to the usual number of classic symphonies, he is planning to give two choral works, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Cæsar Franck's "Beatitudes." He also proposes to play some American music, in which he is said to be greatly interested.

"We may in time develop a true 'American music,'" Mr. Monteux said recently, "but that time has not arrived yet. At present American music is impregnated with the influence of Old-World music—of the Italian and the German, and the Russian composer. Unlike the music of these nations, you cannot recognize American music at once as typically characteristic. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American comes there will be no doubt of the nationality. It will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—but with a different style—an American style. I think it will come. It will be very original. Very American."

Mr. Monteux strongly believes that the public wants the music of Wagner, and he intends to give Wagner a due place on his programs—which is not large in symphony concerts.

"I think the time has come to regard music and war as two different things. I want to forget the war and my part in it," he is reported to have said. (It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France as one of them—in the trenches.) "To me the war is now very far off, and very unhappy. Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met in the thick of an engagement. I fired; oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck in loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind his rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy.

"Hardly a Sunday passed when I did not furnish the music for some rough-and-ready religious service. Sometimes I played a harmonium, sometimes, when fortune smiled, a real organ in a ruined church. Sometimes I had only my violin.

"Wagner is dead, but Strauss is living," he said, when questioned about the latter composer. "Still, I would very much like to play his music. During the conflict it seemed to me entirely wrong. But Strauss' music was not due to the war and the war is over. People's feelings are sensitive and their feelings, I wish above all, to respect. Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but fair, to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programs. Not to play his music is a definite loss, because even Strauss' poorer music is extremely effective and brilliant in orchestration. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory; the state, following the cataclysm, of the nerves of the world."

It has been pointed out that Mr. Monteux is always keen to please his public and that he is not ashamed of the fact. "I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one. I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners. The people do not always know what is best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to win out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?"

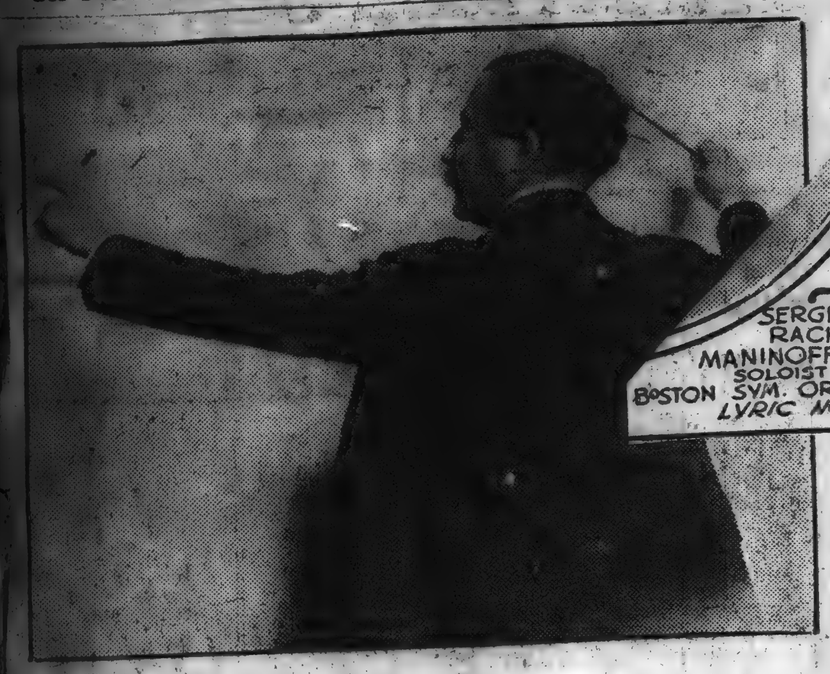
They say in France that there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects, the other is concerned first and last with the men before him, and he is ... occupied with the music to ... ficialities. Those who know say that Monteux is in ... "gallery" conductor, but ...

Music Notes

Does Providence Lag in Musical Progress?—Notes on Coming Concerts.—Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Season Under Pierre Monteux.

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL, OCTOBER 19, 19

prelude or several [illegible] began there was a sudden noise in the balcony, and Mr. Hackett, startled, plunged into his song without waiting for the orchestra to reach his cue. He was obviously [illegible]



Pierre Monteux
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

M. Monteux in Command.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made its initial bow for the season under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, and, as one of the Boston critics was glad to remark, "the war is over." There was loyal praise from them all for the organization, even though the first programme chosen, which was Beethoven's second symphony, for its main work, did not excite enthusiasm. Philip Hale declared that "the pleasure of the afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed.' The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful."

And of the orchestra Mr. Hale said: "It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the 24th, not the first."

Of the new conductor, who was in command of the orchestra for two concerts last season but is now being appraised from the point of view of his permanent engagement, H. T. Parker writes in the Boston Transcript:

"As for Mr. Monteux, he may be a conductor of this, that or the other rank in our American liking for degrees, but unmistakably he is interesting. His modesty, his subordination of himself to the task in hand, stand clear. As at the end of the symphony yesterday, it is the orchestra equally with the conductor that he would have the audience applaud. At his work, he is agreeable to the eye without superfluous vehemence or rigid insistence; while the players seem readily and responsively to understand him. A finely sensitive ear, hand and imagination surely ordered the performance of Debussy's prelude, discerning and maintaining the delicate formal outline, missing no play of tonal tint and half-tint, summoning and sustaining the sensuous impulse, the vaporous atmosphere, the half-sportive, half-melancholy fancy of the music—and all this loveliness in flowing fusion."

For the second pair of concerts Friday and yesterday Mr. Monteux chose Schumann's "Spring" symphony, followed by a suite by Enesco. These concerts also brought the return to New England of Albert Spaulding, who abruptly closed his tour in 1917 to enlist for foreign war service.

* * *

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 19,

SERGER RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST BOSTON SYM. ORCH. LYRIC NOV 5TH

EVENING JOURNAL
ess New York City
OCT 18 19

NEW D'INDY SYMPHONY NOV. 13.

Vincent d'ndy's new symphony, "De Bello Gallico" will have its first performance in New York at the New York Symphony Orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday afternoon, November 13, and at Aeolian Hall, November 16. Debussy's "Berceuse Heroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium, will also receive its first American presentation on November 13.

Advance submission of programs to each other by Walter Damrosch, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has solved the problem of duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts in New York. Mr. Monteux thus withdrew the d'Indy symphony for his November visit to New York and, in turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Sunday afternoon, November 9 instead of the

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa
OCT 19

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16. The first soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From PHILADELPHIA
OCT 10 1919

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierce Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 4, and March 16, for which series the sale of subscription tickets will close Friday Oct. 24. at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer, the American public had of course long known him well when he unexpectedly crossed the seas last Autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concerts with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

* * *

Commenting upon the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday, October 10, Mr. Philip Hale wrote in "The Herald:"—

"The hearty applause was not merely by way of compliment; it was spontaneous; a willing tribute to the indisputable proficiency talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivaled orchestra. It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the twenty-fourth, not the first.

"On the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed.' The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful.

"Debussy's prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun' was never so beautiful as it was yesterday, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbres, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable."

* * *

From Tribune
Chicago, Ill.
OCT 19 1919

Symphony Orchestra Opens 29th Season; Audience in Tribute

BY W. L. HUBBARD.

Chief among four newcomers was Joseph Malkin, the first cellist, who comes from the Boston Symphony orchestra, and whose personality and playing of a fragment of obbligato in the Elgar Variations hinted of popularity and of musical good things to come.

[illegible] included only one new

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Lyric Theater on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16, for which series the sale of tickets by subscription at Albaugh's ticket agency, 2 East Fayette street, will close next Friday, October 24.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer the American public has, of course, long known him well when he crossed the seas unexpectedly last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was then only memory and hearsay. After a few public performances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist as a performer was newly and vividly felt.

INQUIRER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19 1919

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the first of the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on November 3, December 1, January 5 and March 16. The sale of subscription tickets for this season will close on Friday next

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 18 19

SERGER RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LYRIC, WED. NOV. 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Under the fine leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra launched a busy season auspiciously a week ago Friday, with an exceptionally brilliant concert in Boston. Although the first concert in the Lyric Theater here will not take place until November 5, with the other four of the series scheduled for December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16, the sale of seats by subscription at Albaugh's Ticket Agency will close next Friday, October 24.

The first of the five famous soloists to appear at these concerts will be the phenomenal Russian pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff. By the concerts of last season, and notably by his performance of his own magnificent Second Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eminent Russian composer has impressed our public newly and vividly with his genius as a pianist. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

Baltimore News
Sunday, Oct. 19, 1919

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Boston a short time ago in a highly successful manner. Philip Hale, the well-known critic of the Boston Herald, wrote as follows:

"The hearty applause was not merely by way of compliment; it was spontaneous; a willing tribute to the indisputable talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivaled orchestra. It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the twenty-fourth, not the first.

"On the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic. The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful."

Sergei Rachminoff will be the soloist [illegible] the first of the local concerts by [illegible] Boston Symphony on November [illegible] the great Russian pianist-composer well known in Baltimore from [illegible] appearances. His is one of the [illegible] musical personalities of [illegible] and his playing is [illegible] emotional im-

ESTABLISHED 1836
From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 19

Rachmaninoff As Soloist.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Lyric Theatre on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer the American public had, of course, long known him well when he crossed the seas unexpectedly last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff, the pianist, there was then only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public performances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist as a performer was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa. 1919
OCT 19

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16. Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist soloist of last season. As a composer he was long known, but as a pianist there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his.

* * *

From Courant
Hartford, Conn.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season recently in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra expects to play 110 concerts during the season, ten of these being given in New York. Hartford, we understand, is to be favored with one of the concerts during the winter.

From Rock
OCT 1919

Dr. Karl Muck, once leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and once notorious because of a reported refusal to order "The Star Spangled Banner" played, is on his way to Europe, but not to his native Germany. Dr. Muck, who has been confined at Fort Oglethorpe as an alien enemy, was escorted to his ship by an agent of the Department of Justice. He declared he was going to Denmark.

From Bulletin OCT 18 1919
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five concerts under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, November 3, the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian pianist-composer.

Music Notes

Does Providence Lag in Musical Progress?—Notes on Coming Concerts.—Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Season Under Pierre Monteux.

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL. OCTOBER 19, 19

prelude of several bars ... began there was a sudden noise in the balcony, and Mr. Hackett, startled, plunged into his song without waiting for the orchestra to reach his cue.

He was obviously ...

SERGER RACH-MANINOFF SOLOIST BOSTON SYM. ORCH. LYRIC NOV 5TH

Pierre Monteux
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

M. Monteux in Command.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made its initial bow for the season under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, and, as one of the Boston critics was glad to remark, "the war is over." There was loyal praise from them all for the organization, even though the first programme chosen, which was Beethoven's second symphony, for its main work, did not excite enthusiasm. Philip Hale declared that "the pleasure of the afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed.' The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful."

And of the orchestra Mr. Hale said:

"It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the 24th, not the first."

Of the new conductor, who had ... command of the orchestra for two concerts last season but is now being appraised from the point of view of his permanent engagement, H. T. Parker writes in the Boston Transcript:

"As for Mr. Monteux, he may be a conductor of this, that or the other rank in our American liking for degrees, but unmistakably he is interesting. His modesty, his subordination of himself to the task in hand, stand clear. As at the end of the symphony yesterday, it is the orchestra gayly with the conductor that he would have the audience applaud. At his work, he is agreeable to the eye without superfluous vehemence or rigid insistence; while the players seem readily and responsively to understand him. A finely sensitive ear, hand and imagination surely ordered the performance of Debussy's prelude, discerning and maintaining the delicate formal outline, missing no play of tonal tint and half-tint, summoning and sustaining the sensuous impulse, the vaporous atmosphere, the half-sportive, half-melancholy fancy of the music—and all this loveliness in flowing fusion."

For the second pair of concerts Friday and yesterday Mr. Monteux chose Schumann's "Spring" symphony, followed by a suite by Enesco. These concerts also brought the return to New England of Albert Spaulding, who abruptly closed his tour in 1917 to enlist for foreign war service.

* * *

BALTIMORE AMERICAN, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 19,

SERGER RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LYRIC, WED. NOV. 5

EVENING JOURNAL
ess New York City
K OCT 18 1

NEW D'INDY SYMPHONY NOV. 13.

Vincent d'ndy's new symphony, "De Bello Gallico" will have its first performance in New York at the New York Symphony Orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday afternoon, November 13, and at Aeolian Hall, November 16. Debussy's "Berceuse Heroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium, will also receive its first American presentation on November 13.

Advance submission of programs to each other by Walter Damrosch, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has solved the problem of duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts in New York. Mr. Monteux thus withdrew the d'Indy symphony for his November visit to New York and, in turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Sunday afternoon, November 9 instead of the

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16. The first soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Lyric Theater on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16, for which series the sale of tickets by subscription at Albaugh's Ticket agency, 2 East Fayette street, will close next Friday, October 24.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer the American public had, of course, long known him well when he crossed the seas unexpectedly last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was then only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public performances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt.

INQUIRER
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
A OCT 18

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the first of the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on November 3, December 1, January 5 and March 16. The sale of subscription tickets for this season will close on Friday next.

Baltimore News
Sunday, Oct. 19, 1919

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Boston a short time ago in a highly successful manner. Philip Hale, the well-known critic of the Boston Herald, wrote as follows:

"The hearty applause was not merely by way of compliment; it was spontaneous; a willing tribute to the indisputable talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivaled orchestra. It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the twenty-fourth, not the first. "On the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic. The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful."

Sergei Rachminoff will be the soloist at the first of the local concerts by the Boston Symphony on November ... This great Russian pianist-composer ... well known in Baltimore from ... appearances. His is one of the ... musical personalities of ... and his playing is ... in its emotional im-

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date E OCT 18 19

Rachmaninoff As Soloist.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Lyric Theatre on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer the American public had, of course, long known him well when he crossed the seas unexpectedly last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff, the pianist, there was then only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public performances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist as a performer was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date E OCT 18 19

SERGER RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LYRIC, WED. NOV. 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Under the fine leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra launched a busy season auspiciously a week ago Friday, with an exceptionally brilliant concert in Boston. Although the first concert in the Lyric Theater here will not take place until November 5, with the other four of the series scheduled for December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 16, the sale of seats by subscription at Albaugh's Ticket Agency will close next Friday, October 24.

The first of the five famous soloists to appear at these concerts will be the phenomenal Russian pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff. By the concerts of last season, and notably by his performance of his own magnificent Second Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eminent Russian composer has impressed our public newly and vividly with his genius as a pianist. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
K OCT 18

* * *

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the evenings of November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16. Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist soloist of last season. As a composer he was long known, but as a pianist there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concertos with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his.

* * *

From
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierce Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 4, and March 16, for which series the sale of subscription tickets will close Friday Oct. 24. at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer, the American public had of course long known him well when he unexpectedly crossed the seas last Autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concerts with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt. Small wonder that no pianist of last year won a popularity comparable to his. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

* * *

Commenting upon the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday, October 10, Mr. Philip Hale wrote in "The Herald:"—

"The hearty applause was not merely by way of compliment; it was spontaneous; a willing tribute to the indisputable proficiency talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivaled orchestra. It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the twenty-fourth, not the first.

"On the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed." The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful.

"Debussy's prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun" was never so beautiful as it was yesterday, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbres, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable."

* * *

From Tribune
Chicago, Ill.

Symphony Orchestra Opens 29th Season; Audience in Tribute

BY W. L. HUBBARD.

Chief among four newcomers was Joseph Malkin, the first cellist, who comes from the Boston Symphony orchestra, and whose personality and playing of a fragment of obbligato in the Elgar Variations hinted of popularity and of musical good things to come.

The ... included only one new

From Courant
Hartford, Conn.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season recently in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra expects to play 110 concerts during the season, ten of these being given in New York. Hartford, we understand, is to be favored with one of the concerts during the winter.

From Rec

OCT

Dr. Karl Muck, once leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and once notorious because of a reported refusal to order "The Star Spangled Banner" played, is on his way to Europe, but not to his native Germany. Dr. Muck, who has been confined at Fort Oglethorpe as an alien enemy, was escorted to his ship by an agent of the Department of Justice. He declared he was going to Denmark.

*

From Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five concerts under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, November 3, the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian pianist-composer.

TRANSCRIPT, THURS

DAY, OCTOBER 23, 1

D'INDY'S NEW SYMPHONY

MUSIC OF HIS REACTIONS TO THE WAR

First Performance in America at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow — The Course and the Quality of the Piece—Origins and Outcome—The Composer in Familiar and Unfamiliar Aspect

SINCE d'Indy's third symphony, bearing the significant sub-title "Sinfonia brevis, de bello gallico," is to be played at the Symphony Concerts of this week for the first times in America, and not improbably for the only performances so far out of Paris, some hints of its method, style and contents may not inappropriately be given herewith.

The student of Vincent d'Indy's music is by this time aware that it presents an unusual and yet logical fusion of classic style and obvious modernity of expression. The plain chant of the Roman church, the essence of sixteenth century counterpoint, the fugue, canon and passacaglia of the eighteenth century, dramatic procedure from Monteverde to Wagner, the variation of Bach, Beethoven and César Franck, the salient features of sonata treatment from Beethoven to Franck, have each and all contributed distinctive elements to a style at once individual and original. This process of assimilation meets the inevitable test in that it has progressed far beyond mere imitation to genuine re-creation; not an echo, but a basis for new thought as well as advance in style. In d'Indy's case the influences of classicism has not been to restrict but to enlarge avenues of individual utterance by virtue of its intellectual breadth.

The study of d'Indy's third symphony reveals at once that it does not depart from the unalterable conviction of the composer's artistic maturity. It manifests the usual tokens of classicism, not the versatile and makeshift neo-classicism of Saint-Saëns, but that of a living and inevitable need, in which a symphony is still a normal and grateful medium for musical thought. It calls for the accepted instrumental forces of the modern symphonic orchestra with the exception of a high clarinet, a high trumpet (especially beloved of d'Indy and employed in many of his later works) and the specific requirement of a French military drum in addition to the usual snare drum. Its plan is that of the customary four movements, in which the substitute for a scherzo comes second and the slow movement third. Moreover, it contains no striking departure from the conventional structure of symphonic movements, yet within these limits the music is of a vital order of expression such as no living composer save d'Indy could have written.

As is frequently the case the first movement begins with an introduction, slow in tempo and tranquil in mood. After four measures of preluding strings a theme is heard in flutes and clarinets against a figure in the violoncellos. It passes to another key and instrumental combination, returns to its original tonality soon leading to the main body of the movement with a vigorous theme derived from the introductory phrase. Soon the normal "transition" appears, not derived from the first theme but in slower tempo and of a radically different character To this succeeds in a "regular" key a noble and uplifting second theme sung first by the horns, and continued by the strings. Horn phrases and reminiscences of the "transitional" theme bring the "exposition" section of the movement to an end. The "development" is made up of transformations of the first theme, the transitional motive, and a new and expressive episode "Lent et Anxieux" indicative of conflict and strain. The "recapitulation" portion of the movement is unusual in that the development leads to the "restatement" of the "second theme" first in B major and then in the "home key" D major, followed by the phrases which closed the exposition. Then the first theme returns, and there is a short but brilliant peroration.

The second movement, of the slow scherzo type, opens with a playful theme in the strings, developed with inconspicuous yet palpably scholarly resources of canonic style, but spontaneous withal. At intervals a heavy rhythmical phrase interrupts the normal germination of the theme with evident descriptive intent. The trio contains a buoyant theme for horn, not unrelated in character to the reiterated melody for horns in the second movement of "A Summer Day in the Mountain." It is taken up by various instrumental combinations. Dissonant trumpet calls of warning bring back the first section, but the repetition is varied in many ways, especially by new canonic devices.

After a few introductory measures by wind instruments, the slow movement begins with a profoundly expressive and reflective theme in the strings, recalling the mood of "Evening" in "A Summer Day in the Mountain." A sharply rhythmical episode in the wood winds interrupts, but the earlier theme persists, accompanied by figures derived from the episode. After a varied development it returns in the divided strings against a waving arpeggio accompaniment, reaching an eloquent climax. There is a quiet and emotional close.

The finale opens with dissonant calls in horns and trumpets passing to the woodwind. The main theme appears in the full orchestra, showing some affinity with the theme of the slow movement. Much is made of a brilliant and majestic ascending figure in the strings, which after some development combined with phrases from the introduction leads directly to the second theme. A somewhat stormy development, involving both themes and figures from the introduction brings a "restatement" of the earlier section but with changes of tonality. An episode recalls the theme and mood of the slow movement. Then the second theme returns in victorious apotheosis given to trumpets and flutes accompanied by full orchestra leading to a triumphant close.

As a whole, the symphony while treated with a ripe scholarship totally free from pedantry, is less complex than the second symphony in B flat, first heard here under Mr. Gericke and later under the composer's baton. A comparison between the new work and its predecessor is perhaps inevitable. But such a summing-up is hardly possible, since the two works differ markedly in expressive purpose. D'Indy, a man of deep sentiment and a patriot before being an artist, a veteran of the Franco-Prussian war, was stirred in common with the rest of the civilized world by the barbarities of the recent war. This symphony, composed from 1916 to 1918, could not attain the detachment and the preoccupation with the problems of "absolute music" which characterized the second symphony finished fifteen years before. D'Indy must perforce be affected by the supreme trials and the heroic struggles of his country during its composition. While no "programme" is indicated, this symphony is obviously a record of strife, privations and ultimate triumph. It needs no written basis, no ticketing of episodes, or dramatic interpretation of themes or figures employed. D'Indy wrote from a full heart, and the form which best suited his need of utterance was the classic symphony. If in some respects a different d'Indy is mirrored therein, the symphony as a whole, and more particularly the slow movement, is a vital presentation of the reaction of the external world in music of commanding force and beauty. This work presents d'Indy from a new angle; one in which he can no longer be termed ascetic or cerebral, as some of his detractors have affirmed at times. It is rather a token of his keen moral and spiritual participation in the fortunes of his country.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

Boston Herald Oct 26

CONDUCTORS SOLVE A CONCERT PROBLEM

Walter Damrosch and Pierre Monteux have solved the problem of unnecessary duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts. During his visit in Paris last summer Mr. Damrosch suggested a plan to M. Monteux, according to which the home orchestra sends its program scheme to the visiting conductor at the earliest time possible. This enables the visiting conductor to avoid duplications, and should result in mutual concessions made in a friendly spirit. Mr. Monteux was heartily in sympathy with this plan, and a practical result of the arrangement is already seen in the fact that M. Monteux courteously withdrew his performance of the d'Indy Third Symphony for his November visit to New York because Mr. Damrosch had already announced it for the same week. In turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9, instead of the second, as announced, as M. Monteux wished to perform the latter at his concert of Nov. 8.

LOCAL NOTES

Boston Herald Oct 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is one of unusual interest. The symphony will be Haydn's "Queen of France," written for Paris. Strange to say, no record of a performance of it here for over 70 years has yet been found. Mr. Rachmaninoff will play his third piano concerto which will be heard here for the first time. Stravinsky Suite, "The Fire-Bird," derived from his gorgeous ballet of the same name, will also be heard here for the first time. Its movements are: I., Enchanted Garden of Katschei and Dance of the Fire-Bird; II., Supplication of the Fire-Bird; III., the Princesses Play with the Golden Apples—Lullaby; IV., Dance of the Princesses; V., Infernal Dance of Katschei's Subjects.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3 o'clock, on which date a traditional practice, suspended last year, will be revived. Miss Mabel Garrison of the Metropolitan opera company will be the soloist, gracing with her arias a program which, orchestrally speaking, will be of exceptional interest. Performing Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Mr. Monteux will restore a composer long absent from these concerts. The other pieces will be the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "William Tell."

Boston Globe Oct. 26

positions, a Valse, op. 10, and the "Etude Tableau," op 39.

This Week's Symphony Concert

Serged Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play his own Third Concerto which is said to excel his Second, which he played here last season.

The symphony will be one by Haydn in B flat, dedicated to Marie Antoinette from the set written in 1784-6 for the "Concerts Spirituels" in Paris. It is No. 85 in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition and is known as "The Queen." This will be the first performance at these concerts. By exception none of the music on the program has ever been played by the Symphony Orchestra before.

The remaining number on the program is the suite which Stravinsky has arranged for concert performance from the music to his ballet "The Firebird," given here by the Russian Ballet. This should prove one of the most interesting pieces of modern music added to the repertory of the orchestra in many years.

Musical Happenings

Mabel Garrison will be the soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Sunday, Nov 23. The program is unusually attractive, since every number on it is an old favorite. It includes the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and Rossini's overture to William Tell.

Next Tuesday afternoon at Steinert [illegible] Miss Marion Carley will make her

---

ORCHESTRA HELPS AMERICAN COMPOSERS

A Suggestion for the Boston Symphony—Practical Way of Assisting American Genius

The Chicago Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, has resolved on a course which is going to be of the utmost value and helpfulness to the American composer, and one which might well be considered in this city. Once a month, from October to April, there will be given, privately, readings of new works by American composers. The only people present will be the composers, their friends and a few guests of the orchestra. Mr. Stock will be the judge of the compositions which the orchestra, a very expert band, will read through. At last there will be the opportunity, so rare in this country, for young composers to try out their own works, discover how they actually sound in performance, and learn by the experience. Mr. Stock, on his side, will be likely to discover some works worthy of public presentation.

In the past the inexperience of young composers has been matched by their difficulty in finding an opportunity of discovering just what they had written. A song, a choral work, stands a good chance of early performance. But compositions in the larger symphonic forms, for orchestra, are another matter. Sadly enough, these very compositions are the ones which it is most necessary that the composer should hear played, in order to gain experience of instrumentation and of the putting together of big musical structures. One opportunity to hear a work which has been written is worth a hundred lessons in composition. As a result of this difficulty our young composers frequently go abroad, where they can get practical experience in music quicker than they can here, or, for lack of something better, accustom themselves to producing music of the least serious kinds for the theatre or the band concert, or go for years without discovering what they might have discovered in half an hour if there had been any opportunity of hearing a composition which—the general public should not have been forced to hear. Some past conductors of the Boston Symphony have not encouraged Americans. Others—Dr. Muck among them—sometimes were so encouraging that American compositions not worth a hearing were performed. Mr. Stock's plan is the most practical, wise and helpful plan for young American composers that we have heard of, and it is a plan which might well be emulated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Jewish Exponent

INCORPORATED 1[illegible]

[illegible]08 CHESTNUT STR[illegible]

OCK BOX 1327 TELEPHONE WA[illegible]

Philadelphia Baltimore N[illegible]

Fritz N. Germon, Mana[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16, for which series the sale of subscription tickets will close Friday, October 24, at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer, the American public had, of course, long known him well when he unexpectedly crossed the seas last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concerts with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly fel[illegible]

Advertiser Oct 26

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, November 23. Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and

Amusements

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday is unusual in that none of the offerings has been heard at these concerts before. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, is to play the piano part of his latest concerto in D minor. The Symphony will be Haydn's in B flat. The suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire," is also on the list.

Boston Post Oct. 26

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3 o'clock, on which date a traditional practice, suspended last year, will be revived. Miss Mabel Garrison, the young coloratura soprono of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, adding her arias to a programme which, orchestrally speaking, will be of exceptional interest. By performing Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic" symphony, Pierre Monteux will restore a composer long absent from these concerts. The other number will be the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST

The fourth programme for the pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday and Saturday (the succeeding week to be occupied by the first "Southern trip" of the season) is unusual in that none of it has been heard at these concerts before. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will play the piano part of the latest Concerto in D minor (No. 3), said in many ways to excel his Second Concerto, which he played with the orchestra last year. The Symphony will be Haydn's in B-flat, inscribed to "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. Opening the programme in the spirit of the 18th century, Pierre Monteux will close it in the spirit of the 20th by playing the suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his daring ballet, "The Bird of Fire." Mr. Monteux's superb rendering of the music in the danced version for the Russian Ballet is well remembered. The suite will contain six numbers, as follows:

I. Introduction. Enchanted Garden of Katschei, and the Dance of the Fire-Bird.
II. Entreaties of the Fire-Bird.
III. The Princesses playing with the Golden Apples.
IIIa. Lullaby.
IV. Dance (Rondo) of the Princesses.
V. Infernal Dance of Katschei's Subjects.

STAR

ress: 28 Baltimore, Md.

OCT 25

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master pianist of Russia, will be soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5. Rachmaninoff will play the piano part in his newest Third Concerto, which is considered even more striking in sombre theme and wild rhythm than the second which he played last year. The purely symphonic numbers which Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen, will surely make a program striking in variety and interest. Beginning with Haydn's symphony, inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette, the music will leap from the eighteenth century to the twentieth by the performance of a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire." Mr. Monteux, as former conductor of the Russian Ballet, is already noted for his rendering of this daring Rus-

---

From [illegible]

OCT 25 1919

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will be held in Infantry Hall, Tuesday night, Nov. 18. Mr. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will conduct. The soloists announced for the five concerts are Sophie Braslau, Jean Bedetti, Emilio De Gorgorza, Sergei Rachmaninoff and Albert Spalding.

From North American Philadelphia, Pa.

BEST MUSICAL FOR SEASO

True Cosmopolitanism Is Promised in Attitude of Public and Leaders

Orchestra Concerts of Unusual Interest; Some Forthcoming Recitals

By Linton P. Martin

The rousing welcome given Fritz Kreisler yesterday at his first public appearance here since the war was a magnificent thing for the musical life of the city. It may well be interpreted as an evidence of returning cosmopolitanism in matters musical, insuring the presentation of musical programs and musicians on their intrinsic merits, and not as a part of this, that or the other nationalistic propaganda basing its claim for attention on sentiment. Perhaps in fifty years we may even have Wagner fully restored to the operatic roster!

One thing is increasingly certain. Our great musical leaders are showing in their plans for the new season that they do not intend to permit political prejudices to interfere with the integrity of their artistic judgment. One of the foremost orchestral and operatic conductors in the world today, Arturo Toscanini, has recently had some pungent things to say about the mixture of art and politics, and at a great concert in Italy played a Beethoven-Wagner program with thrilling results. The audience cheered for half an hour, and, true to its Latin blood, carried the great conductor on their shoulders in triumphal procession.

Of more immediate interest to Philadelphia concertgoers is the assurance of Pierre Monteux, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he will immediately restore Wagner to his programs, and that Strauss also will be heard if there is a popular demand for his works. Such declarations as these hold the definite promise that any nationalistic propaganda for music or any other art fostered in this country must expect to stand or fall by the standard of the survival of the fittest.

Thus far the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra has not been very definite about his general policy or detailed his plans for the season. But the Wagner numbers that made their timid appearance on a few programs toward the close of the season were at least a good beginning, and perhaps it is not too much to hope that this season will bring forth a revival of the all-Wagner programs which have been so popular with Philadelphia audiences in former seasons. Certainly we have given modern French music more than a fair trial and found it wanting. Loyalty to an ally does not demand that we afflict our ears with the tedious and the uninspired, and it is earnestly to be hoped that our programs this season will not be cluttered up with vapid novelties that merely waste time and weary one's patience. Give us the music that makes for beauty. There is too little of it in existence any other.

ON T[illegible]

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1

D'INDY'S NEW SYMPHONY

MUSIC OF HIS REACTIONS TO THE WAR

First Performance in America at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow — The Course and the Quality of the Piece—Origins and Outcome—The Composer in Familiar and Unfamiliar Aspect

SINCE d'Indy's third symphony, bearing the significant sub-title "Sinfonia brevis, de bello gallico," is to be played at the Symphony Concerts of this week for the first times in America, and not improbably for the only performances so far out of Paris, some hints of its method, style and contents may not inappropriately be given herewith.

The student of Vincent d'Indy's music is by this time aware that it presents an unusual and yet logical fusion of classic style and obvious modernity of expression. The plain chant of the Roman church, the essence of sixteenth century counterpoint, the fugue, canon and passacaglia of the eighteenth century, dramatic procedure from Monteverde to Wagner, the variation of Bach, Beethoven and César Franck, the salient features of sonata treatment from Beethoven to Franck, have each and all contributed distinctive elements to a style at once individual and original. This process of assimilation meets the inevitable test in that it has progressed far beyond mere imitation to genuine re-creation; not an echo, but a basis for new thought as well as advance in style. In d'Indy's case the influences of classicism has not been to restrict but to enlarge avenues of individual utterance by virtue of its intellectual breadth.

The study of d'Indy's third symphony reveals at once that it does not depart from the unalterable conviction of the composer's artistic maturity. It manifests the usual tokens of classicism, not the versatile and makeshift neo-classicism of Saint-Saëns, but that of a living and inevitable need, in which a symphony is still a normal and grateful medium for musical thought. It calls for the accepted instrumental forces of the modern symphonic orchestra with the exception of a high clarinet, a high trumpet (especially beloved of d'Indy and employed in many of his later works) and the specific requirement of a French military drum in addition to the usual snare drum. Its plan is that of the customary four movements, in which the substitute for a scherzo comes second and the slow movement third. Moreover, it contains no striking departure from the conventional structure of symphonic movements, yet within these limits the music is of a vital order of expression such as no living composer save d'Indy could have written.

As is frequently the case the first movement begins with an introduction, slow in tempo and tranquil in mood. After four measures of preluding strings a theme is heard in flutes and clarinets against a figure in the violoncellos. It passes to another key and instrumental combination, returns to its original tonality soon leading to the main body of the movement with a vigorous theme derived from the introductory phrase. Soon the normal "transition" appears, not derived from the first theme but in slower tempo and of a radically different character To this succeeds in a "regular" key a noble and uplifting second theme sung first by the horns, and continued by the strings. Horn phrases and reminiscences of the "transitional" theme bring the "exposition" section of the movement to an end. The "development" is made up of transformations of the first theme, the transitional motive, and a new and expressive episode "Lent et Anxieux" indicative of conflict and strain. The "recapitulation" portion of the movement is unusual in that the development leads to the "restatement" of the "second theme" first in B major and then in the "home key" D major, followed by the phrases which closed the exposition. Then the first theme returns, and there is a short but brilliant peroration.

The second movement, of the slow scherzo type, opens with a playful theme in the strings, developed with inconspicuous yet palpably scholarly resources of canonic style, but spontaneous withal. At intervals a heavy rhythmical phrase interrupts the normal germination of the theme with evident descriptive intent. The trio contains a buoyant theme for horn, not unrelated in character to the reiterated melody for horns in the second movement of "A Summer Day in the Mountain." It is taken up by various instrumental combinations. Dissonant trumpet calls of warning bring back the first section, but the repetition is varied in many ways, especially by new canonic devices.

After a few introductory measures by wind instruments, the slow movement begins with a profoundly expressive and reflective theme in the strings, recalling the mood of "Evening" in "A Summer Day in the Mountain." A sharply rhythmical episode in the wood winds interrupts, but the earlier theme persists, accompanied by figures derived from the episode. After a varied development it returns in the divided strings against a waving arpeggio accompaniment, reaching an eloquent climax. There is a quiet and emotional close.

The finale opens with dissonant calls in horns and trumpets passing to the woodwind. The main theme appears in the full orchestra, showing some affinity with the theme of the slow movement. Much is made of a brilliant and majestic ascending figure in the strings, which after some development combined with phrases from the introduction leads directly to the second theme. A somewhat stormy development, involving both themes and figures from the introduction brings a "restatement" of the earlier section but with changes of tonality. An episode recalls the theme and mood of the slow movement. Then the second theme returns in victorious apotheosis given to trumpets and flutes accompanied by full orchestra leading to a triumphant close.

As a whole, the symphony while treated with a ripe scholarship totally free from pedantry, is less complex than the second symphony in B flat, first heard here under Mr. Gericke and later under the composer's baton. A comparison between the new work and its predecessor is perhaps inevitable. But such a summing-up is hardly possible, since the two works differ markedly in expressive purpose. D'Indy, a man of deep sentiment and a patriot before being an artist, a veteran of the Franco-Prussian war, was stirred in common with the rest of the civilized world by the barbarities of the recent war. This symphony, composed from 1916 to 1918, could not attain the detachment and the preoccupation with the problems of "absolute music" which characterized the second symphony finished fifteen years before. D'Indy must perforce be affected by the supreme trials and the heroic struggles of his country during its composition. While no "programme" is indicated, this symphony is obviously a record of strife, privations and ultimate triumph. It needs no written basis, no ticketing of episodes, or dramatic interpretation of themes or figures employed. D'Indy wrote from a full heart, and the form which best suited his need of utterance was the classic symphony. If in some respects a different d'Indy is mirrored therein, the symphony as a whole, and more particularly the slow movement, is a vital presentation of the reaction of the external world in music of commanding force and beauty. This work presents d'Indy from a new angle; one in which he can no longer be termed ascetic or cerebral, as some of his detractors have affirmed at times. It is rather a token of his keen moral and spiritual participation in the fortunes of his country.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

Boston Herald Oct 26

CONDUCTORS SOLVE A CONCERT PROBLEM

Walter Damrosch and Pierre Monteux have solved the problem of unnecessary duplication of the orchestral works presented at their respective concerts. During his visit in Paris last summer Mr. Damrosch suggested a plan to M. Monteux, according to which the home orchestra sends its program scheme to the visiting conductor at the earliest time possible. This enables the visiting conductor to avoid duplications, and should result in mutual concessions made in a friendly spirit. Mr. Monteux was heartily in sympathy with this plan, and a practical result of the arrangement is already seen in the fact that M. Monteux courteously withdrew his performance of the d'Indy Third Symphony for his November visit to New York because Mr. Damrosch had already announced it for the same week. In turn, Mr. Damrosch will play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9, instead of the second, as announced, as M. Monteux wished to perform the latter at his concert of Nov. 8.

LOCAL NOTES

Boston Herald Oct 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is one of unusual interest. The symphony will be Haydn's "Queen of France," written for Paris. Strange to say, no record of a performance of it here for over 70 years has yet been found. Mr. Rachmaninoff will play his third piano concerto which will be heard here for the first time. Stravinsky Suite, "The Fire-Bird," derived from his gorgeous ballet of the same name, will also be heard here for the first time. Its movements are: I., Enchanted Garden of Katschei and Dance of the Fire-Bird; II., Supplication of the Fire-Bird; III., the Princesses Play with the Golden Apples—Lullaby; IV., Dance of the Princesses; V., Infernal Dance of Katschei's Subjects.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3 o'clock, on which date a traditional practice, suspended last year, will be revived. Miss Mabel Garrison of the Metropolitan opera company will be the soloist, gracing with her arias a program which, orchestrally speaking, will be of exceptional interest. Performing Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Mr. Monteux will restore a composer long absent from these concerts. The other pieces will be the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "William Tell."

Boston Globe Oct. 26

positions, a Valse, op. 10, and the "Etude Tableau," op 39.

This Week's Symphony Concert

Serged Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play his own Third Concerto, which is said to excel his Second, which he played here last season.

The symphony will be one by Haydn, in B flat, dedicated to Marie Antoinette, from the set written in 1784-6 for the "Concerts Spirituels" in Paris. It is No. 85 in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition, and is known as "The Queen." This will be the first performance at these concerts. By exception none of the music on the program has ever been played by the Symphony Orchestra before.

The remaining number on the program is the suite which Stravinsky has arranged for concert performance from the music to his ballet "The Firebird," given here by the Russian Ballet. This should prove one of the most interesting pieces of modern music added to the repertory of the orchestra in many years.

Musical Happenings

Mabel Garrison will be the soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Sunday, Nov 23. The program is unusually attractive, since every number on it is an old favorite. It includes the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and Rossini's overture to William Tell.

Next Tuesday afternoon at Steinert [illegible] Miss Marion Carley will make her

The Jewish Exponent
INCORPORATED 1[illegible]
508 CHESTNUT STR[illegible]
LOCK BOX 1327 TELEPHONE WA[illegible]
Philadelphia Baltimore [illegible]
Felix N. Gerson, Mana[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brilliantly opened its season in Boston under Pierre Monteux, the new leader, will give five concerts in the Academy of Music on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 4 and March 16, for which series the sale of subscription tickets will close Friday, October 24, at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. As a composer, the American public had, of course, long known him well when he unexpectedly crossed the seas last autumn. But of Rachmaninoff the pianist, there was only dim memory and hearsay. After a few public appearances, particularly those in which he played his own splendid concerts with orchestra, the genius of the great artist was newly and vividly felt

STAR
Address: 28 Baltimore, Md.
OCT 25

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master pianist of Russia, will be soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5. Rachmaninoff will play the piano part in his newest Third Concerto, which is considered even more striking in sombre theme and wild rhythm than the second which he played last year. The purely symphonic numbers which Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen, will surely make a program striking in variety and interest. Beginning with Haydn's symphony, inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette, the music will leap from the eighteenth century to the twentieth by the performance of a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire." Mr. Monteux, as former conductor of the Russian Ballet, is already noted for his rendering of this daring Rus-

From [illegible]

OCT 25 1919

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will be held in Infantry Hall, Tuesday night, Nov. 18. Mr. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will conduct. The soloists announced for the five concerts are Sophie Braslau, Jean Bedetti, Emilio De Gorgorza, Sergei Rachmaninoff and Albert Spalding.

Advertiser Oct 26

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, November 23. Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and

Amusements

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday is unusual in that none of the offerings has been heard at these concerts before. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, is to play the piano part of his latest concerto in D minor. The Symphony will be Haydn's in B flat. The suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire," is also on the list.

From North American Philadelphia, Pa.

BEST MUSICAL FOR SEASO

True Cosmopolitanism Is Promised in Attitude of Public and Leaders

Orchestra Concerts of Unusual Interest; Some Forthcoming Recitals

By Linton P. Martin

The rousing welcome given Fritz Kreisler yesterday at his first public appearance here since the war was a magnificent thing for the musical life of the city. It may well be interpreted as an evidence of returning cosmopolitanism in matters musical, insuring the presentation of musical programs and musicians on their intrinsic merits, and not as a part of this, that or the other nationalistic propaganda basing its claim for attention on sentiment. Perhaps in fifty years we may even have Wagner fully restored to the operatic roster!

One thing is increasingly certain. Our great musical leaders are showing in their plans for the new season that they do not intend to permit political prejudices to interfere with the integrity of their artistic judgment. One of the foremost orchestral and operatic conductors in the world today, Arturo Toscanini, has recently had some pungent things to say about the mixture of art and politics, and at a great concert in Italy played a Beethoven-Wagner program with thrilling results. The audience cheered for half an hour, and, true to its Latin blood, carried the great conductor on their shoulders in triumphal procession.

Of more immediate interest to Philadelphia concertgoers is the assurance of Pierre Monteux, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he will immediately restore Wagner to his programs, and that Strauss also will be heard if there is a popular demand for his works. Such declarations as these hold the definite promise that any nationalistic propaganda for music or any other art fostered in this country must expect to stand or fall by the standard of the survival of the fittest.

Thus far the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra has not been very definite about his general policy or detailed his plans for the season. But the Wagner numbers that made their timid appearance on a few programs toward the close of the season were at least a good beginning, and perhaps it is not too much to hope that this season will bring forth a revival of the all-Wagner programs which have been so popular with Philadelphia audiences in former seasons. Certainly we have given modern French music more than a fair trial and found it wanting. Loyalty to an ally does not demand that we afflict our ears with the tedious and the uninspired, and it is earnestly to be hoped that our programs this season will not be cluttered up with vapid novelties that merely waste time and weary one's patience. . . . the music that makes for . . . There is too little . . . any other.

ON T[illegible]

ORCHESTRA HELPS AMERICAN COMPOSERS

A Suggestion for the Boston Symphony—Practical Way of Assisting American Genius

The Chicago Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, has resolved on a course which is going to be of the utmost value and helpfulness to the American composer, and one which might well be considered in this city. Once a month, from October to April, there will be given, privately, readings of new works by American composers. The only people present will be the composers, their friends and a few guests of the orchestra. Mr. Stock will be the judge of the compositions which the orchestra, a very expert band, will read through. At last there will be the opportunity, so rare in this country, for young composers to try out their own works, discover how they actually sound in performance, and learn by the experience. Mr. Stock, on his side, will be likely to discover some works worthy of public presentation.

In the past the inexperience of young composers has been matched by their difficulty in finding an opportunity of discovering just what they had written. A song, a choral work, stands a good chance of early performance. But compositions in the larger symphonic forms, for orchestra, are another matter. Sadly enough, these very compositions are the ones which it is most necessary that the composer should hear played, in order to gain experience of instrumentation and of the putting together of big musical structures. One opportunity to hear a work which has been written is worth a hundred lessons in composition. As a result of this difficulty our young composers frequently go abroad, where they can get practical experience in music quicker than they can here, or, for lack of something better, accustom themselves to producing music of the least serious kinds for the theatre or the band concert, or go for years without discovering what they might have discovered in half an hour if there had been any opportunity of hearing a composition which—the general public should not have been forced to hear. Some past conductors of the Boston Symphony have not encouraged Americans. Others—Dr. Muck among them—sometimes were so encouraging that American compositions not worth a hearing were performed. Mr. Stock's plan is the most practical, wise and helpful plan for young American composers that we have heard of, and it is a plan which might well be emulated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Post Oct. 26

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A popular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians, will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3 o'clock, on which date a traditional practice, suspended last year, will be revived. Miss Mabel Garrison, the young coloratura soprono of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, adding her arias to a programme which, orchestrally speaking, will be of exceptional interest. By performing Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic" symphony, Pierre Monteux will restore a composer long absent from these concerts. The other number will be the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST

The fourth programme for the pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday and Saturday (the succeeding week to be occupied by the first "Southern trip" of the season) is unusual in that none of it has been heard at these concerts before. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will play the piano part of the latest Concerto in D minor (No. 3), said in many ways to excel his Second Concerto, which he played with the orchestra last year. The Symphony will be Haydn's in B-flat, inscribed to "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. Opening the programme in the spirit of the 18th century. Pierre Monteux will close it in the spirit of the 20th by playing the suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his daring ballet, "The Bird of Fire." Mr. Monteux's superb rendering of the music in the danced version for the Russian Ballet is well remembered. The suite will contain six numbers, as follows:

I. Introduction. Enchanted Garden of Katschei, and the Dance of the Fire-Bird.
II. Entreaties of the Fire-Bird.
III. The Princesses playing with the Golden Apples.
IIIa. Lullaby.
IV. Dance (Rondo) of the Princesses.
V. Infernal Dance of Katschei's Subjects.

SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

D'Indy's Work on French War Given First Time—Brilliant Performance

OLD BALLET MUSIC OF BEETHOVEN ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Short Symphony Concerning the Gallic War (first time in America); Beethoven, Overture and Ballet No. 5, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, "A Siegfried" Idyl; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes."

The title of D'Indy's symphony is in Latin. Did he consciously or unconsciously borrow "De Bello Gallico" from Julius Caesar? It matters not: the symphony, composed in 1916-18 and first performed in Paris last May, was inspired by the war; the two chief themes of the first movement are intended to typify the French and the Huns; there is the attempt to portray in music the suspense, the anguish, the heroism of the French; and at last there is the triumphal march, the apotheosis of victory, with the fanfares and the salvoes of tumultuous rejoicing. In other words, this symphony is a "piece d'occasion."

The fate of these pieces has usually been unfortunate, like that of many "prize compositions." A new work from Vincent d'Indy is awaited with more than ordinary expectation. The composer of the Symphony on a Mountain Air, of the noble Symp[hony] in B Flat, of the georgeou[s] "Is[tar] variations—not to mention other works orchestral of another nature—is never hurried, restless; an experimenter in the pursuit of his art. Yet there are emotions so deep, so mastering, that they are not to be fully expressed even in music, which has been said to be the language of the inexpressible. It would seem that in this symphony flaming patriotism has consumed purely musical thought; that the Frenchman dominates the artist. Perhaps d'Indy and his fellow-countrymen would have it so. The symphony is therefore interesting as a vivid outpouring of patriotism; as purely a work of art it cannot be ranked with the works above named.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Symphony is technically engrossing, for d'Indy is an acknowledged master. There are pages that are fully worthy of the musician that wrote the Symphony in B flat and "Istar." The introduction portraying the peace and calm of France before the ruthless invasion of Belgium is singularly beautiful. There are brilliant measures in the Scherzo. The first section of the slow movement is profoundly emotional, but what is the significance of the abrupt, perplexing, disconcerting change in mood? We say "significance," for although the score has no printed argument, there surely was a "program" in the composer's mind. The Finale, inspiriting chiefly by reason of its dynamic force, is rather commonplace with the possible exception of the pages in which, according to a Parisian critic, the theme of St. Michael is proclaimed victoriously by the little trumpet in D while massive chords punctuate after an old fashion long approved by d'Indy's predecessors.

Beethoven's little ballet overture had not been heard at a symphony concert for 10 years. The Adagio was a favorite piece in the years of Theodore Thomas's and the Harvard Musical Association's concerts, from 1869 till 1882. It is graceful, pretty music, which served yesterday to display the talent and taste of Messrs. Bedetti, Holy, Laurent, Laus and Sand in solo measures.

Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading of Liszt's familiar "Preludes," and saved it for the most part from the charge of sentimentalism and the reproach of bombast.

The great audience was most appreciative, distributing applause with impartial hands. The new symphony and Beethoven's music were especially well received.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Haydn's Symphony "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto in D minor No. 3 (first time in Boston); Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

CAVALRY DRILL

America Oct 25

On Sunday afternoon, November 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will revive a custom suspended last year by giving a popular concert outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians. The soloist will be Miss Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera. The orchestral numbers will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the [Prelude] and "Love-Death" from Wa[gner's] "Tristan and Isolde," and [the] William Tell

BOSTON POST, SA[TURDAY]

AY, OCTOBER 25,

WAR PIECE PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

D'Indy's Work Given For First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vincent d'Indy's "short symphony concerning the Gallic war" ("Sinfonia brevis de bello Gallico") was played for the first time in America at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other compositions were the overture and the fifth number from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

SECOND MOVEMENT GOOD

D'Indy's symphony, composed in 1916-18 and performed for the first time at a concert of the Societe Nationale, Paris, in May, 1919, is in memory of the German invasion of France and the final triumph of the allied arms. The composer suggests first, in a very beautiful way, the calm of the French country-side. The Hunnish forces are then caricatured. There are martial themes for the French. There are four movements. The last is theatrical and triumphal in character. The third movement, the slow movement, of a lofty nature, leads d'Indy inevitably to thoughts of his master, Franck.

For us the second movement is the most interesting and sustained in its excellence, musically speaking, of the four. Much of the rest is piece-meal, full of transparent devices for effect, overworked sequences, tricks of instrumentation—a d'Indy, in short, miles below the d'Indy of the second symphony and the "Istar" variations, which are among the wonders of the modern musical art. Music for patriotic celebration is seldom valuable as music. There was warm applause, however, for this symphony.

Five Solo Parts

The overture appears to be the best part of the Prometheus music. The slow movement gave opportunity for instrumentalists of the orchestra, playing solo parts, to show their art. At the close of the serene and melodious piece Messrs. Laurent, flute; Sand, clarinet; Laus, bassoon; Holy, harp, and Bedetti, the admirable new 'cellist, bowed in response to applause.

The "Siegfried Idyl" is a little overlong, a little discursive. But it is exquisite poetry, and notwithstanding its undue length, music written with a master hand. It excites wonder every time it is heard. The interweaving of endless melody, the manner in which each musical idea puts forth fresh branches and tendrils and leaves, as it were, of its own is something found only in the scores of the supreme masters. The harmony is so fresh and beautiful; and different voices, meeting and crossing, form harmonies of which the spell is ever potent. Mr. Monteux made the most of this work of genius. He is the conductor, too, for such an extravagant and brilliant piece as the Liszt symphonic poem which brought the concert to a close.

friends of Mrs. [Worden] New York.

Mrs. Worden was presented a bouque[t]

BOSTON GLOBE—SATU[RDAY, OCTOBER 25,]

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY WELL RENDERED

Beethoven's Music Gives Soloists a Chance

Liszt's Preludes Welcomed at the Orchestral Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the season yesterday afternoon to an unusually interested and applausive audience. There was no outside soloist, but the fifth of the ballet numbers from Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus" provided a chance for several members of the orchestra named on the program to display their skill and taste in solo

OCTOBER 25, 1919

Think—— [BOSTON] AMERICAN SATURDAY,

D'INDY'S PIECE BRILLIANT SUCCESS

First American Rendition of New War Composition by Symphony Orchestra

Vincent d'Indy's new "War Symphony," inscribed "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," was performed for the first time in America on the third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. The rest of the program included the Overture and Ballet No. 5 from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner's "Seigfried" Ldyll and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Mirabile dictu! A German composition was performed without rioting or protest of any sort. Nothing could be more inoffensive than the Siegfried Idyll, or lovelier musically, or less characteristic of the spirit, "Weltmacht oder Niedergang," that in many minds today stands for the German principle in both art and life. Mr. Monteux, in choosing Wagner's immensely popular work, showed fine musicianly spirit, a spirit of tolerance, artistic breadth and vision.

If any were offended by the number, d'Indy's symphony, the important work on the program, amply atoned, both in musical quality and in patriotic significance. The work was inspired by the great war, and was performed for the first time at any concert last May in Paris. The composer, who saw active service in the Franco-Prussian war, has written into his score the passion of the patriot for France, as well as the rare qualities that mark all his work.

The symphony is in four movements. According to the program, it portrays "the calm of nature" before the great catastrophe; the drumroll that ushers in the war; contrasting themes representing the opposing sides; the conflict, and a triumphal march for finale, with the paeans and festal thunderings of Armistice Day.

It is a brilliant piece of orchestration, and was brilliantly performed. Mr. Monteux, in response to repeated applause, summoned the players to rise and accept their share of the tribute. The program was the most popular in nature, and aroused the most enthusiasm of any thus far this season.

SYMPHONY HALL EVENTS.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, will appear here twice within the next week: Tomorrow afternoon at Symphony Hall, and next Friday and Saturday, when he will be soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at its fourth pair of concerts. On that occasion he will play his latest (third) concerto, which has never been heard in Boston. Both the other works on the program will also be heard for the first time at these concerts. They are Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, "La Reine de France," and Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-bird," a ballet which has been performed here by Russian dancers. Following these concerts, the orchestra will go on its first Southern trip of the season.

The feature of the program which aroused most anticipation was O'Indy's new symphony, inspired by the war. Yesterday's performance was the first in America, and probably the first outside of Paris. Mr Monteux and the orchestra got all there is to be gotten out of the music, yet the applause at the end was polite, rather than enthusiastic.

D'Indy has one fatal defect which outweighs his many virtues as a composer; he cannot write either a good melody or a motive which lends itself spontaneously to development.

The slow movement of this symphony with a different harmonization would be insufferably cheap. The development of the first movement is labored. The mood of Nov 11, 1918, is better expressed in the closing section of Liszt's "Preludes," also on this program, than by D'Indy's finale, which is "martial and animated" because he wanted it so, not because he couldn't help yelling and throwing up his hat.

Beethoven's "Prometheus" music is taken from an early and not very successful work. It shows flashes, but only flashes of the Beethoven of the "Coriolanus" overture. Nevertheless, Mr Monteux is to be thanked for letting us hear the lesser as well as the greater Beethoven at the Symphony, where hearers sometimes tire of masterpieces by too frequent repetitions.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" was played with the delicacy and restraint the music demands, but too often fails to receive from conductors who interpret it as though Wagner were always "dramatic." This music was last played here by the Symphony at a concert before the war. Vigorous and prolonged applause which Mr Monteux was obviously happy to have to acknowledge three times before proceeding with the rest of the program, greeted it yesterday.

Liszt's "Les Preludes," the final number, is one of the best liked pieces in the repertory of the orchestra.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. At the next concerts, Rachmaninoff will play his third concerto, and the orchestra will give an unfamiliar symphony by Haydn, called "The Queen of France," and Stravinsky's suite from the music "The Firebird."

OCTOBER 25, 1919

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONI[TOR]

MUSIC

D'Indy's New Symphony in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Vincent d'Indy's third symphony, op. 70, bearing the legend "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," which had its first hearing in America at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 24, is written from the heart of the man, nobly conceived and nobly expressed. Whether it follows modern French idiom, as we have come loosely to use the designation, whether it is classical or romantic, whether it follows the traditional symphonic form—these are questions of minor importance. The one transcendant consideration is whether or not this is an honest and convincing record of emotions aroused by the war tragedy. Has the writer succeeded in making his audience feel the things he felt, see the things he saw? And unquestionably he has—for those with imagination to feel and to see.

Imagination is required to grasp this music, for here is no boom! boom! of big guns, no tramp! tramp! of marching legions. There is no scene of actual combat; here is the record of a stay-at-home, but one who suffers no less keenly because he is not in the trenches.

It must be classified as program music, though the program be not the record of a clash of arms. Rather in this wise is its story told: An idealized France, tranquilly pursuing her daily round, startled by the German invasion, derisively regarding the goose-stepping army advancing, roused to the enthusiasm of mobilization. All this in the first movement, Lent et calme; Animé. An awakened France, stirred with joy and then foreboding, crushing down her fears, but bustling with ceaseless activity. This is the second movement, Assez vite. A subdued and suffering France, soberly resigned to the work in hand, but never fearing, and, though saddened, strong in courage. This is the third movement, Lent. Then comes the outburst for the victory, grand and heroic pæans, a France rejoicing with Gargantuan joy. This is the last movement, Très animé; Majestroux.

Thus is the story told by the observer, always in regular form, with no transgressing of the laws of harmony. The melodies are never pretty, there is no attempt to make them ingratiating, but they have a pungency that satisfyingly expresses their intent. As a summing up of France at war this symphony will live, a notable document.

The overture and ballet No. 5 from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" allowed incidental solo work by the new first 'cellist, Mr. Bedetti, the flutist, Mr. Laurent, the clarinetist, Mr. Sand, and the bassoonist, Mr. Laus. Mr. Bedetti made a marked impression because of his large but pleasing tone and his perfect intonation. "A Siegfried Idyll" brought back the name Wagner to the program for the first time since the war. The music was noticeably appreciated and warmly applauded. Liszt's "Les Préludes" completed the program.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TRIP

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first trip of the season during the week of November 2, giving its regular concerts in Philadelphia, November 3; in Washington, November 4; in Baltimore, November 5; in New York, November 6; in Brooklyn, November 7; in New York, November 8. Mr. Rachmaninoff will appear as soloist in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

Traveler Oct 25

NEW SYMPHONY FAILS TO IMPRESS

Vincent d'Indy's world war symphony, given for the first time in America at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, proved disappointing. The composer has not begun to measure up to the possibilities of his subject. There are moments of real promise, but they quickly fade into mere musical tricks.

Ample amends, however, were provided for the large audience in the balance of the program, Mr. Monteux's reading of the selections from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" ballet, of Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" all but brought the audience to its feet. Rarely, indeed, has a Symphony concert aroused such enthusiasm.

ADVE[RTISER, OCTOBER 26,]

SYMPHONY GIVES IDEAL PROGRAM

Monteux Proves That He is Growing Fast in Conductorship

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
D'Indy. Sinfonia Brevis, de Bello Gallico.
Beethoven. Prometheus Ballet Overture and Adagio.
Wagner. Siegfried Idyll.
Liszt. Les Preludes.

Such a program is the reviewer's ideal. Entirely orchestral, with an important novelty and a good contrast of different schools. The absence of a soloist only gave prominence to the smyphonic character of the occasion.

How much greater is the inspiration of such a work as D'Indy's than Strauss' self-laudatory "Heldenleben." Without giving a series of war-pictures this new work portrays struggle, anxiety, sorrow and final triumph. It is shapely, too, and does not altogether depart greatly from the symphonic form of Beethoven, although the first movement has a rather free return of themes at its end, the Scherzo (which in this case is earnest) comes second instead of third, and there is some of the asceticism of D'Indy in the beginning of the finale.

WORK IS GENUINE.

But the work is genuine and sincere throughout, and it has sufficient of development to win the suffrages of the musician without repelling the laity. As is usual in modern works, the introduction furnishes some important matter for the first movement. There is some excellent horn work in the trio of the second movement, a noble climax in the slow movement, and the apotheosis of triumph in the finale, although this comes only after struggle and dissonance.

The work is an idealization of military band effects, of fife and drum, (the piccolo replacing the fife) and of stirring march rhythms. It is this, rather than a direct picture of battle. Like the Heroic Symphony it is subjective rather than objective. Even the xylophone is made an important tone-color in its score.

The Scherzo is in 5-4 rhythm, much of the time, and here and there are defiant fanfares of trumpets. It would not be D'Indy if there were not contrapuntal skill displayed somewhere, and there are some touches of canon—and some of cannon as well.

STRANGE DIALOGUE.

The finale has some remarkable touches of very high and difficult trumpet playing in an antiphonal effect against chords of the full orchestra. There is also another strange dialogue between bass drum and xylophone. All these touches were finely brought out.

The work had its finest performance in America on this occasion, and was received with well-deserved enthusiasm, Mr. Monteux being twice recalled and the orchestra obliged to rise.

Perhaps it was unfair to Beethoven's weakest overture, to the only ballet that he ever wrote, to place it after such a strong modern work as the War Symphony. It is certainly the easiest and simplest of the overtures of the great master, as befits ballet-music. It is dance-like, too, and forms a sharp contrast to such overtures as "Coriolanus" or "Egmont."

The Adagio which followed, No. 5 in the ballet, is chiefly remarkable for its use of the harp. Mr. Holy had no very thankful task here, for the composer wins no especial effect from his employment of the instrument. We must bear in mind, however, that in 1801 the concert harp (double-action pedal) had not been invented, and Beethoven's instrument was much more diatonic than ours of the present. He had never used the harp before, and he never used it again. When, in 1810, Erard brought forth the modern harp, Beethoven was too deaf to experiment with new instruments. Flute, clarinette, bassoon and violoncello also gave solo work in this rather watery number, which, because of their excellent playing aroused much applause.

EFFECTIVE READING.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," written as a Christmas and birthday present for his wife, is naturally not among his ambitious or heavily-scored works. But it presents graphic-leading motives from his trilogy and develops them as only Wagner can. And it was good to hear some of his work in the symphony programs again, although we could have wished one of his broader compositions for the "rentree." But Monteux read the number with sympathetic elasticity and the sweetness of the bird motives, the nobility of "Siegfried, Rock of the World," and the intertwining of the two figures was effective enough.

And then the concert ended with Liszt, Liszt whom we have not had upon the program for lo, these many months, and the very broadest and noblest of all his symphonic poems. It begins with a figure which Franck uses in his D-minor symphony, and

Trans. Oct. 25-29

SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

D'Indy's Work on French War Given First Time—Brilliant Performance

OLD BALLET MUSIC OF BEETHOVEN ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Short Symphony Concerning the Gallic War (first time in America); Beethoven, Overture and Ballet No. 5, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, "A Siegfried" Idyl; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes."

The title of D'Indy's symphony is in Latin. Did he consciously or unconsciously borrow "De Bello Gallico" from Julius Caesar? It matters not: the symphony, composed in 1916-18 and first performed in Paris last May, was inspired by the war; the two chief themes of the first movement are intended to typify the French and the Huns; there is the attempt to portray in music the suspense, the anguish, the heroism of the French; and at last there is the triumphal march, the apotheosis of victory, with the fanfares and the salvoes of tumultuous rejoicing. In other words, this symphony is a "piece d'occasion."

The fate of these pieces has usually been unfortunate, like that of many "prize compositions." A new work from Vincent d'Indy is awaited with more than ordinary expectation. The composer of the Symphony on a Mountain Air, of the noble Symphony in B Flat, of the georgeous "Istar" variations—not to mention other works orchestral of another nature—is never hurried, restless; an experimenter in the pursuit of his art. Yet there are emotions so deep, so mastering, that they are not to be fully expressed even in music, which has been said to be the language of the inexpressible. It would seem that in this symphony flaming patriotism has consumed purely musical thought; that the Frenchman dominates the artist. Perhaps d'Indy and his fellow-countrymen would have it so. The symphony is therefore interesting as a vivid outpouring of patriotism; as purely a work of art it cannot be ranked with the works above named.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Symphony is technically engrossing, for d'Indy is an acknowledged master. There are pages that are fully worthy of the musician that wrote the Symphony in B flat and "Istar." The introduction portraying the peace and calm of France before the ruthless invasion of Belgium is singularly beautiful. There are brilliant measures in the Scherzo. The first section of the slow movement is profoundly emotional, but what is the significance of the abrupt, perplexing, disconcerting change in mood? We say "significance," for although the score has no printed argument, there surely was a "program" in the composer's mind. The Finale, inspiriting chiefly by reason of its dynamic force, is rather commonplace with the possible exception of the pages in which, according to a Parisian critic, the theme of St. Michael is proclaimed victoriously by the little trumpet in D while massive chords punctuate after an old fashion long approved by d'Indy's predecessors.

Beethoven's little ballet overture had not been heard at a symphony concert for 10 years. The Adagio was a favorite piece in the years of Theodore Thomas's and the Harvard Musical Association's concerts, from 1869 till 1882. It is graceful, pretty music, which served yesterday to display the talent and taste of Messrs. Bedetti, Holy, Laurent, Laus and Sand in solo measures.

Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading of Liszt's familiar "Preludes," and saved it for the most part from the charge of sentimentalism and the reproach of bombast.

The great audience was most appreciative, distributing applause with impartial hands. The new symphony and Beethoven's music were especially well received.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Haydn's Symphony "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto in D minor No. 3 (first time in Boston); Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

CAVALRY DRILL

American Oct 25

On Sunday afternoon, November 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will revive a custom suspended last year by giving a popular concert outside of the regular series, the proceeds to be devoted to a pension fund for the musicians. The soloist will be Miss Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera. The orchestral numbers will include Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the ...ale and "Love-Death" from Wa... "Tristan and Isolde," and ... to "William Tell."

BOSTON POST, SAT...

...AY, OCTOBER 25,

WAR PIECE PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

D'Indy's Work Given For First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vincent d'Indy's "short symphony concerning the Gallic war" ("Sinfonia brevis de bello Gallico") was played for the first time in America at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other compositions were the overture and the fifth number from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

SECOND MOVEMENT GOOD

D'Indy's symphony, composed in 1916-18 and performed for the first time at a concert of the Societe Nationale, Paris, in May, 1919, is in memory of the German invasion of France and the final triumph of the allied arms. The composer suggests first, in a very beautiful way, the calm of the French country-side. The Hunnish forces are then caricatured. There are martial themes for the French. There are four movements. The last is theatrical and triumphal in character. The third movement, the slow movement, of a lofty nature, leads d'Indy inevitably to thoughts of his master, Franck.

For us the second movement is the most interesting and sustained in its excellence, musically speaking, of the four. Much of the rest is piece-meal, full of transparent devices for effect, overworked sequences, tricks of instrumentation—a d'Indy, in short, miles below the d'Indy of the second symphony and the "Istar" variations, which are among the wonders of the modern musical art. Music for patriotic celebration is seldom valuable as music. There was warm applause, however, for this symphony.

Five Solo Parts

The overture appears to be the best part of the Prometheus music. The slow movement gave opportunity for instrumentalists of the orchestra, playing solo parts, to show their art. At the close of the serene and melodious piece Messrs. Laurent, flute; Sand, clarinet; Laus, bassoon; Holy, harp, and Bedetti, the admirable new 'cellist, bowed in response to applause.

The "Siegfried Idyl" is a little overlong, a little discursive. But it is exquisite poetry, and notwithstanding its undue length, music written with a master hand. It excites wonder every time it is heard. The interweaving of endless melody, the manner in which each musical idea puts forth fresh branches and tendrils and leaves, as it were, of its own is something found only in the scores of the supreme masters. The harmony is so fresh and beautiful; and different voices, meeting and crossing, form harmonies of which the spell is ever potent. Mr. Monteux made the most of this work of genius. He is the conductor, too, for such an extravagant and brilliant piece as the Liszt symphonic poem which brought the concert to a close.

friends of ... New York.

Mrs. Worden was presented a bouquet ...

BOSTON GLOBE—SATU...

...RDAY, OCTOBER 25,

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY WELL RENDERED

Beethoven's Music Gives Soloists a Chance

Liszt's Preludes Welcomed at the Orchestral Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the season yesterday afternoon to an unusually interested and applausive audience. There was no outside soloist, but the fifth of the ballet numbers from Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus" provided a chance for several members of the orchestra named on the program to display their skill and taste in solo...

OCTOBER 25, 1919

...N AMERICAN

Think—— SATURDAY, ...

D'INDY'S PIECE BRILLIANT SUCCESS

First American Rendition of New War Composition by Symphony Orchestra

Vincent d'Indy's new "War Symphony," inscribed "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," was performed for the first time in America on the third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. The rest of the program included the Overture and Ballet No. 5 from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner's "Seigfried" Idyll and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Mirabile dictu! A German composition was performed without rioting or protest of any sort. Nothing could be more inoffensive than the Siegfried Idyll, or lovelier musically, or less characteristic of the spirit, "Weltmacht oder Niedergang," that in many minds today stands for the German principle in both art and life. Mr. Monteux, in choosing Wagner's immensely popular work, showed fine musicianly spirit, a spirit of tolerance, artistic breadth and vision.

If any were offended by the number, d'Indy's symphony, the important work on the program, amply atoned, both in musical quality and in patriotic significance. The work was inspired by the great war, and was performed for the first time at any concert last May in Paris. The composer, who saw active service in the Franco-Prussian war, has written into his score the passion of the patriot for France, as well as the rare qualities that mark all his work.

The symphony is in four movements. According to the program, it portrays "the calm of nature" before the great catastrophe; the drumroll that ushers in the war; contrasting themes representing the opposing sides; the conflict, and a triumphal march for finale, with the paeans and festal thunderings of Armistice Day.

It is a brilliant piece of orchestration, and was brilliantly performed. Mr. Monteux, in response to repeated applause, summoned the players to rise and accept their share of the tribute. The program was the most popular in nature, and aroused the most enthusiasm of any thus far this season.

SYMPHONY HALL EVENTS.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, will appear here twice within the next week: Tomorrow afternoon at Symphony Hall, and next Friday and Saturday, when he will be soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at its fourth pair of concerts. On that occasion he will play his latest (third) concerto, which has never been heard in Boston. Both the other works on the program will also be heard for the first time at these concerts. They are Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, "La Reine de France," and Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-bird," a ballet which has been performed here by Russian dancers. Following these concerts, the orchestra will go on its first Southern trip of the season.

The feature of the program which aroused most anticipation was O'Indy's new symphony, inspired by the war. Yesterday's performance was the first in America, and probably the first outside of Paris. Mr Monteux and the orchestra got all there is to be gotten out of the music, yet the applause at the end was polite, rather than enthusiastic.

D'Indy has one fatal defect which outweighs his many virtues as a composer; he cannot write either a good melody or a motive which lends itself spontaneously to development.

The slow movement of this symphony with a different harmonization would be insufferably cheap. The development of the first movement is labored. The mood of Nov 11, 1918, is better expressed in the closing section of Liszt's "Preludes," also on this program, than by D'Indy's finale, which is "martial and animated" because he wanted it so, not because he couldn't help yelling and throwing up his hat.

Beethoven's "Prometheus" music is taken from an early and not very successful work. It shows flashes, but only flashes of the Beethoven of the "Coriolanus" overture. Nevertheless, Mr Monteux is to be thanked for letting us hear the lesser as well as the greater Beethoven at the Symphony, where hearers sometimes tire of masterpieces by too frequent repetitions.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" was played with the delicacy and restraint the music demands, but too often fails to receive from conductors who interpret it as though Wagner were always "dramatic." This music was last played here by the Symphony at a concert before the war. Vigorous and prolonged applause which Mr Monteux was obviously happy to have to acknowledge three times before proceeding with the rest of the program, greeted it yesterday.

Liszt's "Les Preludes," the final number, is one of the best liked pieces in the repertory of the orchestra.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. At the next concerts, Rachmaninoff will play his third concerto, and the orchestra will give an unfamiliar symphony by Haydn, called "The Queen of France," and Stravinsky's suite from the music "The Firebird."

OCTOBER 25, 1919

...ISTIAN SCIENCE MONI...

MUSIC

D'Indy's New Symphony in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Vincent d'Indy's third symphony, op. 70, bearing the legend "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," which had its first hearing in America at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 24, is written from the heart of the man, nobly conceived and nobly expressed. Whether it follows modern French idiom, as we have come loosely to use the designation, whether it is classical or romantic, whether it follows the traditional symphonic form—these are questions of minor importance. The one transcendant consideration is whether or not this is an honest and convincing record of emotions aroused by the war tragedy. Has the writer succeeded in making his audience feel the things he felt, see the things he saw? And unquestionably he has—for those with imagination to feel and to see.

Imagination is required to grasp this music, for here is no boom! boom! of big guns, no tramp! tramp! of marching legions. There is no scene of actual combat; here is the record of a stay-at-home, but one who suffers no less keenly because he is not in the trenches.

It must be classified as program music, though the program be not the record of a clash of arms. Rather in this wise is its story told: An idealized France, tranquilly pursuing her daily round, startled by the German invasion, derisively regarding the goose-stepping army advancing, roused to the enthusiasm of mobilization. All this in the first movement, Lent et calme; Animé. An awakened France, stirred with joy and then foreboding, crushing down her fears, but bustling with ceaseless activity. This is the second movement, Assez vite. A subdued and suffering France, soberly resigned to the work in hand, but never-fearing, and, though saddened, strong in courage. This is the third movement, Lent. Then comes the outburst for the victory, grand and heroic pæans, a France rejoicing with Gargantuan joy. This is the last movement, Très animé; Majestroux.

Thus is the story told by the observer, always in regular form, with no transgressing of the laws of harmony. The melodies are never pretty, there is no attempt to make them ingratiating, but they have a pungency that satisfyingly expresses their intent. As a summing up of France at war this symphony will live, a notable document.

The overture and ballet No. 5 from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" allowed incidental solo work by the new first 'cellist, Mr. Bedetti, the flutist, Mr. Laurent, the clarinetist, Mr. Sand, and the bassoonist, Mr. Laus. Mr. Bedetti made a marked impression because of his large but pleasing tone and his perfect intonation. "A Siegfried Idyll" brought back the name Wagner to the program for the first time since the war. The music was noticeably appreciated and warmly applauded. Liszt's "Les Préludes" completed the program.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TRIP

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first trip of the season during the week of November 2, giving its regular concerts in Philadelphia, November 3; in Washington, November 4; in Baltimore, November 5; in New York, November 6; in Brooklyn, November 7; in New York, November 8. Mr. Rachmaninoff will appear as soloist in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

Traveler Oct 25

NEW SYMPHONY FAILS TO IMPRESS

Vincent d'Indy's world war symphony, given for the first time in America at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, proved disappointing. The composer has not begun to measure up to the possibilities of his subject. There are moments of real promise, but they quickly fade into mere musical tricks.

Ample amends, however, were provided for the large audience in the balance of the program. Mr. Monteux's reading of the selections from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" ballet, of Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" all but brought the audience to its feet. Rarely, indeed, has a Symphony concert aroused such enthusiasm.

ADVER...

...TISER, OCTOBER 26,

SYMPHONY GIVES IDEAL PROGRAM

Monteux Proves That He is Growing Fast in Conductorship

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
D'Indy. Sinfonia Brevis, de Bello Gallico.
Beethoven. Prometheus Ballet Overture and Adagio.
Wagner. Siegfried Idyll.
Liszt. Les Preludes.

Such a program is the reviewer's ideal. Entirely orchestral, with an important novelty and a good contrast of different schools. The absence of a soloist only gave prominence to the smyphonic character of the occasion.

How much greater is the inspiration of such a work as D'Indy's than Strauss' self-laudatory "Heldenleben." Without giving a series of war-pictures this new work portrays struggle, anxiety, sorrow and final triumph. It is shapely, too, and does not altogether depart greatly from the symphonic form of Beethoven, although the first movement has a rather free return of themes at its end, the Scherzo (which in this case is earnest) comes second instead of third, and there is some of the asceticism of D'Indy in the beginning of the finale.

WORK IS GENUINE.

But the work is genuine and sincere throughout, and it has sufficient of development to win the suffrages of the musician without repelling the laity. As is usual in modern works, the introduction furnishes some important matter for the first movement. There is some excellent horn work in the trio of the second movement, a noble climax in the slow movement, and the apotheosis of triumph in the finale, although this comes only after struggle and dissonance.

The work is an idealization of military band effects, of fife and drum, (the piccolo replacing the fife) and of stirring march rhythms. It is this, rather than a direct picture of battle. Like the Heroic Symphony it is subjective rather than objective. Even the xylophone is made an important tone-color in its score.

The Scherzo is in 5-4 rhythm, much of the time, and here and there are defiant fanfares of trumpets. It would not be D'Indy if there were not contrapuntal skill displayed somewhere, and there are some touches of canon—and some of cannon as well.

STRANGE DIALOGUE.

The finale has some remarkable touches of very high and difficult trumpet playing in an antiphonal effect against chords of the full orchestra. There is also another strange dialogue between bass drum and xylophone. All these touches were finely brought out.

The work had its finest performance in America on this occasion, and was received with well-deserved enthusiasm, Mr. Monteux being twice recalled and the orchestra obliged to rise.

Perhaps it was unfair to Beethoven's weakest overture, to the only ballet that he ever wrote, to place it after such a strong modern work as the War Symphony. It is certainly the easiest and simplest of the overtures of the great master, as befits ballet-music. It is dance-like, too, and forms a sharp contrast to such overtures as "Coriolanus" or "Egmont."

The Adagio which followed, No. 5 in the ballet, is chiefly remarkable for its use of the harp. Mr. Holy had no very thankful task here, for the composer wins no especial effect from his employment of the instrument. We must bear in mind, however, that in 1801 the concert harp (double-action pedal) had not been invented, and Beethoven's instrument was much more diatonic than ours of the present. He had never used the harp before, and he never used it again. When, in 1810, Erard brought forth the modern harp, Beethoven was too deaf to experiment with new instruments. Flute, clarinette, bassoon and violoncello also gave solo work in this rather watery number, which, because of their excellent playing aroused much applause.

EFFECTIVE READING.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," written as a Christmas and birthday present for his wife, is naturally not among his ambitious or heavily-scored works. But it presents graphic-leading motives from his trilogy and develops them as only Wagner can. And it was good to hear some of his work in the symphony programs again, although we could have wished one of his broader compositions for the "rentree." But Monteux read the number with sympathetic elasticity and the sweetness of the bird motives, the nobility of "Siegfried, Rock of the World," and the intertwining of the two figures was effective enough.

And then the concert ended with Liszt, Liszt whom we have not had upon the program for lo, these many months, and the very broadest and noblest of all his symphonic poems. It begins with a figure which Franck uses in his D-minor symphony, and

CTOBER 26,

ONY GIVES PROGRAM

Proves That He ving Fast in uctorship

IS C. ELSON.

rogram.
revis, de Bello Gallico.
theus Ballet Overture and Idyll.
n.

ram is the reviewer's orchestral, with an elty and a good con-nt schools. The ab-ist only gave promin-myphonic character of greater is the inspira-work as D'Indy's than laudatory "Heldenlegiving a series of is new work portrays ety, 'sorrow and final shapely, too, and does depart greatly from form of Beethoven, alrst movement has a urn' of themes at its o (which in this case nes second instead of re is some of the as-Indy in the beginning

NUINE.

k is genuine and sint, and it has sufficient to win the suffrages without repelling the sual in modern works.
n furnishes some ime for the first moves some excellent horn
o of the second move-climax in the slow
the apotheosis of tri-finale, although this ter struggle and disan idealization of mili-

ects, of fife and drum, placing the fife) and of rhythms. It is this, direct picture of battle.
ic Symphony it is sub-than objective. Even is made an important its score.
is in 5-4 rhythm, much nd here and there are res of trumpets. It
'Indy if there were not skill displayed some-ere are some touches
some of cannon as

ALOGUE.

has some remarkable ery high and difficult ng in an antiphonal ef-chords of the full or-is also another strange een bass drum and xylhese touches were finely ad its finest perform-ca on this occasion, and with well-deserved en-Monteux being twice he orchestra obliged to was unfair to Beetho-overture, to the only ever wrote, to place it trong modern work as phony. It is certainly d simplest of the over-great master, as befits

It is dance-like, too, sharp contrast to such
"Coriolanus" or "Eg-which followed. No. 5 is chiefly remarkable he harp. Mr. Holy had ful task here, for the no especial effect from t of the instrument.

n mind, however, that oncert harp (double-ad not been invented, instrument was much than ours of the pres-ever used the harp be-never used it again.
Erard brought forth rp, Beethoven was too
nent with new instruclarinette, bassoon and gave solo work in tery number, which,
eir excellent playing applause.

READING.

egfried Idyll," written and birthday present s naturally not among r heavily-scored works.
s graphic-leading mo-trilogy and develops Wagner can. And it ear some of his work
y programs again, ald have wished one of positions for the "ren-teux read the number tic elasticity and the he bird motives, the egfried, Rock of the he intertwining of the effective enough."
e concert ended with om we have not had m for lo, these many very broadest and is symphonic poems.
figure which Franck
inor symphony, and

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25,

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW SPIRIT BRINGS BACK OLD QUALITY

Mr. Monteux Restoring Interest, Standards, Prestige—His Abilities as Programme-Maker—A Happy Revival from Beethoven—Wagner Returns, and Liszt Profits Not by His Company—D'Indy's Music of the War Falls Far Below Expectation

THE range and the method of Mr. Monteux's programmes are restoring the standards and renewing the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts. He follows no formulas like the dear departed Rabaud with his German symphony as preface to a French or a Franco-Russian miscellany. He falls into no haphazard choices no convenient repetition of "stock-pieces," as Dr. Muck tended to do in his final years in Boston. If Mr. Monteux will include a piece by Beethoven in his miscellaneous numbers, he does not repeat the overture to "Egmont" or the overture, "Coriolanus," for the twentieth or the thirtieth time, but revives the overture to the ballet of Prometheus as he did yesterday, or resurrects, as he soon will do, the overture to "King Stephen." Thereby he freshens his programme and freshens, no less, the interest of his hearers in Beethoven. Similarly, to Mr. Monteux Enesco does not imply repetition after repetition of a "Roumanian Rhapsody" or Haydn the semi-ready and too-familiar symphony that happens to lie at the top of the pile in the orchestra's library. A week ago the conductor restored Enesco's suite to the active repertory, a week hence he will return to a symphony by Haydn hitherto overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. No easy-going man, comfortable in routine is the new conductor.

At Mr. Monteux's will novel pieces are regaining old place upon the programmes. In the first pair of concerts he included Albeniz's fragment, "Catalonia." Yesterday, d'Indy's "Short Symphony About the War of the French" was heard for the first time in America. The concerts of next Friday and Saturday will bring a new concerto for piano by Rakhmaninov and the suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," music of sensuous beauty and pictorial imagery. To cite these items is to indicate the range of the new conductor's reading, interest, knowledge, to suggest his catholicity of mind and taste. In particular these qualities and inclinations stood clear when side by side on the programme of Friday afternoon, he set the new symphony by d'Indy and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," the first music of the German composer to be heard at the Symphony Concerts in two seasons. On many an occasion in recent years d'Indy has been more virulent than just in his opinion of German music. Wagner in his day spoke and printed much folly about the French. Both Wagner and d'Indy, however, have written music deserving recurring place in the Symphony Concerts. Back accordingly they both come—and ironically in one and the same programme—after more or less superfluous "banning," and to the obvious pleasure of the listening and applauding audience. Now to do these things as Mr. Monteux is doing them, is not only to prove the mettle of the new conductor but to restore the quality and the prestige of the concerts themselves.

Similarly with Mr. Monteux's work upon and with the orchestra. He has not yet made it the sensitive and plastic instrument at every turn with any and all music that it should ideally be, that in its best years of a recent past it has actually been. Of course Mr. Monteux is ambitious of such perfection, but as obviously he has not yet had the time in which to achieve it. In a month of rehearsals and concerts he cannot feel his instrument, or it feel him, as both will come to do in longer association. Once and again, too, as in Beethoven's second symphony at the first pair of concerts and in other music, the conductor has inclined over much to large, square-cut, firmly moving body of tone. On the other hand, after his version of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a fortnight ago and of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," there is no doubting his mind and his ear for pliancy of pattern and tone, for apt transitions and adroit euphonies, for artful and imaginative shadings of progress and color. A little lighter hand, a little more plasticity with Wagner's endlessly blossoming music and the playing of the "Siegfried Idyl" yesterday would have been as finely touched as that of Debussy's prelude. In Enesco's suite, in Albeniz's music, in Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," in d'Indy's symphony, Mr. Monteux has abundantly proved his lively ear and quick hand for rhythm. Out of many another piece stands his regard for the largely moulded phrase. He is dramatizing conductor, as in Franck's tone-poem of "The Wild Huntsman"; he is conductor who feels and releases the romantic rhetoric of music, as yesterday in Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes"; he is conductor, as in Schumann's symphony of the spring, who deepens the beauty and swells the ardors of instrumental song. Not yet has he missed the intrinsic quality of any piece upon his programmes or failed to find the revealing and the characterizing pace.

Solicitous over his music, Mr. Monteux is not less solicitous over the voices of the orchestra. He is at endless pains with them until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in recent years. In the slow movement from "Prometheus," yesterday, Mr. Bedetti at the violoncello, Mr. Laurent at the flute, Mr. Sand at the clarinet, Mr. Laus at the bassoon, Mr. Holy at the harp, so disclosed new virtue or affirmed old, with Mr. Wendler, wherever he might, in company with them at the first horn. The wood-wind choir of the orchestra is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony Concerts, after a year of partial eclipse, are bright again with interest and pleasure for audiences. With return to old standards comes back old prestige.

The "standard repertory," as it now is, provided two of the pieces upon the programme of yesterday—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes"; while the "standard repertory," as it used to be, afforded the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus" and a slow movement from the succeeding dances. It was a happy notion of Mr. Monteux to restore to the concerts this music of Beethoven, light-minded, light-handed, fanciful, graceful. The snapping chords, the running figures, the playful turns, the flowing animation of the overture sound as fresh today in a hall in Boston as they did in a theatre of Vienna a hundred odd years ago and are now, probably, far more brightly played. As programmes usually run, this Beethoven of dexterity and charm we of 1918 may know only from the concerto for violin. Here in these fragments of "Prometheus" is music of equal delight to the sensuous and the fanciful ear. The overture is winged with light and fertile ardor; the slow movement spins itself from solo instrument to solo instrument in long unfolding line, inviting the grace of pose the melancholy langour of motion that, presumably, the dancers brought to it which Beethoven used in one of his sonatas, but which belongs to Wagner because he so gloriously employed it as the "Fate-Figure" in the Trilogy.

PROGRAM EXCELLENT.

But how grandly the themes follow after this! The theme of man in his strength, the love theme, the storm and stress figures buffeting the three-noted figure (C, B, E,) above mentioned, the pastoral effects gradually merging into the call to battle, the finale with man revealed in power and majesty, all these made the last number the chief number of the whole concert, even dwarfing D'Indy's excellent symphony.

If Beethoven and Wagner were represented by comparatively weak works, Liszt was present with the strongest of all his compositions, for we rank this as more evenly great than his "Faust Symphony."

M. Monteux certainly never had a better opportunity to show the stuff that is in him in such a program as this and he made full use of his opportunities. One might have demanded a little more of majesty in certain parts of "Les Preludes" and less of emphasized contrast, but he proved that he is growing fast in conductorship; his programs are excellent and his readings of high merit.

Musical and pictorial imagination flow through it and for once Beethoven stay within the prescribed, the accepted frame

A well-tempered audience, as Bac labelled his clavichord, happily took th "Siegfried Idyl" as a matter of course If any were displeased at the return o Wagner to "these concerts," they politel hid their chagrins. If any were over joyed, they did not swell the applause fo music and performance beyond desert even if the upper balcony renewed it when it was about to subside. Wagner, like any other eminent composer of symphoni music has just place in the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra. Wagner's music to many ears yields large and keen pleasure. The war was the war and the necessary or assumed inhibitions are past. The pleasures of the present, new or renewed,

Traveler Oct 25

RACHMANINOFF WITH SYMPHONY

The second soloist of the season, Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian pianist, will be heard at next week's Symphony concerts, the last pair before the orchestra goes on its southern trip. He will play his "Third" concerto, marking its first presentation in this city. Haydn's "Queen of France" symphony and Stravinsky's "Bird of Fire" ballet round out the program.

The first pension fund concert comes Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28.

Globe Theatre

fried Idyl" is almost as strange to the concert-hall as the Beethoven of "Prometheus"—a Wagner of musing mood, gentle impulse, intimate affection, finding voice in the speech and the imagery of tones. Not a little of his music is a lush garden; as much of it may be likened to a vast and sombre forest. Here in the "Siegfried Idyl" is his bed of little flowers of tonal fancy, blossoming in fresh measure upon fresh measure in quickening warmth of invention and ingenuity. Or to shift the figure, elsewhere Wagner wrote his epics and legends. Here is his lyric verse. Once more, the range, the readiness of the man. The Liszt of "Preludes" fares none too well in such company. He is manifestly "addressing" his audience and rhetorical is his tonal speech. His romantic moods of "love in enchanted daybreak," or "on nature's bosom," or "'mid the trumpets loud clangor" are so obviously "effective" in the contrasting progress of the music from naked simplicities to furbelowed pomps. Yet to this day, the "effects" stir the average hearer and Liszt lasts.

Doubtless many an instructed hearer expected too much of d'Indy's symphony of the war, since memory summoned the composer's "Istar," his "Summer Day in the Mountain," his two earlier symphonies—all signal and enduring music in kind and quality—to whet anticipation of great things. When the piece was done, doubtless as many hearers sought to find excuse for their disappointment. D'Indy is in the sixty-eight year of a life in which he has spared neither mind nor body nor spirit. Perhaps, at last, sterility and routine, the unconscious acceptance of the easiest way, are creeping into his music. Quite as probably, the images, the emotions that the war stirred in him, as he reacted to it, as he watched the reactions of his countrymen, evaded, balked him when he would transmute them into tones.

Many measures designed to be eloquent, born of deep mood and memory, come to little once they are set upon music-paper and heard from the orchestra. The martial tumult of the end of the first movement sounds theatrical to a fault; the listener hears and sees, not the French armies departing to battle, but the military bustle of the stage. Hostile and cynical reviewers in Paris have consigned the final apotheosis, when Victory—in a high trumpet—flies over the surging troops of France, to some spectacle of the screen. The glow of harmonic and instrumental color upon the third movement glamors music that intrinsically falls short of the implied mood of lofty devotion, faith, resolution; while a singular intermezzo in another vein bafflingly interrupts it. Time and again in the progress of the symphony, the invention and the imagination of d'Indy as technician, rather than musical or emotional vitality, sustain the interest of the hearer. Page after page, zelously as Mr. Monteaux and the orchestra plied their pains, suggests music missing its goal, a design fallen far short of accomplishment, a symphony manqué—and the usual recourse to routine and artifice. To more than one ear, only out of the beginning—picturing the calm and peace of France when war breaks upon it—speaks the expected d'Indy of exalted imagination and utterance; while once and again in the scherzo returns the d'Indy of fine ardors. Far too much of the rest is relative silence. But these are the impressions of a single hearing. A second may correct or dispel.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux Makes a Programme of Novel Pieces from Haydn to Stravinsky—Rakhmaninov as Pianist with and Without Orchestra—Toscha Seidel Returns—Other Recitals

NO one may reproach Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as a succession of familiar pieces. It begins with a symphony by Haydn that, so far as obtainable records go, has not hitherto been played in Boston—unless by some strolling or resident band of musicians a century ago. It is one of the series written by Haydn in 1784, 1785 and 1786 for the Concerts Spirituels in Paris; it bears title "The Queen of France" as compliment to Marie Antoinette, the wife of Louis XVI; it is in the key of B-flat; it is numbered 85 in the "collected works" of Haydn; and those who have read or heard it speak warmly of it. Next follows Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto in D minor for piano with orchestra—music as yet unheard in Boston, in which the composer will play the solo part. It is written in his usual manner with such pieces — gravely in musical thought and progress, ornately and exactingly in decorative measures. Akin is the fashion in which he plays. Then ensues a suite from Stravinsky's celebrated ballet of "The Fire-Bird," seen and heard in the theatre when the Russian Ballet visited Boston a few years ago. The music was then remarkable for sensuous beauty to the ear and for manifold play of poetizing and pictorial imagination; while in the concert-room these qualities should stand yet clearer. As arranged by the composer himself, with a single addition from Mr. Monteux, the suite virtually traverses the whole of this ballet of Russian legend—from the coming of Fire-Bird and prince to the magic castle through the sports and pastimes of the captive princesses, to the enchantment and the routing of the sorcerer's horde. Hitherto known to the Symphony Concerts by no more than the early and insignificant piece, "Fireworks," Stravinsky now ascends to just place in them.

Transcript Mon. Oct. 27

WEEK-END MUSIC

D'INDY, COMPOSER; RAKHMANINOV, PIANIST

Again the Frenchman's War-Time Symphony in Renewed Impression of Failure—The Russian, His Audience, His Hold Upon It and the Unique Fashion of His Playing—Mr. Fanning's Recital

ONLY in the disclosing and the clarifying of details in workmanship did a second hearing, on Saturday evening, of Mr. d'Indy's war-time symphony better the impression of the first. Among certain musicians hereabouts there is almost a d'Indy cult, yet even his most loyal devotees, disappointed as they admit themselves to be in the quality of the piece, do not reproach the performance. Few have perused the score; only in Paris and at a single concert, has the symphony previously been played; comparisons are obviously impossible, but to practised and exacting hearers Mr. Monteux and his orchestra seemed nowhere to cloud the music. Rather, they illuminated and enforced it. To their intelligence and pains, the listening ear and mind owed the discovery of many a detail of modulation, transition, inflection, timbres and harmony in which Mr. d'Indy is hardly less imaginative and expert than in his prime of "A Summer Day in the Mountain" and the second symphony. As soon as the score, for orchestra or for piano, is generally accessible, students of composition will con this "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico" with recurring interest and profit: while, so far as craftsmanship went, the connoisseur of contemporary symphonic music was rewarded hardly less often as he listened on Friday and Saturday. Scarcely a composer of our time possesses Mr. d'Indy's readiness and resource with the formal structure of a symphony, sustaining it from first measure to last yet bending and binding it to whatever emotion, pictorial suggestion or illusion he would compass. Not many more enjoy his range of invention and imagination in significant and individual harmonic and instrumental color. True, it has narrowed in this war-time symphony—or the composer has of purpose restrained it—but enough remains, as a youthful neighbor said, to "intrigue" the ear.

These, however, are the curiosities and the pleasures of the sophisticated with Mr. d'Indy's newest music. The audiences sitting before it on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, tried it rather by the instant satisfactions that it yielded, the emotion it evoked, the illusions it worked. In these respects the war-time symphony fell far short both of kindled expectation and measured achievement. Where was the d'Indy who these many years has hated the commonplace with a righteous hatred, when in the finale he sets his brass choir scaling tonal heavens while the rest of the orchestra moves repetitiously in massed chords? In an obscure Hebrew manuscript, it is recorded that the orchestra of Noah's ark so celebrated the approach to land, but that only Japhet in the audience applauded. Pompous and ponderous musical sound is this background to the shrieking trumpets, but the note of victorious elation rings not out of it into the mind and heart of many a hearer. Where again was the d'Indy who has been invincible foe to mediocrity and routine when he set to music-paper the military march, the martial tumults, of the first movement? The disillusioned eye saw not the armies of France "pricking to the field," but the "supers" of an opera house vigorously on their job. Mr. d'Indy might have remembered the march, "Sambre et Meuse," not to be heard without emotion when French soldiery move to it. His own sags far behind. Or, perchance, his ear, awakened in some wan and wintry dawn, might have recalled French troops, padding along asphalts to the faint, distant semi-glorified hum of "Madelon." True "Madelon" was a common, even a vulgar song, and by temperament and habit Mr. d'Indy is intellectual, visionary. Yet, for some ears, such an homely touch reflects more of the sight, sound, spirit, of the "Gallic War" than the commonplaces of military music at both beginning and end of the symphony. Not across the operatic stage went the soldiers of France to their fighting.

Where the music warms into emotion and illusion, as in the introduction picturing the peace of France before the war bursts, as in the scherzo with note of resolute élan and gayety, as in the exaltation of devoted and entreating hearts in the third movement, there are reiterated sequences, calculated measures of scholarship, filling time and space, Brahms-like, until the composer's imagination shall spark again. Even so, the beginning yields a grave and d'Indyan beauty of mood, picture, voice. The scherzo, interesting, artful as so much music qua music, sounds with the fine ardors of warlike France; while the slow movement holds for a while to Mr. d'Indy nobler voice and austerer handiwork. Then comes the baffling intermezzo, altogether fantastic, as it seemed at both first and second hearing, in ryhthm, color, mood; and last a clear decline from the earlier exaltation into an easier level of sentiment more to be expected from German or American pen. No doubt Mr. d'Indy would inform the symphony with his own mental and spiritual reactions to the progress of the war; but he would also, as it seems, infuse into it the common emotions, as he shared them, of his countrymen. Now, the individualistic, the semi-solitary d'Indy is not fortunate—in more senses than one—with the multitude.

For that reason, possibly, the "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico" is the failure in kind that on Friday and Saturday, it seemed beyond peradventure to be. True, Mr. d'Indy is nearing his seventieth year, but there is less hint in the music of powers waning in themselves than of powers reluctant to an alien task. The d'Indy of his most characteristic and significant music in concert-hall or theatre —of "A Summer Day in the Mountain," of the second symphony, of the opera "The Stranger"—is introspective, lofty, remote, austère. If ever there was music of an individual, a self-absorbed, even a too self-conscious mind and heart, it is these pieces of his prime. Mr d'Indy was of those in whom the war kindled exaltation. Resolution, devotion, every emotion and sensation beat high, beat often nobly. Expressing his war-time self—and nothing else—in a symphony, he might have written worthily, even if he did not gain his farthest heights. He is well upon them in the introduction, the scherzo, the beginning of the slow movement of the present music. It is when he forsakes himself for the multitudinous mood, the general and common vision, as in the first and the last divisions, that he succumbs to the banalities of military march and "apotheosis." The common lot and temper, sensation and speech are not for him.

For orchestra and conductor the glory of the concert on Saturday was their playing of Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes." Not for nothing has Mr. Monteux been conductor of the opera house when he sets to this romantical, rhetorical, showy and "effective" music; while his intent and spirit fired his forces to a man. The preluding sounded as portentous as Liszt would have it. The slow song, Italianate, operatic, almost erotic, was phrased as though by a single voice, moved as though Pavlova were posturing to it—and once upon a time she did; was drenched in sensuous richness of color. The succeeding pastoral tune etched itself upon the ear. The finale piled clangor upon clangor inexhaustibly. The hackneyed music renewed its imagery and eloquence. Ear and emotion heard, felt, believed again. The romantic torrent, the rhetorical flood of the Lisztian day and temperament drowned dross away. Rarely did Liszt write for the theatre; yet of the theatre is nearly all his symphonic music, whether he labelled it "Dante," "Faust" "Saint Elizabeth," named it tone-poem, orio or even mass. For many a year man of the theatre also, Mr. Monteux can play this Liszt, with orchestra and audience both stirred—even after a Muck has played him.

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESD

n, OCTOBER 29, 1919

Mme. Frijsh, admired and advancing singer, will be heard for the first times in Boston with orchestra when next month she "assists" at a pair of Symphony Concerts. Another interesting singer in near prospect is Miss Janacopulos, announced, for the first time hereabouts, at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Nov. 13. She does not lack voice or ear, but like Mme. Frijsh, she excels in the imagery, color and "personal note" that she imparts to the chosen music.

Miss Janacopulos is also to be heard at one of Mrs. McAllister's morning concerts impending at the Copley-Plaza. While these entertainments will bring back one or another familiar and mature singer or virtuoso, like Mme d'Alvarez, sometime full-voiced and full-bodied alto of the Boston Opera House, they will also assemble not a few interesting youngsters—Mr. Ornstein as pianist and composer for example, and Miss Thelma Given the newest violinist of Auer's schooling. It is these relatively new talents that Bostonians at home may seldom hear. They are not certain, it seems to line managerial pockets like the tedious Galli-Curci or some cantor squeaking in falsetto. The more the courage and the credit of Mrs. McAllister in venturing them.

The Symphony Orchestra as restored to discipline, ambition and vitality by Mr. Monteux, will play for the first times in New York on Thursday evening, Nov. 6 and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 8. On the earlier programme the conductor has set Schumann's Spring Symphony; the overture and adagio from Beethoven's ballet of Prometheus; Debussy's prelude to Mallarmé's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Enesco's vivid and various suite—all pieces recently heard in Boston in which orchestra and leader shine. The second programme for New York picks Haydn's symphony, "The Queen of France," and the suite out of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," from the concerts of this week and adds to them Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman" and Beethoven's overture to the play, "King Stephen." Evidently not quite all the subscribers to these concerts in New York have retaken their places, for the newspapers there contain the advertisement of "a few tickets" on sale "for each series." Mr. Monteux, and the present orchestra, if they do as well in New York as they have in Boston, should restore the prestige of these visits until Carnegie Hall overflows again.

W. J. Wade

...SUNDAY JOURNAL
OCTOBER 26, 1919.

Boston Symphony Soloists.

Of especial interest is the announcement of the soloists for the five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the dates for which have already been given in this column. At the opening concert on Nov. 18 Emilio de Gorgoza, the popular Spanish-American baritone, will appear. Although he is an American by birth and affiliation his Spanish ancestry has given him a temperament which manifests itself in his work. His appearance with the orchestra will be his first in this city. The other artists announced are Sophie Breslau, contralto, on Dec. 16; Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, Jan. 27; Jean Bedetti, cellist, March 9, and Albert Spalding, violinist, on April 6. The subscription sale of seats will open tomorrow at Seddon's newsstand in the Butler Exchange building.

* * *

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5 (for which seats will be placed on sale tomorrow at Albaugh's ticket agency), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, have between them arranged a program of striking interest and variety. Rachmaninoff's newest Concerto, the Third, is considered even finer than the Second, which he played with the orchestra here last year. "This concerto," wrote Mr. Huneker in the New York Times, "conceived in no academic mood by the giant of the Russians, was thrilling as no other of its kind since the early triumphs of Tschaikovsky. Its soaring theme of agonized yearning, its second part of oddly held rhythms like interrupted heart-beats, its scherzando finale with mocking recessional of muffled drums, set nerves a-tingle and bowed some heads that of late refused to nod with the neo-Scythians. The conductor led alertly from behind the piano as if giving reins to a runaway, and the packed audience's roar of ovation drowned the applauding hundred players of his band. The event was unprecedented, if not unforeseen. A record crowd all afternoon vainly besieged the outer doors."

Mr. Monteux will begin the program in the spirit of the eighteenth century with Haydn's historic symphony in B flat, inscribed to "The Queen Of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. He will end the concert, however, in the twentieth century, by playing Stravinsky's dance legend, "The Bird Of Fire."

BALTIMORE NEWS
Saturday, Oct. 25, 1919

RACHMANINOFF TO PLAY

Famous Russian Pianist Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master Russian pianist, will be soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 5, for which the sale of tickets will begin next Monday at Albaugh's ticket agency.

Rachmaninoff will play the piano part in his newest Third Concerto, which is considered even more striking in somber theme and wild rhythm than the Second, which he played last year.

The purely symphonic numbers will comprise Haydyn's symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette, and a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his

...pm OCT 25 1919
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

...Rachmaninoff, is the soloist at the ... concert of the Boston Symphony Or... at the Academy of Music on Monday ... November 3, and will play Liszt's ... E flat. Mr. Monteux will open ... with Schumann's Symphony in ... be Stravinsky's "... of Fire," of which ... a symphonic suite

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 26, 1919

SOME NEWS OF THE MUSICAL SEASON

Programmes of the Philadelphia, New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras; Frieda Hempel in Recital etc.,

First Boston Symphony Programme

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3 (for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow at Heppe's), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a programme of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, proverbially a matchless performer of Liszt's music, has chosen that composer's famous and scintillating First Concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the overture, and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments—'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Ertvinsky's dance legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet.

Mme. Olga Samaroff will make her

THE BALTIMORE NEWS
Wednesday, Oct. 22, 1919

TO BE SEEN HERE WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux is director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its local season of five concerts at the Lyric the night of November 5, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist-composer, as the soloist.

, OCTOBER 26,

RECORD, SUNDAY

Rachmaninoff With Boston Orpel's Early Visit.

pel's Visit.

—The program ...
—For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 3, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a program of marked diversity. The Russian pianist will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." The conductor will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two portions of his only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the Overture and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments—'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Stravinsky's Dance Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which Monteux was the interpreter when he conducted the Russian Ballet, will conclude the concert.

* * *

m EAGLE
ress Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 26 1919

THE ORCHESTRAS

The programs for the Boston Symphony's first concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday ...

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 25 1919

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the new permanent conductor of the organization. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian pianist, will be the soloist. Liszt's First Concerto, in E flat ... day will be Schubert's, in B ... ing" and the novelty of ...

om TRIBUNE
ddress New York City
ate 26 1919

A feature of the first matinee to be given at Carnegie Hall on November 8 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ss: New York City
OCT 26 1919

Opening Boston Symphony.

For the first Boston Symphony concert of the pending season in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has made the following program: Schumann's "Spring" Symphony in B flat major No. 1, two numbers from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; the Overture and the Ballet No. 5, an adagia written for the following solo instruments: 'Cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp; Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmo's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; to close, the orchestral suite by the Roumanian composer, Enesco.

For the first matinee of the year, on Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2.30 the Symphony will be Haydn's in B flat major, inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. For the rest, Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen," Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's "Danced Legend," "The Bird of Fire." The six numbers are in this order:

I. Introduction: Kastchel's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Bird of Fire.
II. Supplications of the Bird of Fire.
III. The Princesses Play with Golden Apples.
III. Berceuse.
IV. The Princesses dance in a circle.
V. Diabolical dance by all the subjects of Katschef.

The time is remembered when Mr. Monteux conducted this brilliant and daring music and the "Afternoon of a Faun" for performance by the Russian Ballet.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 26 1919

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

A Tempest in the Boston Teapot.

An old flame has flared again in Boston. Because Albert Spalding changed his mind about playing the Bruch "Scottish Fantasia" with the Boston Symphony and substituted for it Dvorak's Concerto, the advisability of playing Bruch's music at this time became again the question of the moment. According to Mr. Philip Hale, writing in the Boston Herald, there are "many who are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the 'Intellectuals,' who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame." Of course, the paragraph irritated Mr. H. T. Parker, dubbed years ago by Harvard students Hell-to-Pay, and the Transcript of a day or so later returned to the battle with: "Now Bruch in these days is a doddering old man, dragging out life in a suburb of Berlin. During the war, it appears, he blasphemed the English in senile furies. Other old men nearer Boston still resent these follies. There were alarums and excursions even as there were last spring when Miss Braslau would sing certain music of Bruch."

Will Mr. Hale counter, and when? Of course, the whole business is a tempest in a teapot, but Boston still retains vivid memories of a tea party and possesses the unenviable knack of making every teapot tempest a party. And with the passing, by Government order, of Mr. Hale's favorite brew of ale perhaps tea will now provide him with a substitute.

CITIZEN
: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of the pending five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Sergei Rachmaninof will be the first. At the opening concert on Friday evening, Nov. 7, at 8:15, the famous Russian pianist will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat Major. For the orchestral numbers Pierre Monteux, the new conducter, has chosen Schuman's buoyant First Symphony, known as the "Sprig" symphony; two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus;" the Overture and Ballet No. 5, which is an adagia, written for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. To close, the Orchestral Suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

From Union
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH COLLEGE

Schumann's Spring Composition Features Opening of Concert Course.

NORTHAMPTON, Oct. 22—The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Northampton marked the opening of the Smith College concert course this evening in John M. Greene Hall. The orchestra was conducted by Pierre Monteux, and was its 14th appearance before Smith College.

The famous Schumann Symphony in B flat major, otherwise known as the "Spring Symphony," was played. This work was written at the end of the winter of 1841, and its keynote sounded by the trumpets at the beginning of the first movement is a call to spring the eternal awakening of the earth. In the first movement is suggested a struggle between winter and the coming spring, expressed in many ways until the joyous mood of spring predominates. The structure of the work is simple with a quiet hymn at the close, which Philip Hale says is "one of those things about Schumann no one can explain."

The allegro and scherzo express joy and merriment unconfirmed, while the finale is a goodby to spring, which, since it is continued in the mood of the previous movement, weaves its themes so as to suggest no shadow of sadness, but rather an exultant close of spring. The program follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, Schumann
Andante un Poco Maestoso; Allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio 1, Molto piu vivace; Trio 2.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
"A Siegfried Idyll, Wagner
"Le Chasseur Maudit", (The Wild Huntsman"), Symphonic poem, Franck
Les Preludes, Liszt

N.Y. SUN
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26

The programme for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, Pierre Monteux conductor, comprises Schumann's "Spring" symphony, tw numbers from Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and a suite by Enesco. The programme for the concert on Saturday afternoon, November 8, comprises Haydn's symphony in B flat, Beethoven's overture "King Stephen." Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman" and a suite arranged from Stravinsky's "The Bird of Fire."

n TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.
OCT 26 1919 M

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the opening concert of its season in Washington at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30, for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's music store, Thirteenth and G streets.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist.

He will play his Third Concerto, considered an even more splendid work than his Second, which he played last year.

For the purely orchestral numbers on this program, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," and the Orchestral Suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

dress Washington, D. C. e 26 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the opening concert of its season in Washington at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30, for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's Music Store, Thirteenth and G streets.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. He will play his Third Concerto, considered an even more splendid work than his Seconds, which he played last year. For the purely orchestral numbers on this program, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," and the orchestral suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

"Again the question of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor looms large in the musical world," writes the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, presenting some varied impressions of the Boston Orchestra from the Boston point of view.

"Time was when its visits carried a definite guaranty of quality, both of orchestral playing and of conducting. Since, however, the passing of Dr. Muck and the reorganization of the band's personnel there has been in the mind of all music lovers the unedeniable fear that the prestige of former years was a moribund quality.

"This year Pierre Monteux, released from operatic duties at the Metropolitan, has succeeded to the post held all too briefly by Henri Rabaud. He made his first appearance as permanent conductor in two concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, a week ago, conducting the following program:

Beethoven's Second Symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman;" Debussy's Prelude to "The afternoon of a Faun," and the "Catalonia of Albeniz.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SUN
s: Baltimore, Md.

Rachmaninoff At Lyric Nov. 5.

At his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 5, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist-composer, will play his own Third Concerto for piano and orchestra.

This is his latest work and is said to be even more impressive than his Second Concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony last year.

The sale of seats for the Boston ge Symphony's concerts is much larger than last year, it is reported at Albaugh's ticket office.

Oratorio Recitals By Choir.

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y. e 26 1919

INSTITUTE ACTIVITIES

Boston Symphony, Tollefsen Trio and New York Chamber Music Society in the Offing.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is announced as soloist for the first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for the evening of Nov. 7. The Russian composer pianist will play the Liszt E-flat Major Concerto. For his purely orchestral numbers, Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Schumann's E-flat Symphony, entitled "Spring"; two selections from Beethoven's Ballet Music, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Enesco's Suite for orchestra (opus 9).

IDENCE SUNDAY JOUBNAL

OCTOBER 26, 1919.

Boston Symphony Soloists.

Of especial interest is the announcement of the soloists for the five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the dates for which have already been given in this column. At the opening concert on Nov. 18 Emilio de Gorgoza, the popular Spanish-American baritone, will appear. Although he is an American by birth and affiliation his Spanish ancestry has given him a temperament which manifests itself in his work. His appearance with the orchestra will be his first in this city.

The other artists announced are Sophie Breslau, contralto, on Dec. 16; Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, Jan. 27; Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, March 9, and Albert Spalding, violinist, on April 6. The subscription sale of seats will open tomorrow at Seddon's newsstand in the Butler Exchange building.

* * *

BALTIMORE AMERICAN

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5 (for which seats will be placed on sale tomorrow at Albaugh's ticket agency), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, have between them arranged a program of striking interest and variety. Rachmaninoff's newest Concerto, the Third, is considered even finer than the Second, which he played with the orchestra here last year. "This concerto," wrote Mr. Huneker in the New York Times, "conceived in no academic mood by the giant of the Russians, was thrilling as no other of its kind since the early triumphs of Tschaikovsky. Its soaring theme of agonized yearning, its second part of oddly held rhythms like interrupted heart-beats, its scherzando finale with mocking recessional of muffled drums, set nerves a-tingle and bowed some heads that of late refused to nod with the neo-Scythians. The conductor led alertly from behind the piano as if giving reins to a runaway, and the packed audience's roar of ovation drowned the applauding hundred players of his band. The event was unprecedented, if not unforeseen. A record crowd all afternoon vainly besieged the outer doors."

Mr. Monteux will begin the program in the spirit of the eighteenth century with Haydn's historic symphony in B flat, inscribed to "The Queen Of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. He will end the concert, however, in the twentieth century, by playing Stravinsky's dance legend, "The Bird Of Fire."

SUN, BALTIMORE,

, OCTOBER 26, 1919.

Boston Symphony.

FOR the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, November 5, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, have between them arranged a program of striking interest and variety. Rachmaninoff's newest concerto, the Third, is considered even finer than the Second, which he played with the orchestra here last year. "This concerto," wrote Mr. Huneker in the New York Times, "conceived in no academic mood by the giant of the Russians, was thrilling as no other of its kind since the early triumphs of Tschaikovsky. Its soaring theme of agonized yearning, its second part of oddly held rhythms like interrupted heart-beats, its scherzando finale with mocking recessional of muffled drums, set nerves a-tingle and bowed some heads that of late refused to nod with the neo-Scythians. The conductor led alertly from behind the piano as if giving reins to a runaway, and the packed audience's roar of ovation drowned the applauding hundred players of his band. The event was unprecedented, if not unforeseen. A record crowd all afternoon vainly besieged the outer doors."

Mr. Monteux will begin the program in the spirit of the eighteenth century with Haydn's historic symphony in B flat, inscribed to "The Queen Of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. He will end the concert, however, in the twentieth century, by playing Stravinsky's Danced Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet.

BALTIMORE NEWS

Saturday, Oct. 25, 1919

RACHMANINOFF TO PLAY

Famous Russian Pianist Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master Russian pianist, will be soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 5, for which the sale of tickets will begin next Monday at Albaugh's ticket agency.

Rachmaninoff will play the piano part in his newest Third Concerto, which is considered even more striking in somber theme and wild rhythm than the Second, which he played last year.

The purely symphonic numbers will comprise Haydyn's symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette, and a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his om

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 25 1919

Rachmaninoff, is the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3, and will play Liszt's in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open with Schumann's Symphony in The novelty will be Stravinsky's "The Bird of Fire," of which a symphonic suite

ELPHIA INQUIRER,

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 26, 1919

SOME NEWS OF THE MUSICAL SEASON

Programmes of the Philadelphia, New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras; Frieda Hempel in Recital etc.,

First Boston Symphony Programme

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3 (for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow at Heppe's), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a programme of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, proverbially a matchless performer of Liszt's music, has chosen that composer's famous and scintillating First Concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the overture, and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Ertvinsky's dance legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet.

Miss Olga Samaroff will make her

THE BALTIMORE NEWS

Wednesday, Oct. 22, 1919

TO BE SEEN HERE WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux is director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its local season of five concerts at the Lyric the night of November 5, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist-composer, as the soloist.

, OCTOBER 26,

RECORD, SUNDAY

Rachmaninoff With Boston Orpel's Early Visit.

pel's Visit.

—The program

—For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 3, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a program of marked diversity. The Russian pianist will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." The conductor will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two portions of his only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the Overture and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments—'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Stravinsky's Dance Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which Monteux was the interpreter when he conducted the Russian Ballet, will conclude the concert.

* * *

m EAGLE

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 26 1919

THE ORCHESTRAS

The programs for the Boston Symphony's first concerts at Carnegie Hall. Thursday

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the new permanent conductor of the organization. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the di Russian pianist, will be the solo Liszt's First Concerto, in E flat phony will be Schubert's, in B fl "Spring" and the novelty of Stravi of Music on Monday evening, November 3 (for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow at Heppe's), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a programme of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, proverbially a matchless performer of Liszt's music, has chosen that composer's famous and scintillating First Concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the overture, and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Ertvinsky's dance legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet.

om TRIBUNE

ddress New York City

ate

A feature of the first matinee to be given at Carnegie Hall on November 8 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird.

MORNING TELEGRAPH

ss: New York City

OCT 26 1919

Opening Boston Symphony.

For the first Boston Symphony concert of the pending season in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor has made the following program: Schumann's "Spring" Symphony in B flat major No. 1, two numbers from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; the Overture and the Ballet No. 5, an adagia written for the following solo instruments: 'Cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp; Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmo's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; to close, the orchestral suite by the Roumanian composer, Enesco.

For the first matinee of the year, on Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2.30 the Symphony will be Haydn's in B flat major, inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette. For the rest, Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen," Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's "Danced Legend." "The Bird of Fire." The six numbers are in this order:

I. Introduction: Kastchel's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Bird of Fire.
II. Supplications of the Bird of Fire.
III. The Princesses Play with Golden Apples.
III. Berceuse.
IV. The Princesses dance in a circle.
V. Diabolical dance by all the subjects of Katschef.

The time is remembered when Mr. Monteux conducted this brilliant and daring music and the "Afternoon of a Faun" for performance by the Russian Ballet.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

CITIZEN

: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of the pending five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the first. At the opening concert on Friday evening, Nov. 7, at 8:15, the famous Russian pianist will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat Major. For the orchestral numbers Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Schuman's buoyant First Symphony, known as the "Sprig" symphony; two selections from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus;" the Overture and Ballet No. 5, which is an adagia, written for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. To close, the Orchestral Suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

From Union
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH COLLEGE

Schumann's Spring Composition Features Opening of Concert Course.

NORTHAMPTON, Oct. 22—The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Northampton marked the opening of the Smith College concert course this evening in John M. Greene Hall. The orchestra was conducted by Pierre Monteux, and was its 14th appearance before Smith College.

The famous Schumann Symphony in B flat major, otherwise known as the "Spring Symphony," was played. This work was written at the end of the winter of 1841, and its keynote sounded by the trumpets at the beginning of the first movement is a call to spring the eternal awakening of the earth. In the first movement is suggested a struggle between winter and the coming spring, expressed in many ways until the joyous mood of spring predominates. The structure of the work is simple with a quiet hymn at the close, which Philip Hale says is "one of those things about Schumann no one can explain."

The allegro and scherzo express joy and merriment unconfirmed, while the finale is a goodby to spring, which, since it is continued in the mood of the previous movement, weaves its themes so as to suggest no shadow of sadness, but rather an exultant close of spring. The program follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, Schumann
Andante un Poco Maestoso; Allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio 1, Molto piu vivace; Trio 2.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
"A Siegfried Idyll, Wagner
"Le Chasseur Maudit", (The Wild Huntsman"), Symphonic poem, Franck
Les Preludes, Liszt

N.Y. SUN

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26

The programme for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, Pierre Monteux conductor, comprises Schumann's "Spring" symphony, tw numbers from Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and a suite by Enesco. The programme for the concert on Saturday afternoon, November 8, comprises Haydn's symphony in B flat, Beethoven's overture "King Stephen." Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman" and a suite arranged from Stravinsky's "The Bird of Fire."

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

A Tempest in the Boston Teapot.

An old flame has flared again in Boston. Because Albert Spalding changed his mind about playing the Bruch "Scottish Fantasia" with the Boston Symphony and substituted for it Dvorak's Concerto, the advisability of playing Bruch's music at this time became again the question of the moment. According to Mr. Philip Hale, writing in the Boston Herald, there are "many who are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the 'Intellectuals,' who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame." Of course, the paragraph irritated Mr. H. T. Parker, dubbed years ago by Harvard students Hell-to-Pay, and the Transcript of a day or so later returned to the battle with: "Now Bruch in these days is a doddering old man, dragging out life in a suburb of Berlin. During the war, it appears, he blasphemed the English in senile furies. Other old men nearer Boston still resent these follies. There were alarums and excursions even as there were last spring when Miss Braslau would sing certain music of Bruch."

Will Mr. Hale counter, and when? Of course, the whole business is a tempest in a teapot, but Boston still retains vivid memories of a tea party and possesses the unenviable knack of making every teapot tempest a party. And with the passing, by Government order, of Mr. Hale's favorite brew of ale, perhaps tea will now provide him with a substitute.

n TIMES

ress: Washington, D. C.

OCT 26 1919 M

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the opening concert of its season in Washington at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30, for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's music store, Thirteenth and G streets.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist.

He will play his Third Concerto, considered an even more splendid work than his Second, which he played last year.

For the purely orchestral numbers on this program, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," and the Orchestral Suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

dress Washington, D. C.

te

28 1919

...r a century.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the opening concert of its season in Washington at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 4, at 4:30, for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow morning at Droop's Music Store, Thirteenth and G streets.

Of the famous soloists to appear at each of these concerts, the first will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian pianist—a soloist also of last season. He will play his Third Concerto, considered an even more splendid work than his Seconds, which he played last year. For the purely orchestral numbers on this program, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," and the orchestral suite by Enesco, the Rumanian composer.

"Again the question of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor looms large in the musical world," writes the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, presenting some varied impressions of the Boston Orchestra from the Boston point of view.

"Time was when its visits carried a definite guaranty of quality, both of orchestral playing and of conducting. Since, however, the passing of Dr. Muck and the reorganization of the band's personnel there has been in the mind of all music lovers the unedeniable fear that the prestige of former years was a moribund quality.

"This year Pierre Monteux, released from operatic duties at the Metropolitan, has succeeded to the post held all too briefly by Henri Rabaud. He made his first appearance as permanent conductor in two concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, a week ago, conducting the following program:

Beethoven's Second Symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman;" Debussy's Prelude to "The afternoon of a Faun," and the "Catalonia of Albeniz.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SUN

s: Baltimore, Md.

Rachmaninoff At Lyric Nov. 5.

At his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 5, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist-composer, will play his own Third Concerto for piano and orchestra.

This is his latest work and is said to be even more impressive than his Second Concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony last year.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony's concerts is much larger than last year, it is reported at Albaugh's ticket office.

Oratorio Recitals By Choir.

m EAGLE

dress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

INSTITUTE ACTIVITIES

Boston Symphony, Tollefsen Trio and New York Chamber Music Society in the Offing.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is announced as soloist for the first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for the evening of Nov. 7. The Russian composer pianist will play the Liszt E-flat Major Concerto. For his purely orchestral numbers, Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Schumann's E-flat Symphony, entitled "Spring"; two selections from Beethoven's Ballet Music, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Enesco's Suite for orchestra (opus 9).

MES
Washington, D. C.
OCT 26 1919 M

Boston Critics Divided On Merits of Monteux, New Symphony Leader

...nparable manner of the great Beethoven, but on the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed.' The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful. Especially worthy of praise was the treatment of the introduction, the Scherzo and the Finale. In the Larghetto there might have been more sustained passages of truly piano effect.

"Franck's symphonic poem was really heard here for the first time, although it had been played thrice at these concerts before yesterday. On previous occasions the expression of the supernatural seemed tame, almost timid. There was little suggestion of horror, terror, the demoniacal. One thought that good "Pere" Franck here as in "The Beatitudes" was unable to express the satanic; that Weber's few measures accompanying the ride through the air of the demon hunter and his train in "Der Freischuetz" were far more imaginative than the many measures of Franck. Yet this demoniacal quality is in Franck's symphonic poem. It needed an imaginative, dramatic conductor to bring it out. As the music was played the other day the effect was well nigh overwhelming.

"Debussy's exquisite Prelude has been a stumbling block to many conductors. Even Dr. Muck, singularly fortunate in his choice of tempi, erred in the same direction. The Prelude was never so beautiful as it was the other day, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbers, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable."

By H. T. Parker's testimony in the Boston Transcript:

"As for Mr. Monteux, he may be a conductor of this, that or the other rank in our American liking for degrees, but unmistakably he is interesting. His modesty, his subordination of himself to the task in hand, hand clear. As at the end of the symphony yesterday, it is the orchestra equally with the conductor that he would have the audience applaud. At his work he is agreeable to the eye without superfluous vehemence or rigid insistence; while the players seem readily and responsively to understand him. A finely sensitive ear, hand and imagination surely ordered the performance of Debussy's prelude, discerning and maintaining the delicate rhythmic vigor that Albeniz's piece, it was, brought to a repetitious music, the frank fashion in which he kept to its homely note, the zeal with which he caught each scrap of the Spaniard's meager instrument color. So, too, with Franck's symphonic poem, characteristic of the composer when he would be boldly and badly delineative. It is heavy-handed music, though Franck did not write it and Mr. Monteux laid on and spared not. He missed neither the spectral voice of the horns nor the still more spectral voice of the tuba. He kept "The Wild Huntsman's" chase, whether for blasphemous pleasure or under ceaseless curse, in becoming sound and fury. The tonal panorama passed; it had been pictorial, theatric—and the piece is not one whit more. Clearly the new conductor differentiates well, seeks and imparts the characteristic voice of the music in hand. For this Monteux of "Catalonia" and "The Wild Huntsman" was also the Monteux of Debussy's faun in the manner aforesaid and of Beethoven's youthful symphony in D major, 'read' limpidly, animatedly, faithfully, ingratiatingly."

The representative of the Christian Science Monitor, however, found less to praise and more to censure.

"In some respects, Mr. Monteux's task in presenting the first concert this year was not so great as it was last year, when the orchestra was more or less disorganized. A goodly proportion of the old players is here now and then. Then, too, these men have had the benefit of a season's work with Mr. Rabaud, who, it may be presumed, was an exponent of the style of conducting and program making which Mr. Monteux will follow. However, last year it was a temporary position; now it is for a year. And to a certain extent, whether it is wise or fair or just, or not, the audience cannot help making a little forecast, of the twenty-three concerts to come from the one it heard on Friday.

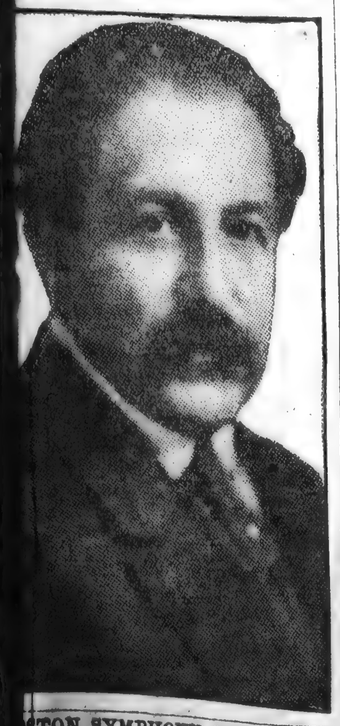
"The Beethoven symphony received a perfunctory reading. The conductor added nothing of his own, being seemingly more occupied with holding his men to the tempo he chose than with letting his fancy run in the scherzo or the slow movement. His best work of the afternoon was in the Debussy number, for here he realized the poetry of the score. The Cesar Franck piece, example of a day of music writing that is gone, seems an unworthy representative of the great French master because it lacks the spontaneity and authority of other works of this pioneer of modernism. It is hot a very alarming moment that his portrayal of fear brings forth. Listening to the Albeniz suite was no difficult task, being filled rather with the pleasurable excitement of wondering what sort of an odd sound would next emanate from the orchestra."

Providence Bulletin Oct 25

...ENCE, R. I., SATURDAY,

Pierre Monteux

New Conductor Will Lead Boston Symphony in Its Series of Five Concerts Here This Winter.



...STON SYMPHONY CONCERT SERIES HERE IS ANNOUNCED

...t is on Nov. 18, with Emilio de Gogorza Soloist.

...ive Tuesday evening concerts, to be ...en by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, under the leadership of its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be held Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9, and April 6, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloists will be Emilio de Gogorza, on Nov. 18; Sophie Braslau, on Dec. 16; Sergei Rachmaninoff, on Jan. 27; Jean Bedetti, on March 9, and Albert Spalding, on April 6.

The general sale of season tickets will open Monday, Nov. 3, at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange. Solos in this city will include contralo, 'cellist, baritone, pianist and violinist.

Pierre Monteux is a noted conductor of concert, opera and ballet in both Europe and America, and, while in France last summer, he collected a large number of new scores, French, Italian and Russian. He states that he also has several new American works he desires to perform. He adds that he will bar no music which the public desires, nor will he neglect the old for the new.

Emilio de Gogorza is a Spanish-American baritone with a mellow voice and distinctive interpretative powers in recital. There is a silvery lustre to his tone, which also has individual quality.

Sophie Braslau is a rising young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and has won an enviable place among the singers of the Boston company.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is a phenomenal pianist, having taken a lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston concerts. He landed unexpectedly in New York last autumn, a virtual exile from Russia, where the Bolshéviki had requisitioned his estate. He has an unusual mastery of his instrument.

The violoncello will be played by Jean Bedetti, who was known here only by hearsay until he came from France at the beginning of this season to lead the violoncello section of the orchestra. He has taken first prize at the Paris Conservatory and was first 'cellist at the Opera Comique and at the Colonne Concerts for several years.

Albert Spalding is a young violinist of fast rising fame. He forfeited a whole season of engagements in 1916 to offer his services to his country and was commissioned a Lieutenant of the A. E. F. in Italy, where he did active service in the Aviation Corps. Among living violinists he generally accorded the front rank.

VENING TRANSCRIPT,
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

"THE FIRE-BIRD" TO BE HEARD ANEW

Stravinsky's Suite from His Celebrated Ballet at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—The Tale and the Telling—A Tone-Poem by Mr. Chadwick and Other Novel Pieces in Prospect—Miss Farrar's Songs, Mme. Frijsh's Return, and Other Incidents

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play for the first times a piece that ought to have gained place long since in the active repertory of Symphony Hall—the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Fire-Bird." This "mimed tale," transferred to the theatre from Russian folk-lore, was originally set on the stage at Paris in the spring of 1910 by Mr. Diaghilev's company. When his dancers and mimes visited the United States in 1916 and 1917, "The Fire-Bird" was seen and heard in sundry performances at the Boston Opera House. They yielded sensation after sensation—the illusion of the fable whether it charmed with fantasy or sentiment, whether it amused with grotesquerie; the grace and the ardor of the narrative whether the music, the mimes or the picture were the means; the intrinsic beauty of that imaginative music and the felicity with which it was everywhere mated to the tale. In the time-worn cliché of reviewing, "The Fire-Bird" was "unforgettable."

None the less with the departure of the Russian Ballet it vanished from our stage. The music, however, should have been quickly established in our concert halls. They then knew, and for the most part still know, Stravinsky only by the youthful, ephemeral and none too characteristic pièce d'occasion, "Fireworks," a more youthful and unindividualized symphony, and a fanciful scherzo suggested by Maeterlinck's book about bees. The suite that the composer himself had assembled from "The Fire-Bird" was ready to hand; yet not until this autumn of 1919 does it pass to Symphony Hall. As Stravinsky arranged the suite, it stands:

I. Prelude; The Sorcerer's Magic Garden: The Fire-Bird's Dance.
II. The Fire-Bird's Entreaties.
III. The Captive Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
IV. The Round Dance of the Princesses.
V. The Dance of the Sorcerer's Horde, under the Fire-Bird's Spell.

To these five excerpts, Mr. Monteux has added a sixth—a lullaby after the game of the princesses—to make the epitome of the music the ampler. Moreover, not since Dr. Muck's time has the orchestra been put to such pains in the preparation of a novel and exacting piece. Choir by choir, by day and by night, Mr. Monteux has rehearsed the band, pursuing the perfection—and now with a finer instrument—that he sought of old in his days with the Russian Ballet. With reason, anticipation of the performance runs high.

The Tale

When "The Fire-Bird" was first seen and heard in Boston, the "mimed tale" was retold in these columns as an old legend of the Russian folk wherein "the spectators saw the youthful Tsarevitch wandering in an enchanted forest; encountering the fire-bird there, sparing her from his cross-bow, winning her affection whereof he was soon to have need. For in that forest in the magical castle of the necromancer Kotschéi princesses were held in durance and among them she who was to be the Tsarevna. When they stole out of the castle, old Kotschéi and his sinister and grotesque fairy-folk, came forth in pursuit, parted them from the young prince and laid sore spells upon him. Then would they have taken him, too, had not the Fire-Bird wrought more potent spells until they danced themselves, as it were, out of existence. So were Tsarevitch and Tsarevna united to live happily ever afterward. And all this was accomplished to highly vivid and illusory music of Stravinsky minutely intertwined with every suggestion of the stage."

The Telling

Of Stravinsky's music, it was also written in this place: "If ever twain were of one body and one spirit, it is the mimed and the danced action of "The Fire-Bird" and the music that is interwoven and inextricable part of such retelling of the old legend and of the illusion worked upon those that hear. There is hardly a significant gesture, glance or pose of the dancers and the mimes that the music does not reflect; or, as plausibly, there is not one of these movements that might not have sprung from the momentary suggestion of the music. The Tsarevitch catches the Fire-Bird in his arms; he shivers with his pleasure; she gently and pretendingly struggles to be free and there is hardly a quiver in their motions with which the orchestra does not vibrate. And so, equally, not only with every detail of the visible action but with all the suggestion that it bears of the pervading mood and the momentary sensation of each personage.

"Again there are episodes in which the sustained mood comes uppermost, like the first encounter of the Tsarevitch and Tsarevna in which they look into each other's eyes and love. Then the music turns songful and expands into voice of their gentle and youthful emotion. Again, it is all of the spectacle of the instant as when the old sorcerer's train of grotesque fairy-folk comes streaming down from the castle to rhythms, modulations and timbres that are as fantastic and eerie as they. Yet once more, it is of both the inner and the outer illusion of the scene. Old Kotschéi's host is whirling in dances under the spell that the Fire-Bird has laid upon it; but by the workings of that spell, the circlings must become more and more automatic until the troop drops powerless from exhaustion. The music is of the dance, the magic, the mounting spell. As for atmosphere, in a few pages of preluding, Stravinsky suffuses stage and auditorium with the suggestion of weird and mysterious folk-tale, of shadowy place and magic beings, of strange course and brightening end. That end comes in music as serene as it is rich in golden glow.

"The means whereby Stravinsky so welds action and music into a single body and a single illusion and attains this beauty of suggestion, this power of delineation are the age-old means of the composer—imagination and resource. There is not a writer of music in our time—no, not even Strauss or Debussy—who matches him in delineative imagination with timbres, harmonies, progressions and modulations or in the manipulation of them. Not one such stroke—and there are scores in the long course of the ballet—seems superfluous, routine or meaningless. Not one lacks its musical pith, its delineative point, its place in the whole design and in the immediate content of the music. Not a few are of singular beauty in themselves or of a wondrous power of suggestion. Thus is Stravinsky's music a many-threaded web of vivid and significant color, upon which stand like the splotches in a costume by Bakst, glowing spots of songful melody. But they are not patches, since they are an intrinsic and expanding part of an expertly and closely wrought musical design; while as the play with timbres and harmonies have instant point, so these exfoliating melodies have long sustained beauty.

"With rhythm, which is often the life and not seldom the coördinating and unifying element in this music, Stravinsky is hardly less imaginative, resourceful and significant. And all this resource, artistry, manipulative skill, all this sensitiveness to means and methods is not for an instant cerebral. The music, especially when it is most songful, sounds as though it were written in the freshness and the resilience of young imagination warmly and finely stirred, visioning ardently, speaking spontaneously. Rich as it is in resource and invention, large as it often is in swelling sonorities, it is never thick, heavy or opaque. The tonal web is luminous and clear, pliant and swiftly woven. The instrumental and harmonic colors shine brightly; the rhythm beats lightly and surely; the movement is swift and sensitive. At every touch of Stravinsky's hand, it is all a-quiver and a-tingle upon the imagination of his hearers. More perfect music in its kind and purpose has not been written in our time. Little excels it in beauty, in imagination, in individuality and imparting power."

The Technical Side

At another time, and more analytically, Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill wrote in The Transcript of "The Fire-Bird:" "Stravinsky adopts at once a logical and æsthetically satisfying method, approximately transferring the principles of the Wagnerian music-drama to the pantomime ballet, a genuine, and it is to be hoped, a permanent innovation. In the scenario by Fokine he had an admirably poetic and fantastic story which unfolds with a culminative stage art, and forms a stimulating basis for musical invention. The tale of the imprisoned prince, first dazzled, then moved to pity by the fairy-bird; obtaining a magic feather as a reward for sparing her life, startled by the thirteen princesses, falling in love with one at first sight; engaging the services of the fairy-bird to neutralize the malign powers of the sinister sorcerer, discovering the secret of his immortality and freeing through his death his hapless victims, bringing happiness to all, and winning both a bride and a kingdom—all this is exactly calculated to awaken the creative imagination of the composer. In his music Stravinsky has produced a polished work of exquisite sensibility, dramatic force and surpassing unity. In spite of its separate 'numbers' Stravinsky has welded the whole together by an elastic use of motives which enables him to delineate and characterize his personages with marvellous precision. Repeated examinations of the score only intensify the impression of an exactitude of instinct which makes 'The Fire-Bird' the affirmation of a new type of ballet. This method is so inevitable that one can only wonder it was not thought of before.

"If the intrinsic charm of 'The Entreaties of the Fire-Bird,' 'The Play of the Princesses with the Golden Apples,' the melodious if somewhat more obvious 'Lullaby,' the fantastic 'Dance of the Sorcerer's Train,' awaken an immediate response from the listener, the dramatic aptness of the Prelude, the 'Dance of the Fire-Bird,' the approach of the sorcerer and his followers, the striking sinister quality of the music where the sorcerer ensnares the prince and above all the scene of the magician's death not only enchain us by their force, but convince us afresh of the significant theatric originality of the composer. Moreover, half the secret of this self-same dramatic potency lies in Stravinsky's well-nigh uncanny mastery of orchestral timbres and coloristic resource. Without resorting to a bald realism he establishes at once in the Prelude a perfect counterpart of the dramatic mood—in his deep plucked strings, his aerial harmonics in arpeggios, and his subdued muted horns. His Fire-Bird flies to scintillant effects of novel iridescence. The sorcerer enters as graphically in the sullen and discordant sounds of the orchestra as he does on the stage. In the episode where his life is at stake, and with it his unholy power, the orchestra paints the struggles eloquently.

"In musical idiom Stravinsky is at once the native Russian involuntarily speaking his own tongue, although keenly aware of modern France. There are phrases from 'Pelléas' and one passage hints at the Fire-Charm from 'Die Walküre.' There is frequent employment of the augmented triad used and over-used by Debussy, with some reminiscences of the whole-tone scale. But it must be remembered that there were augmented triads and whole-tone scales in Russia anterior to Debussy, and that notwithstanding the obvious influences to which any composer of twenty-six might be subject, that Stravinsky in 'The Fire-Bird' is already an artist of distinctive and personal utterance. The work as a whole is preëminently Russian in its fantastic and highly poetic romanticism."

Programmes in Prospect

There will be no Symphony Concerts Friday afternoon, Nov. 7, and Saturday evening, Nov. 8, when the orchestra will be playing in New York. For the next pair of concerts on Friday, Nov. 14, and Saturday, Nov. 15, Mr. Monteux proposes the following programme:

Symphony in four movements with Viola Solo, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz Cantata for solo voice.....Tunder
Mme. Frijsh
Symphonic Poem, "The Angel of Death"...
Chadwick
Songs with orchestra:
Invitation au Voyage.....Duparc
Psalms CXXXVII. and CXIV.....Bloch
Hopak .....Musorgsky
Mme. Frijsh
Bourrée Fantasque .....Chabrier
(Scored for Full Orchestra by Motti)

In Berlioz's symphony about the wanderings of Byron's hero—romantic and pictorial music in which the conductor should excel—Mr. Denayer, the new first viola, will play the measures for the moods and the musings of Harold. Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, first heard in New York last winter at Mr. Damrosch's concerts, but then overlooked in Boston, was suggested by the relief, "Death Staying the Sculptor's Hand," set upon the monument to Martin Milmore in the cemetery at Forest Hills. "The artist's hand," wrote Mr. Krehbiel in The Tribune, after he had listened to the music last February "is stopped in the midst of his work by Death—a theme which is as proper to the musician as the poet or plastic artist. For poet and composer, indeed, it goes further in full expression than it could for the sculptor. Mr. Chadwick did not see 'Finis' written by the arrested chisel; for him there remained apotheosis achieved despite uncompleted work. And so after the section of the composition in which we imagine the creative activity and the soaring ambition of the artist, threatened by ominous warnings of the fatal catastrophe, which is reached at the first climax of the music, we hear the new beginning of a new song which proclaims ultimate triumph." In turn, Chabrier's "Bourrée" is a piece that should not have fallen from the active repertory. The Parisian wrote it fancifully, glowingly for the piano; the Viennese transcribed it no less imaginatively and richly for orchestra.

As interestingly as Mr. Monteux, Mme. Frijsh, the singer, has chosen her pieces. Mr. Bloch, exercising himself once more upon a Jewish music, is too little known here as a composer of sharp imagination and penetrating voice. His first Psalm is the familiar lament, "By the waters of Babylon"; his second, the rejoicing, "When Israel went out for Egypt." The curious cantata by Tunder for soprano, string orchestra and organ is an ancient piece written in the seventeenth century by the predecessor of the noted Buxtehude as organist and choir-master at the Marienkirche in Lübeck.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3 (for which the sale of seats will begin tomorrow at Heppe's), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, will provide a program of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, proverbially a matchless performer of Liszt's music, has chosen that composer's famous and scintillant First Concert in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Sympany in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's own Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"—the Overture and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments: 'cella, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Stravinsky's Danced Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian Ballet. The music is arranged as a symphonic suite in six parts, as follows:—

I. Introduction; Jardin enchante de Kastchei et danse de l'oiseau de feu ("Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Bird of Fire").
II. Supplications de l'oiseau de feu.
III. Jeu des princesses avec les pommes d'or ("The Princesses Play with Golden Apples").
IIIa. Berceuse ("Lullaby").
IV. Ronde des princesses ("The Princesses Dance in a Circle").
V. Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Kastchei ("Diabolical Dance by all the Subjects of Kastchei").

...om SUN

...dress: Baltimore, Md.

...te _____

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master pianist of Russia, will be soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric Wednesday evening, November 5, when he will play the piano part in his newest Third Concerto, which is considered even more striking in sombre theme and wild rhythm than the Second, which he played last year.

The purely symphonic numbers which Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen will make a program striking in variety and interest. Beginning with Haydn's Symphony inscribed "The Queen of France," in honor of Marie Antoinette, the music will leap from the eighteenth century to the twentieth, the modern number being the much-discussed suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire." Mr. Monteux, as former conductor of the Russian Ballet, is already noted for the rendering of this daring work.

STON HERALD, SAT

NOVEMBER 1, 1919

RACHMANINOFF WILDLY CHEERED

Pianist in Impressive Performance at Fourth Symphony Concert

"QUEEN OF FRANCE" BY HAYDN SCORES

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 3 for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Stravinski, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff was the pianist.

It is a surprising fact that this orchestra played Haydn's Symphony for the first time; nor have we been able to find the record of performance by any orchestra in Boston at a public concert. Haydn's Symphonies were heard here often in the last years of the 18th century, and it is more than probable that "The Queen of France" was one of them; but there is no means of identifying any one of these Symphonies, for they were entered on the program as "Grand Symphony," "Overture" or "Full Piece."

Buelow once spoke of "The Queen of France" as "a miniature symphony to be performed in a miniature room by a miniature orchestra," and he referred sarcastilly to a performance of it by "60 fiddlers and six tooters." Now Haydn wrote "The Queen of France" for Paris, a city that was accustomed to large orchestras. He wrote it for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique," a society that replaced the "Concert des Amateurs," and this orchestra numbered 40 fiddles, 12 violocellos, eight double-basses, and the usual number of wind instruments. It is not likely that "The Queen of France" was first performed by a little orchestra.

Yesterday the string section was somewhat reduced and the wood-wind was doubled. Would the symphony seem fresher, more sparkling, if it were performed in a little hall by small orchestra? We doubt it. As it was played yesterday the first movement and the trio of the Minuet gave special pleasure. The variations on the pretty French song of old time do no stray so far from the theme itself as to relieve the movement from the reproach of monotony.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his third concerto 10 years ago in New York. The performance was the first one. The prevailing mood of the music is one of sadness, a melancholy now subdued, now defiant; hardly relieved until the final outburst of hope, joy, what-you-will, by capricious episodes, as if one forced oneself to take a more sanguine view of life and then sank back, resigned to fate, or rebellious. The first movement is the most imaginative, the most impressive. We know of few first movements, if any, in the repertoire that equal it. The attention of the hearer is at once riveted; the mood is at once established. Low mutterings as of "the complaining millions of men" under a leaden sky; the sadness of it; the thought of a brooding, sinister Fate, not quite ready to deal the final blow—thus this music may be characterized without extravagance, without any laborious attempt at fine writing. The intermezzo, while it is interesting, often poetic, falls below this Allegro. Nor is the Finale, in spite of the exciting moments, the contrasting episodes and the thrilling apotheosis, equal in musical and psychological importance or in technical construction to this constantly sustained, firmly knit, inevitable first movement. Yet the two last movements in another concerto would make their irresistible way. It would be a pleasure to speak at length of the workmanship displayed, of the character of the melodic and harmonic schemes, of the skilful orchestration. The performance by the pianist was a remarkable one, remarkable even for Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and the composer were one and the same being. Thoughtful, imaginative, brilliant as this performance was, the virtuoso did not allow one to forget the music or regard it as merely an opportunity for the display of the pianist. The orchestra played as if inspired, with even more than its customary elasticity, tonal strength and beauty in solo passages and in ensemble. The great audience recalled Mr. Rachmaninoff again and again. Seldom has a pianist received so flattering a tribute in Symphony Hall.

Information in the program book about first performances of Stravinski's works was gained from contemporary French and English journals, and from supposedly authoritative annals. Yet, in some instances, this information is inaccurate. Thus there was a performance of "The Fire-Bird" in London, led by Mr. Monteux, before Rhene-Baton conducted it. Mr. Monteux also conducted the first performance of "Petrouchka" in Paris and the first performance of the opera "Le Rossignol" at the Paris Opera. How contemporary journals could be so [illegible] is not easily comprehended. [illegible] Purchase has [illegible] Corps were squarely [illegible] back to 117 [illegible] performance of the suite from "The Fire-Bird" brought pleasant recollections of the ballet. To anyone that has seen this ballet, the music in concert form, however detachable it is, is less significant. On the other hand, seeing a ballet, one necessarily too often disregards the music. In this Suite the sport, the fascinating dance of the Princesses, and the charming Lullaby—which, by the way, Mr. Monteux interpolated—are the most effective as concert music. The "Danse Infernale," away from the stage, suffers the most severely of all the movements. The performance of the Suite was exceedingly brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Nov. 7, 8 is as follows: Berlioz, Symphony "Harold in Italy" (Mr. Denayer, solo viola); Chadwick, "The Angel of Death," Symphonic poem (first time here); Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque. Mme. Povla Frijsh will sing an air from Franck's "Redemption" and these songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au Voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Bloch, Psalms 137 and 114.

Boston Post Nov 1

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff Plays Own 3d Concerto First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

From the standpoint of the great majority, the dominating feature of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was the performance by the great Russian composer and virtuoso, Sergei Rachmaninoff, of his own concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor. This is the third of Mr. Rachmaninoff's piano concertos. It has been recently revised by him. His performance was a tremendous triumph. Seldom, at concerts where the audiences are normally very enthusiastic and appreciative to the point of being uncritical, has a virtuoso been given a warmer reception.

SPLENDID PIANO PART

After saying these things it may easily appear crabbed or arrogant of a reviewer to state that in his opinion the music itself is very poor stuff. But that is the case. To the best of the writer's knowledge and conviction this is the poorest of the three concertos which Mr. Rachmaninoff has written for the piano. The reason it seems to him poor is that in the first place it is very long and diffuse. Secondly, most of the ideas seem to lack strong individuality. Thirdly the form is so extended that at a first hearing anyway the music drops apart in places. Idea No. 1 does not develop and lead to idea No. 2, and so on to the end. There is much repetition, but by no means a great deal of real growth of musical thoughts and real putting together of a strong musical structure.

Of course there is a splendidly written piano part, provided you are a pianist with the strength, technic and musical authority of Mr. Rachmaninoff, and this piano part was superbly played by the composer. And there are certain effects as characteristic of certain aspects of Mr. Rachmaninoff's music as certain melodies are characteristic of Puccini. They always bring their result—frantic applause. These effects are, for example, low, dark, rich harmonies in the strings, with a solo horn sounding through; or brilliant, sweeping climaxes when the orchestra suddenly blazes out in tonal splendor; strong, persistent march rhythms, melodies of a melting Slavic, melancholy cast; episodes for brass and wood wind, rather reminding of Tschaikowsky.

Now these things sound splendidly, and if you have not heard them before they make a great impression. But in this concerto, at least, these effects are neither new nor exceptionally inspired, and those familiar with even a few of Mr. Rachmaninoff's finest compositions can hardly by any stretch of the imagination rank this third concerto, heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts, with the wonderful tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," or a lesser work, the second symphony, or even the second piano concerto, which, on the whole, appears to be a better knit and more concise work.

Mr. Rachmaninoff seems to us in his compositions to err, as a rule, on the side of over-length. This is not because he is pretentious, but because he is sincere. He has such sincerity, such conviction and absorption in what he is doing that he is probably incapable of a completely objective criticism of his own work. His shortcomings, as we believe them to be, are always those of a deeply earnest and talented man. In addition to this, he is a very commanding figure on the stage—tremendously tall, quiet in manner but powerful in aspect, with a head and a body which suggest at once prehistoric force and frame and modern intellectuality. He has personality and magnetism to a very exceptional degree, and a very different order of magnetism than that of the half-feminized, long-haired type

Triumph of Personality

It is a credit to the public of today that so simple, sincere and genuinely distinctive an individuality as Mr. Rachmaninoff should impress us all so much. He is a great musician, and if his intimates did not bear witness to it one would know him to be a great man. But sometimes a man is great in himself, and sometimes he is great in his music. Sometimes, but not always, both go together. This concerto begins very well indeed with the announcement by the piano of a theme in the nature of Russian folk-song. It ends, after a finale interminably long and full of repetitions, with a very exciting and effective crescendo. The triumph of yesterday afternoon, coldly analyzed, was not the triumph of a great piece of music. It was the triumph of a great musical personality.

The other music on the programme was a symphony by Franz Joseph Haydn, nicknamed "La Reine de France" from the unsubstantiated supposition that this symphony was a favorite of Queen Marie Antoinette. This symphony does not appear to have been played before at these concerts. It is perfectly charming; just as formal as most of Haydn's symphonies, with a fine vigorous allegro a slow movement, not too slow, with a happy little theme; a minuet with humor and gusto in it, and a rapid, gossipy finale. It was played in the most admirable manner, with the most exemplary spirit and enphony, from the Danced Story, "The Fire-Bird" ("Oiseau de Feu").

Brilliant Theatre Music

The ballet which employs this music has been repeatedly performed in Boston by the Ballet Russe. The music is a marvel of orchestral coloring and workmanship. Today, the clever use of an orchestra is commonplace. By the side of the most noted masterpieces of orchestration this music is amazing. It has, besides the atmosphere of a fairy tale, the tale of enchanted princesses in the power of the Magician Katschei, saved by the brave prince, who is given the most beautiful of the princesses for his bride.

But the music without the spectacle is difficult and in many cases disappointing. It is inextricably interwoven with color and movement on the stage. Away from the stage, one hears interesting but unintelligible episodes which would say little or nothing, if one did not know the story, or had not the spectacle in his mind while listening. Al very strongly indeed and at one particula the composer, Mauri writer, the finest mo speaking, are the thi

the nature of a schei
Princesses Playing wit
Apples," the "Berceuse
Dance of the Princesse
there is poetic employmer robably a Russian folk th is grotesqerie and imagin
"Infernal Dance of Ka j c s"; there is the elemer and the strange in "The the Fire-Bird," but this sentially for the theatre far short of its complete concert room.

Traveler Nov 1

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon and played his own third concerto, the occasion marking its first hearing in this city. It also brought out such a display of enthusiasm as is rarely seen at a Symphony concert. The audience's greeting to the soloist was notably cordial but it paled into insignificance when compared with the outburst that greeted the conclusion of the first movement of the concerto and the outbursts that followed at every opportunity culminating in an ovation at the close of the number.

The concerto is decidedly interesting, in the composer's best vein and was given a presentation that could scarcely be bettered. Fortunate indeed was the audience to hear such a work interpreted by such a pianist and such an orchestra.

Herald Nov 2

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

As the Boston Symphony Orchestr will be traveling on its first souther trip of the season during the comin week, the next concerts in Boston wi take place a week from next Frida and Saturday, Nov. 14 and 15. Madam Povla Frijsh, the soloist, will sing a air from Franck's "Redemption," D paro's "Invitation to the Journey," tw psalms by Ernest Bloch, and Mou sorgsky's "Hopak." The program w be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Ital Symphony, in which the viola solo, i personating Byron's hero, weaves a co mentary through the score as it depic various Italian scenes of pilgrims, moun taineers and brigands. The viola will be played by Frederic Denayer, who has recently come to lead the viola sec tion from France, where he is consid ered one of the finest musicians of his particular instrument. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the first American work of the season's concerts—Chadwick's Sym phonic Poem, "The Angel of Death" (its first performance in Boston), and, to close the program, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," last heard at these concert
in 1899.

Boston Globe Nov 1

WARM GREETING TO RACHMANINOFF

Composer Assists in Own Work at the Symphony

Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite Given Admirable Interpretation

Rachmaninoff deserved the almost unprecedented applause which greeted his playing of his own Third Concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert. He not merely surmounted with ease the immense technical difficulties of the music. He proved once more that he is both a great composer and a great pianist.

This concerto is as a whole the finest work of his yet played in Boston. The first movement, especially, has all the brooding intensity which makes the opening section of his "Isle of the Dead" among the most powerful of modern compositions.

It is restrained throughout, with none of the Tschaikowsky-like outbursts of bombast which mar the latter half of that tone poem, and with no lapses into sentimentality. The whole concerto, though the later movements are not on as consistently high a level as the first, is certainly among the best ever written. It should be oftener heard, though there are few living pianists who could play it and not one who could equal the composer's own performance.

Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire-Bird," the other significant novelty on yesterday's program, sounded pale and tame after the magnificent concerto. It suffers somewhat in the concert hall from the absence of the Russian Ballet, for which the music was originally written. Stravinsky manipulates his orchestra deftly and adroitly to secure the effects he desires.

His music has a firm texture, with no ragged spots where his skill forsakes him. It is often bizarre and freakish, but never more so than the danced legend for which it is composed demands.

No wonder that younger composers nowadays are dazzled by his work as they were fascinated not long since by Debussy's. But he is only a clever and whimsical miniaturist compared with the Rachmaninoff of the Allegro ma non tanto of the Third Concerto.

Stravinsky, or at least the earlier Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird," no longer sounds ultra modern to ears attuned to the later work of Ravel and Scriabin. Mr Monteux, who has conducted performances of this music with the Ballet Russe in both London and Paris, gives an altogether admirable interpretation of it.

It is certainly surprising that Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, called "The Queen of France," should have been performed yesterday for the first time in Boston as far as available records show. One wonders how many more equally delightful works by that indefatigable symphonist lie buried in the complete editions.

The slow movement with a beautiful theme taken from an old French Romance and the spirited and playful finale have a delicacy and grace which one commonly associates with Mozart rather than with Haydn.

The performance was mellifluous rather than finely shaded. It was never dull or lifeless, but it missed some of the finer nuances of the music. Haydn in this symphony has turned courtier, but Mr Monteux sometimes let him remain a peasant. Rabaud's virtues would have suited this music, as those of Monteux suit Rachmaninoff's and Stravinsky's.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Nov 14 and 15 includes Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, songs for Mme Frijsh and unfamiliar numbers by Chadwick and Chabrier. This week's program will be repeated tonight.

Advertiser Nov 2

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts in Boston will take place a week from next Friday and Saturday, November 14 and 15. Madame Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano, will be soloist. The program will be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the first American work of the season's concerts, Chadwick's Symphonic Poem, "The Angel of Death," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Post Nov 2

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be travelling on its first Southern trip of the season during the coming week, the next concerts in Boston will take place a week from next Friday and Saturday, Nov. 14 and 15. On these occasions, Madame Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano of vivid dramatic and interpretive ability, will be the soloist. She will sing a 17th century cantata by Tunder, Duparc's famous "Invitation to the Journey," a psalm by Ernest Bloch, the Swiss-American composer, and Moussorgsky's ever-popular "Hopak." The programme will be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which the viola solo, impersonating Byron's hero, weaves a commentary through the score as it depicts various Italian scenes of pilgrims, mountaineers and brigands. The solo part will, of course, be taken by Mr. Frederic Denayer, who has recently come to lead the viola section from France, where he is considered one of the finest musicians of his particular instrument. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the first American work of the season's concerts—Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (its first performance in Boston), and, to close the programme, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," last heard at these concerts in 1899.

SCIENCE MONITOR,

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1,

MUSIC

Mr. Rachmaninoff in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Truly a stimulating and a novel program that Mr. Monteux set before his Friday afternoon audience at the fourth concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Stimulating in that new musical ideas were set forth, and novel in that all three numbers were heard for the first time at these concerts. Haydn's symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 85), bearing the title "The Queen of France" has somehow escaped performance through the 38 years of the orchestra, and the audiences have been the loser. There are touches in this, now of brilliancy and now of delicacy, that other and more familiar Haydn symphonies lack. The brilliancy Mr. Monteux accomplished, but the delicacy at times eluded him, as in the romance, the second movement.

The interest of the audience was plainly for Mr. Rachmaninoff, who played with the orchestra his third piano concerto in D minor, Op. 30. Here is a difficult piece of music, hard for the audience to grasp, hard for the pianist, and hard for the conductor and the orchestra. Merely to say that it repays the surmounting of all the various difficulties does scant justice to it, for it is a big work, bigly conceived, and the effort required to compass it is broadening to both players and listeners. With another artist playing it the piano would most likely be one of the instruments of the orchestra, for the part is not at all designed to display technique. With the composer playing, the concerto assumes more the character of a duet, with the piano not at all subordinated, nor yet unduly exalted. Its climaxes are noble and stirring, well built up but never too long delayed nor too long drawn out. A wealth of musical ideas floods through its pages, most of them tinged a little with sadness, many of them peculiarly Slavic. As in the case of his second concerto, played last year under Mr. Rabaud, this abounds in puzzling changes of tempo, but unlike the performance last season the changes were not so neatly managed.

Stravinsky's suite "The Fire-Bird" closed the program, flooding Symphony Hall with gorgeous sound, freely giving out music of sheer beauty, unhampered by constricting forms and laws. To Mr. Monteux it was familiar work conducting this, but he must have felt, as did many of the hearers, the absence of the dancers. In music of this sort Mr. Monteux thus far has appeared to the best advantage.

N SUNDAY ADVERT

ISER, NOVEMBER 2,

Music

Rachmaninoff Fills Place of Paderewski

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE music week is always strongest at both ends, beginning with Mr. Mudgett's Sunday concert and ending with the Symphony. Mr. Mudgett's concerts are stronger than ever this season and every Sunday afternoon finds Symphony Hall crowded. Last Sunday was no exception, for Rachmaninoff in a piano recital is something to conjure with. He has filled the place that Paderewski vacated.

As Rachmaninoff was also the soloist at the Symphony concert, we may dismiss this important recital with the brief statement that the Chopin group was almost a revelation, in spite of the fact that we have so many playing at the works of this master. Such a combination of technique and poetry have not been heard since the time of De Pachmann or Paderewski. If the artist had accepted all the encores and re-encores that were demanded he would be saying still, yet he was generous in his respect. By the way, as we often hear this composer-pianist's name mis-pronounced, we may add that he flies the regular Russian rule of giving the accent on the penultimate and places the accent upon the second syllable—RachMANinoff.

Apart from this veteran's appear- there were some recitals by P

STON HERALD, SAT

NOVEMBER 1, 1919

RACHMANINOFF WILDLY CHEERED

Pianist in Impressive Performance at Fourth Symphony Concert

"QUEEN OF FRANCE" BY HAYDN SCORES

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 3 for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Stravinski, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff was the pianist.

It is a surprising fact that this orchestra played Haydn's Symphony for the first time; nor have we been able to find the record of performance by any orchestra in Boston at a public concert. Haydn's Symphonies were heard here often in the last years of the 18th century, and it is more than probable that "The Queen of France" was one of them; but there is no means of identifying any one of these Symphonies, for they were entered on the program as "Grand Symphony," "Overture" or "Full Piece."

Buelow once spoke of "The Queen of France" as "a miniature symphony to be performed in a miniature room by a miniature orchestra," and he referred sarcastilly to a performance of it by "60 fiddlers and six tooters." Now Haydn wrote "The Queen of France" for Paris, a city that was accustomed to large orchestras. He wrote it for the Concert de la Loge Olympique," a society that replaced the "Concert des Amateurs," and this orchestra numbered 40 fiddles; 12 violocellos, eight double-basses, and the usual number of wind instruments. It is not likely that "The Queen of France" was first performed by a little orchestra.

Yesterday the string section was somewhat reduced and the wood-wind was doubled. Would the symphony seem fresher, more sparkling, if it were performed in a little hall by small orchestra? We doubt it. As it was played yesterday the first movement and the trio of the Minuet gave special pleasure. The variations on the pretty French song of old time do no stray so far from the theme itself as to relieve the movement from the reproach of monotony.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his third concerto 10 years ago in New York. The performance was the first one. The prevailing mood of the music is one of sadness, a melancholy now subdued, now defiant; hardly relieved until the final outburst of hope, joy, what-you-will, by capricious episodes, as if one forced oneself to take a more sanguine view of life and then sank back, resigned to fate, or rebellious. The first movement is the most imaginative, the most impressive. We know of few first movements, if any, in the repertoire that equal it. The attention of the hearer is at once riveted; the mood is at once established. Low mutterings as of "the complaining millions of men" under a leaden sky; the sadness of it; the thought of a brooding, sinister Fate, not quite ready to deal the final blow—thus this music may be characterized without extravagance, without any laborious attempt at fine writing. The intermezzo, while it is interesting, often poetic, falls below this Allegro. Nor is the Finale, in spite of the exciting moments, the contrasting episodes and the thrilling apotheosis, equal in musical and psychological importance or in technical construction to this constantly sustained, firmly knit, inevitable first movement. Yet the two last movements in another concerto would make their irresistible way. It would be a pleasure to speak at length of the workmanship displayed, of the character of the melodic and harmonic schemes, of the skilful orchestration. The performance by the pianist was a remarkable one, remarkable even for Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and the composer were one and the same being. Thoughtful, imaginative, brilliant as this performance was, the virtuoso did not allow one to forget the music or regard it as merely an opportunity for the display of the pianist. The orchestra played as if inspired, with even more than its customary elasticity, tonal strength and beauty in solo passages and in ensemble. The great audience recalled Mr. Rachmaninoff again and again. Seldom has a pianist received so flattering a tribute in Symphony Hall.

Information in the program book about first performances of Stravinski's works was gained from contemporary French and English journals, and from supposedly authoritative annals. Yet, in some instances, this information is inaccurate. Thus there was a performance of "The Fire-Bird" in London, led by Mr. Monteux, before Rhene-Baton conducted it Mr. Monteux also conducted the first performance of "Petrouchka" in Paris and the first performance of the opera "Le Rossignol" at the Paris Opera. How the contemporary journals could be so is not easily comprehended.

Purchase has s... defeats were squarely [illegible] back to 117 [illegible]

This performance, of the suite from "The Fire-Bird" brought pleasant recollections of the ballet. To anyone that has seen this ballet, the music in concert form, however detachable it is, is less significant. On the other hand, seeing a ballet, one necessarily too often disregards the music. In this Suite the sport, the fascinating dance of the Princesses, and the charming Lullaby—which, by the way, Mr. Monteux interpolated—are the most effective as concert music. The "Danse Infernale," away from the stage, suffers the most severely of all the movements. The performance of the Suite was exceedingly brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Nov. 7, 8 is as follows: Berlioz, Symphony "Harold in Italy" (Mr. Denayer, solo viola); Chadwick, "The Angel of Death," Symphonic poem (first time here); Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque. Mme. Povla Frijsh will sing an air from Franck's "Redemption" and these songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au Voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Bloch, Psalms 137 and 114.

Boston Post Nov 1

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff Plays Own 3d Concerto First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

From the standpoint of the great majority, the dominating feature of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was the performance by the great Russian composer and virtuoso, Sergei Rachmaninoff, of his own concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor. This is the third of Mr. Rachmaninoff's piano concertos. It has been recently revised by him. His performance was a tremendous triumph. Seldom, at concerts where the audiences are normally very enthusiastic and appreciative to the point of being uncritical, has a virtuoso been given a warmer reception.

SPLENDID PIANO PART

After saying these things it may easily appear crabbed or arrogant of a reviewer to state that in his opinion the music itself is very poor stuff. But that is the case. To the best of the writer's knowledge and conviction this is the poorest of the three concertos which Mr. Rachmaninoff has written for the piano. The reason it seems to him poor is that in the first place it is very long and diffuse. Secondly, most of the ideas seem to lack strong individuality. Thirdly the form is so extended that at a first hearing anyway the music drops apart in places. Idea No. 1 does not develop and lead to idea No. 2, and so on to the end. There is much repetition, but by no means a great deal of real growth of musical thoughts and real putting together of a strong musical structure.

Of course there is a splendidly written piano part, provided you are a pianist with the strength, technic and musical authority of Mr. Rachmaninoff, and this piano part was superbly played by the composer. And there are certain effects as characteristic of certain aspects of Mr. Rachmaninoff's music as certain melodies are characteristic of Puccini. They always bring their result—frantic applause. These effects are, for example, low, dark, rich harmonies in the strings, with a solo horn sounding through; or brilliant, sweeping climaxes when the orchestra suddenly blazes out in tonal splendor; strong, persistent march rhythms, melodies of a melting Slavic, melancholy cast; episodes for brass and wood wind, rather reminding of Tschaikowsky.

Now these things sound splendidly, and if you have not heard them before they make a great impression. But in this concerto, at least, these effects are neither new nor exceptionally inspired, and those familiar with even a few of Mr. Rachmaninoff's finest compositions can hardly by any stretch of the imagination rank this third concerto, heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts, with the wonderful tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," or a lesser work, the second symphony, or even the second piano concerto, which, on the whole, appears to be a better knit and more concise work.

Mr. Rachmaninoff seems to us in his compositions to err, as a rule, on the side of over-length. This is not because he is pretentious, but because he is sincere. He has such sincerity, such conviction and absorption in what he is doing that he is probably incapable of a completely objective criticism of his own work. His shortcomings, as we believe them to be, are always those of a deeply earnest and talented man. In addition to this, he is a very commanding figure on the stage—tremendously tall, quiet in manner but powerful in aspect, with a head and a body which suggest at once prehistoric force and frame and modern intellectuality. He has personality and magnetism to a very exceptional degree, and a very different order of magnetism than that of the half-feminized, long-haired type of artist.

Triumph of Personality

It is a credit to the public of today that so simple, sincere and genuinely distinctive an individuality as Mr. Rachmaninoff should impress us all so much. He is a great musician, and if his intimates did not bear witness to it one would know him to be a great man. But sometimes a man is great in himself, and sometimes he is great in his music. Sometimes, but not always, both go together. This concerto begins very well indeed with the announcement by the piano of a theme in the nature of Russian folk-song. It ends, after a finale interminably long and full of repetitions, with a very exciting and effective crescendo. The triumph of yesterday afternoon, coldly analyzed, was not the triumph of a great piece of music. It was the triumph of a great musical personality.

The other music on the programme was a symphony by Franz Joseph Haydn, nicknamed "La Reine de France" from the unsubstantiated supposition that this symphony was a favorite of Queen Marie Antoinette. This symphony does not appear to have been played before at these concerts. It is perfectly charming; just as formal as most of Haydn's symphonies, with a fine vigorous allegro a slow movement, not too slow, with a happy little theme; a minuet with humor and gusto in it, and a rapid, gossipy finale. It was played in the most admirable manner, with the most exemplary spirit and enphony, from the Danced Story, "The Fire-Bird" ("Oiseau de Feu").

Brilliant Theatre Music

The ballet which employs this music has been repeatedly performed in Boston by the Ballet Russe. The music is a marvel of orchestral coloring and workmanship. Today, the clever use of an orchestra is commonplace. By the side of the most noted masterpieces of orchestration this music is amazing. It has, besides the atmosphere of a fairy tale, the tale of enchanted princesses in the power of the Magician Katschei, saved by the brave prince, who is given the most beautiful of the princesses for his bride.

But the music without the spectacle is difficult and in many cases disappointing. It is inextricably interwoven with color and movement on the stage. Away from the stage, one hears interesting but uninteligible episodes which would say little or nothing, if one did not know the story, Od had not the spectacle in his mind while listening. Al... very strongly indeed and at one particula... the composer, Mauri... writer; the finest mo... speaking, are the tha... the nature of a sche... Princesses Playing wit... Apples," the "Berceuse... Dance of the Princesse... there is poetic employmen... robably a Russian folk t... is grotesquerie and imagin... "I fernal Dance of Ka... j c s"; there is the elemen... and the strange in "The... the Fire-Bird," but this... sentially for the theatre... far short of its complete... concert room.

Traveler Nov 1

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon and played his own third concerto, the occasion marking its first hearing in this city. It also brought out such a display of enthusiasm as is rarely seen at a Symphony concert. The audience's greeting to the soloist was notably cordial but it paled into insignificance when compared with the outburst that greeted the conclusion of the first movement of the concerto and the outbursts that followed at every opportunity culminating in an ovation at the close of the number.

The concerto is decidedly interesting, in the composer's best vein and was given a presentation that could scarcely be bettered. Fortunate indeed was the audience to hear such a work interpreted by such a pianist and such an orchestra.

Herald Nov 2

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

As the Boston Symphony Orchestr... will be traveling on its first southern trip of the season during the comin... week, the next concerts in Boston wi... take place a week from next Frida... and Saturday, Nov. 14 and 15. Madam... Povla Frijsh, the soloist, will sing ... air from Franck's "Redemption," D... parc's "Invitation to the Journey," t... psalms by Ernest Bloch, and Mou... sorgsky's "Hopak." The program... be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Ital... Symphony, in which the viola solo, i... personating Byron's hero, weaves a co... mentary through the score as it depic... various Italian scenes of pilgrims, moun... taineers and brigands. The viola... will be played by Frederic Denayer, who... has recently come to lead the viola sec... tion from France, where he is consid... ered one of the finest musicians of his... particular instrument. Mr. Monteux will... also conduct the first American work of... the season's concerts—Chadwick's Sym... phonic Poem, "The Angel of Death" (its... first performance in Boston), and, to... close the program, Chabrier's "Bourree... Fantasque," last heard at these concerts... in 1899.

Boston Globe Nov 1

WARM GREETING TO RACHMANINOFF

Composer Assists in Own Work at the Symphony

Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite Given Admirable Interpretation

Rachmaninoff deserved the almost unprecedented applause which greeted his playing of his own Third Concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert. He not merely surmounted with ease the immense technical difficulties of the music. He proved once more that he is both a great composer and a great pianist.

This concerto is as a whole the finest work of his yet played in Boston. The first movement, especially, has all the brooding intensity which makes the opening section of his "Isle of the Dead" among the most powerful of modern compositions.

It is restrained throughout, with none of the Tschaikowsky-like outbursts of bombast which mar the latter half of that tone poem, and with no lapses into sentimentality. The whole concerto, though the later movements are not on as consistently high a level as the first, is certainly among the best ever written. It should be oftener heard, though there are few living pianists who could play it and not one who could equal the composer's own performance.

Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire-Bird," the other significant novelty on yesterday's program, sounded pale and tame after the magnificent concerto. It suffers somewhat in the concert hall from the absence of the Russian Ballet, for which the music was originally written. Stravinsky manipulates his orchestra deftly and adroitly to secure the effects he desires.

His music has a firm texture, with no ragged spots where his skill forsakes him. It is often bizarre and freakish, but never more so than the danced legend for which it is composed demands.

No wonder that younger composers nowadays are dazzled by his work as they were fascinated not long since by Debussy's. But he is only a clever and whimsical miniaturist compared with the Rachmaninoff of the Allegro ma non tanto of the Third Concerto.

Stravinsky, or at least the earlier Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird," no longer sounds ultra modern to ears attuned to the later work of Ravel and Scriabin. Mr Monteux, who has conducted performances of this music with the Ballet Russe in both London and Paris, gives an altogether admirable interpretation of it.

It is certainly surprising that Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, called "The Queen of France," should have been performed yesterday for the first time in Boston as far as available records show. One wonders how many more equally delightful works by that indefatigable symphonist lie buried in the complete editions.

The slow movement with a beautiful theme taken from an old French Romance and the spirited and playful finale have a delicacy and grace which one commonly associates with Mozart rather than with Haydn.

The performance was mellifluous rather than finely shaded. It was never dull or lifeless, but it missed some of the finer nuances of the music. Haydn in this symphony has turned courtier, but Mr Monteux sometimes let him remain a peasant. Rabaud's virtues would have suited this music, as those of Monteux suit Rachmaninoff's and Stravinsky's.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Nov 14 and 15 includes Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, songs for Mme Frijsh and unfamiliar numbers by Chadwick and Chabrier. This week's program will be repeated tonight.

Advertiser Nov 2

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts in Boston will take place a week from next Friday and Saturday, November 14 and 15. Madame Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano, will be soloist. The program will be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the first American work of the season's concerts, Chadwick's Symphonic Poem, "The Angel of Death," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Post Nov 2

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be travelling on its first Southern trip of the season during the coming week, the next concerts in Boston will take place a week from next Friday and Saturday, Nov. 14 and 15. On these occasions, Madame Povla Frijsh, the Danish soprano of vivid dramatic and interpretive ability, will be the soloist. She will sing a 17th century cantata by Tunder, Duparc's famous "Invitation to the Journey," a psalm by Ernest Bloch, the Swiss-American composer, and Moussorgsky's ever-popular "Hopak." The programme will be headed by Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which the viola solo, impersonating Byron's hero, weaves a commentary through the score as it depicts various Italian scenes of pilgrims, mountaineers and brigands. The solo part will, of course, be taken by Mr. Frederic Denayer, who has recently come to lead the viola section from France, where he is considered one of the finest musicians of his particular instrument. Mr. Monteaux will also conduct the first American work of the season's concerts — Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (its first performance in Boston), and, to close the programme, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," last heard at these concerts in 1899.

SCIENCE MONITOR,

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1,

MUSIC

Mr. Rachmaninoff in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Truly a stimulating and a novel program that Mr. Monteux set before his Friday afternoon audience at the fourth concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Stimulating in that new musical ideas were set forth, and novel in that all three numbers were heard for the first time at these concerts. Haydn's symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 85), bearing the title "The Queen of France" has somehow escaped performance through the 38 years of the orchestra, and the audiences have been the loser. There are touches in this, now of brilliancy and now of delicacy, that other and more familiar Haydn symphonies lack. The brilliancy Mr. Monteux accomplished, but the delicacy at times eluded him, as in the romance, the second movement.

The interest of the audience was plainly for Mr. Rachmaninoff, who played with the orchestra his third piano concerto in D minor, Op. 30. Here is a difficult piece of music, hard for the audience to grasp, hard for the pianist, and hard for the conductor and the orchestra. Merely to say that it repays the surmounting of all the various difficulties does scant justice to it, for it is a big work, bigly conceived, and the effort required to compass it is broadening to both players and listeners. With another artist playing it the piano would most likely be one of the instruments of the orchestra, for the part is not at all designed to display technique. With the composer playing, the concerto assumes more the character of a duet, with the piano not at all subordinated, nor yet unduly exalted. Its climaxes are noble and stirring, well built up but never too long delayed nor too long drawn out. A wealth of musical ideas floods through its pages, most of them tinged a little with sadness, many of them peculiarly Slavic. As in the case of his second concerto, played last year under Mr. Rabaud, this abounds in puzzling changes of tempo, but unlike the performance last season the changes were not so neatly managed.

Stravinsky's suite "The Fire-Bird" closed the program, flooding Symphony Hall with gorgeous sound, freely giving out music of sheer beauty, unhampered by constricting forms and laws. To Mr. Monteux it was familiar work conducting this, but he must have felt, as did many of the hearers, the absence of the dancers. In music of this sort Mr. Monteux thus far has appeared to the best advantage.

SUNDAY ADVERT

ISER, NOVEMBER 2,

Music

Rachmaninoff Fills Place of Paderewski

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE music week is always strongest at both ends, beginning with Mr. Mudgett's Sunday concert and ending with the Symphony. Mr. Mudgett's concerts are stronger than ever this season and every Sunday afternoon finds Symphony Hall crowded. Last Sunday was no exception, for Rachmaninoff in a piano recital is something to conjure with. He has filled the place that Paderewski vacated.

As Rachmaninoff was also the soloist at the Symphony concert, we may dismiss this important recital with the brief statement that the Chopin group was almost a revelation, in spite of the fact that we have so many playing at the works of this master. Such a combination of technique and poetry have not been heard since the time of De Pachmann or Paderewski. If the artist had accepted all the encores and re-encores that were demanded he would be playing still, yet he was generous in his respect. By the way, as we often hear this composer-pianist's name mis-pronounced, we may add that he flies the regular Russian rule of giving the accent on the penultimate and places the accent upon the second syllable—RachMANinoff.

Apart from this veteran's appear... there were some recitals by

Boston Post Nov 2

ARE MUSICIANS TELEPATHIC?

Messrs. Monteux and Damrosch Plan to Attack Sameness in Programmes by an Open Entente — The German Opera Fiasco in New York

What is the mania which mysteriously communicates itself from soul to soul, and leads all pianists to choose for their principal war horse in one season the C-sharp minor Scherzo of Chopin, or all conductors in another season to elect to play Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, or every singer to sing as an encore Mrs. H. H. Beach's "Years at the Spring"?

No one knows. It must be mental telepathy. At any rate, we have at last in two conductors, Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony and Mr. Walter Damrosch of the New York Symphony Orchestra, two honest men who propose to put an end to the war twixt Tweedledum and Tweedle-dee and submit questions of programmes to publicity and arbitration rather than to rivalry and secret diplomacy. In other words, if it is known that Mr. Monteux is going to play a certain work by Claude Debussy next time the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits New York and Mr. Damrosch is notified, he will not take pains to play this particular work at the New York Symphony concert of two days previous. It is a pity that more of this spirit cannot be developed between musicians and prima donnas. Did you ever hear of a prima donna purchasing a dress from a very expensive and famous dressmaker in Paris and perceiving three months later the picture of a rival prima donna, about to give a concert in Oshkosh, attired in that same dress? We have, but that is another story.

Post Nov 2

Boston Musical Association Will Give 1st Concert Dec. 15

The American composer, as it would seem by all the tokens of the times, is coming into his own by leaps and bounds these days. No doubt the agitation going forward on every hand in his favor is largely owing to the war and to the impetus which war has given to many kinds of musical developments in this country. But one of the most important incentives to American composers hereabouts is to be found in the announcements of the plans of the Boston Music Association, founded and directed by Georges Longy, and the programmes of the five concerts to be given by this association, Mr. Longy conductor, this season.

The Organization

The Boston Musical Association, rather discreditably to the artistic enterprise of Americans, is an idea evolved by a Frenchman in our midst. Mr. Longy is not only active as the distinguished first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but also as the head of a music school and of the Longy Club or wind instruments, conductor of the MacDowell Club and of other orchestral concerts in the past in Boston. He has now perfected the organization of a small orchestra of young musicians of Boston and the vicinity who will rehearse and perform on the basis of equal division of profits of the concerts, if such there are, added to the advantages of experience under Mr. Longy's baton, and the opportunity for the most talented players to appear as soloists. Finally as a crowning feature of his plan Mr. Longy will have appointed a committee of composers to pass by vote on American compositions which will be placed on the programmes of the concerts of the association.

"Already some interesting scores have been submitted," said Mr. Longy, "but the thing I miss is this: Short compositions in the smaller forms, well and unpretentiously made, and especially suitable to an orchestra of the modest proportions and resources of the Boston Musical Association. Young composers of all lands are inclined to be overambitious and portentous in their early works."

Short Pieces Wanted

There was a twinkle in his eye. "Let them not try too much," he said. "If they wrote a short piece of 20 minutes or so, like—well, say like Dukas' 'L'Apprenti sorcier'—that will be well enough to start. Or 'L'Apres midi d'un Faun' of Debussy. That is not very long. Length is not the thing. Nor is weight the consideration. Let only a musical idea, and then set to work without self-consciousness to develop it clearly and well, with not too many instruments in the score. It is such things which count, and teach a composer of talent his business, perhaps quicker than the hour long symphony or symphonic poem in which neither ideas nor technic are equal to the length of the work and the number of instruments employed. Composers need not be afraid of being simple. Let them only compose naturally and do things within their reach. They will find far more time than they think they have, in later years, to attempt 'colossal' masterpieces."

First Programme

The first programme of the Boston Musical Association, which will be given in Jordan Hall, Dec. 15, is one which shows clearly the nature of the concerts (two orchestral and three concerts of chamber music) which Mr. Longy has devised. First will come a suite, simple and charming, from the music of the 18th Century Rameau, created for his opera, "Castor et Pollux." One of the players of the orchestra will then appear as soloist in the performance of Beethoven's "Romance in F" with orchestra. Following this, a work little known will be three short pieces for string orchestra with a few wind instruments by Maurice Ravel.

Georges Longy, founder and director of the Boston Musical Association.

The first piece, which calls for strings without double basses, with flutes and clarinets, is dedicated to Igor Strawinsky. The matter is interesting because of the semblance of the thought to the music of Strawinsky's "Fire-Bird" ballet, and because Strawinsky once complained to a friend in Paris that Ravel had stolen much of his thunder. Might it not be the other way around? Has not Strawinsky learned much from Ravel? The modern Frenchman and the modern Russian appear to confront each other in this composition. Its title, like the other two, for it is inspired by poetry of Stephan Mallarme, is "Soupir"; that of the second, "Placet Futile"; that of the third, "Swigi de la croupe et du bond." The second piece is dedicated to Florent Schmitt, and the third, which should be fantastical enough, is dedicated to that arch 'fantaisiste," Erik Satie!

Following these compositions will come an American work and Saint-Saens' witty waltz-caprice, "The Wedding Cake."

Future Concerts

At one of the chamber concerts of the Boston Musical Association later in the season the Salzedo harp ensemble, led by the distinguished harpist, Carlos Salzedo, now of New York, will play. Compositions by Salzedo, by Turina and by Thirion will figure on the chamber music programmes of the association.

Mr. Longy is much gratified by the response to his project on the part of talented young musicians of Boston. These have come to him often at considerable effort and time and are showing every willingness for arduous work in order to achieve genuinely artistic standards in the new series of concerts to be given. Miss Gertrude Marshall will be concertmaster of the orchestra. Mrs. Golden will lead the viola section, and Miss L'Africale will be first 'cellist —all players well and favorably known in Boston. A few Boston Symphony players will be engaged to assist at the concerts. The orchestra of the first concert will be principally strings, with a few wood wind instruments. At the last concert the compositions performed will be more pretentious than those of the first, and the full orchestra will be used. A generous measure of public support is already promised this interesting enterprise.

MONTEUX APPROVES POST'S SUGGESTION

The proposal of the Boston Post, made last week in these columns, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, give private hearings of new works by young American composers at intervals during the musical season, has met with a warm response from Mr. Monteux.

He will make every endeavor to institute a series of such private concerts after the beginning of the new year, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have opportunity to determine the dates, if this is humanly possible, of additions to a concert schedule which is already the most crowded in the history of the orchestra. The number of concerts given by the Boston Symphony this season will be greater than ever before, as the attendance, in every city, promises to surpass that of any winter the orchestra has known.

FAVORS PLAN

"Nevertheless," said Mr. Monteux, when shown the Post article, "I am so heartily in favor of this plan to help native composers by giving them an opportunity of hearing their compositions in actual performance that in spite of an overpowering amount of work before us I shall make a special effort to give a limited number of such hearings in the spring and more of them during the season of 1920-21. The Post suggestion, arising from the private concerts of American compositions which Mr. Stock is going to give with the Chicago Orchestra, is practically the embodiment of a plan I had already in mind for Boston, and one which I had perfected with my orchestra in Paris when the war put a stop to everything.

"I then intended to have my orchestra play privately new scores of young French musicians. The critic Vuillermoz and others of the press, as well as musicians of the capital, were disposed to give all possibe assistance in this plan. I think it is an ideal work for an orchestra to do, consistently, of course, with its primary duties to the great public. Our first duty is obviously a twenty-four programme, as interestingly made and as well performed as possible, for the Symphony Hall audiences in Boston, the same preparations for Cambridge and for many of the principal cities of America which we visited on tour. You may believe that this is no small thing. But, granted the accomplishment of the public concerts, I think a next step is for a great orchestra to give all possible assistance to young native composers, particularly when a way is found of doing this without it being necessary to perform immature compositions before the public."

Private Concerts

The general plan contemplated by Mr. Monteux will be to give from two to four private performances of manuscript compositions by Americans between January and May 1; to invite to these concerts the composers who have submitted scores for Monteux's approval and a few friends of the composers and guests of the orchestra. The compositions will then be read through by the Boston Symphony players and the composer will have the benefit of hearing his own music played by one of the finest orchestras in the world. This invaluable experience will cost him nothing, and if he has produced a work which, in the opinion of Mr. Manteux and other musicians, merits public hearing it will be given at the regular Symphony concerts. As the Post remarked last season, young American composers, who have otherwise no chances of experience in writing symphonic music for a big orchestra, will find at last the opportunity of orchestral experiment, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will become more than ever an agent of musical development and creative art in the community.

Transcript Mon. Nov. 3 normal way.

Haydn and Mr. Monteux

Not in vain did the Stravinsky of the suite from "The Fire-Bird" address himself through Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra to their more courteous, cultivated and responsive audience of Saturday evening. It heard the music from beginning to end without a single departure; it was manifestly interested and stirred; it lingered even to clap warmly both piece and performance. Not in vain, after all, had conductor and orchestra risked a venture that in itself, as well in the accomplishment, applauded them. True, Mr. Rakhmaninov and his concerto were yet more acclaimed—inevitably before the impressive presence, the encompassing power of the composer as pianist. As such he not only sways an audience; he also invigorates and glamors many a page of a concerto that at another's hands might seem—but it was Mr. Rakhmaninov who played it. Even Haydn of the thin, pretty, neat little symphony, "The Queen of France," lacked not his meed of plaudits. Discreetly, Mr. Monteux reduced his orchestra even in the string choirs; but try as he might the volume of tone remained too heavy, the rhythms and accents too sharp for this tinkling playful chamber-music. It even asks a lighter hand, a more delicate fancy, a finer musical intuition than the conductor brought to it. Time and again he solidified the tone, squared the march of the music. For the first time in the course of the concerts Mr. Monteux was distinctly below his opportunity.

H. T. PARKER

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 26 1919

At the first concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 3, the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist. He will be heard in the Liszt First Concerto in E flat. At this concert Pierre Monteux will appear for the first time here as the new regular conductor of the orchestra, altho he conducted the first Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season. The program will begin with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." Two numbers from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creature of Prometheus," will follow; the overture, and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments: 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian Ballet. The music is arranged as a symphonic suite in six parts.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 3, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, provide a program of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, has chosen Liszt's famous and scintillant first concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's only ballet, "The Creature of Prometheus," the overture, and the fifth ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp. Finally the orchestra will play Stravinsky's danced Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet. The music is arranged as a symphonic suite in six parts.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

OCT 26 1919

Orchestras Avoid Duplication.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are perhaps the first of a number to feel the benefits of a closer union between the various orchestras in the matter of arrangement of programmes. Through an exchange of programmes it was found that both orchestras were planning to give d'Indy's Third Symphony, a war composition, during the Boston Symphony's visit in New York. Monteux withdrew the number from his New York programme, but he had the distinction of introducing the work for the first time in America as other conductors who have announced their intention of sponsoring the composition found their plans spoiled by its appearance on the programme of the Boston Symphony yesterday.

From American
Baltimore, M

OCT 26 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5 (for which seats will be placed on sale tomorrow at Albaugh's ticket agency), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, have between them arranged a program of strik-

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date A OCT 2

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Orchestra to Give Five Concerts in Providence

By every indication of opening in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has entered upon one of the most brilliant seasons in its history. The orchestra has virtually the same illustrious personnel, save in the acquisition of a notable viola player and 'cellist who have come from France to lead the respective string sections. Pronounced and general enthusiasm is expressed in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has wrought for the first concerts. For several of the cities in which the majority of the season's concerts will be given (the total number scheduled is 110), the seats for all concerts are sold out in advance by subscription. In Providence, where the series will take place on the five Tuesday evenings of Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6, in Infantry Hall as usual, the sale of subscription tickets will open to-morrow at Seddon's newstand, Butler Exchange.

Pierre Monteux, it will be remembered, was offered the regular conductorship last year, but could not relinquish his existing engagement as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, except temporarily, when he led the opening concerts of the symphony season, though not in Providence.

He has collected not only French, Russian and Italian, but a number of American scores. However, he does not believe in exclusions, and he will bar neither Wagner nor any composer which public opinion desires. Above all, he will do full justice to the great symphonists of the past.

It would surely be hard to find in this country five singers and players more noted and more representative than those who are engaged to appear as soloists at each of these concerts.

Sophie Braslau, the rising young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has won an enviable place among our singers. The vibrant and rich beauty of her tones is further enhanced by the charm of her presence.

Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone, will doubtless be eagerly welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts by those who admire his mellow voice and his distinctive interpretive powers in recital. The opera arias of his repertory will of course take an intenser dramatic and emotional value when heard with great orchestra.

The musicianship of Jean Bedetti was known here only by hearsay until he came from France at the beginning of this season to lead the violoncello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since Sergei Rachmaninoff took the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, the phenomenal pianist will surely be welcomed by Providence in this capacity.

Albert Spalding, the young violinist of fast rising fame, forfeited a whole season of engagements in 1916 to offer his full services to his country. He was commissioned a lieutenant of the A. E. F. in Italy, and did active service in the Aviation Corps. Subsequently he surprised Rome, Paris and London by his brilliant playing. When he played Dvorak's Concerto as the first soloist of the Boston Symphony season in Boston a week ago, his talents were generally found to have a new and engrossing beauty.

om.....

dress New York City

te..... OCT 30

One of the numbers on the Saturday afternoon programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next week is the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's "danced legend," "The Bird of Fire." The six numbers are in this order: I. Introduction: Kastchei's Enchanted Garden, and Dance of the Bird of Fire. II. Supplications of the Bird of Fire. III. (a). The Princesses Play with Golden Apples. III (b). Berceuse. IV. The Princesses dance in a Circle. V. Diabolical dance by all the Subjects of Kastchei. Mr. Monteux conducted this brilliant and daring music, and "The Afternoon of a Faun" for performance by the Russian Ballet.

Boston Post Nov 2

ARE MUSICIANS TELEPATHIC?

Messrs. Monteux and Damrosch Plan to Attack Sameness in Programmes by an Open Entente — The German Opera Fiasco in New York

What is the mania which mysteriously communicates itself from soul to soul, and leads all pianists to choose for their principal war horse in one season the C-sharp minor Scherzo of Chopin, or all conductors in another season to elect to play Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, or every singer to sing as an encore Mrs. H. H. Beach's "Years at the Spring"?

No one knows. It must be mental telepathy. At any rate, we have at last in two conductors, Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony and Mr. Walter Damrosch of the New York Symphony Orchestra, two honest men who propose to put an end to the war twixt Tweedledum and Tweedle-dee and submit questions of programmes to publicity and arbitration rather than to rivalry and secret diplomacy. In other words, if it is known that Mr. Monteux is going to play a certain work by Claude Debussy next time the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits New York and Mr. Damrosch is notified, he will not take pains to play this particular work at the New York Symphony concert of two days previous. It is a pity that more of this spirit cannot be developed between musicians and prima donnas. Did you ever hear of a prima donna purchasing a dress from a very expensive and famous dressmaker in Paris and perceiving three months later the picture of a rival prima donna, about to give a concert in Oshkosh, attired in that same dress? We have, but that is another story.

Post Nov 2

Boston Musical Association Will Give 1st Concert Dec. 15

The American composer, as it would seem by all the tokens of the times, is coming into his own by leaps and bounds these days. No doubt the agitation going forward on every hand in his favor is largely owing to the war and to the impetus which war has given to many kinds of musical developments in this country. But one of the most important incentives to American composers hereabouts is to be found in the announcements of the plans of the Boston Music Association, founded and directed by Georges Longy, and the programmes of the five concerts to be given by this association, Mr. Longy conductor, this season.

The Organization

The Boston Musical Association, rather discreditably to the artistic enterprise of Americans, is an idea evolved by a Frenchman in our midst. Mr. Longy is not only active as the distinguished first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but also as the head of a music school and of the Longy Club or wind instruments, conductor of the MacDowell Club and of other orchestral concerts in the past in Boston. He has now perfected the organization of a small orchestra of young musicians of Boston and the vicinity who will rehearse and perform on the basis of equal division of profits of the concerts, if such there are, added to the advantages of experience under Mr. Longy's baton, and the opportunity for the most talented players to appear as soloists. Finally as a crowning feature of his plan Mr. Longy will have appointed a committee of composers to pass by vote on American compositions which will be placed on the programmes of the concerts of the association.

"Already some interesting scores have been submitted," said Mr. Longy, "but the thing I miss is this: Short compositions in the smaller forms, well and unpretentiously made, and especially suitable to an orchestra of the modest proportions and resources of the Boston Musical Association. Young composers of all lands are inclined to be overambitious and portentous in their early works."

Short Pieces Wanted

There was a twinkle in his eye. "Let them not try too much," he said. "If they wrote a short piece of 20 minutes or so, like—well, say like Dukas' 'L'Apprenti sorcier'—that will be well enough to start. Or 'L'Apres midi d'un Faun' of Debussy. That is not very long. Length is not the thing. Nor is weight the consideration. Let only a young composer have in mind a definite, musical idea, and then set to work without self-consciousness to develop it clearly and well, with not too many instruments in the score. It is such things which count, and teach a composer of talent his business, perhaps quicker than the hour long symphony or symphonic poem in which neither ideas nor technic are equal to the length of the work and the number of instruments employed. Composers need not be afraid of being simple. Let them only compose naturally and do things within their reach. They will find far more time than they think they have, in later years, to attempt 'colossal' masterpieces."

First Programme

The first programme of the Boston Musical Association, which will be given in Jordan Hall, Dec. 15, is one which shows clearly the nature of the concerts (two orchestral and three concerts of chamber music) which Mr. Longy has devised. First will come a suite, simple and charming, from the music of the 18th Century Rameau, created for his opera, "Castor et Pollux." One of the players of the orchestra will then appear as soloist in the performance of Beethoven's "Romance in F" with orchestra. Following this, a work little known will be three short pieces for string orchestra with a few wind instruments by Maurice Ravel.

Georges Longy, founder and director of the Boston Musical Association.

The first piece, which calls for strings without double basses, with flutes and clarinets, is dedicated to Igor Strawinsky. The matter is interesting because of the semblance of the thought to the music of Strawinsky's "Fire-Bird" ballet, and because Strawinsky once complained to a friend in Paris that Ravel had stolen much of his thunder. Might it not be the other way around? Has not Strawinsky learned much from Ravel? The modern Frenchman and the modern Russian appear to confront each other in this composition. Its title, like the other two, for it is inspired by poetry of Stephan Mallarme, is "Soupir"; that of the second, "Placet Futile"; that of the third, "Swigi de la croupe et du bond." The second piece is dedicated to Florent Schmitt, and the third, which should be fantastical enough, is dedicated to that arch 'fantaisiste," Erik Satie!

Following these compositions will come an American work and Saint-Saens' witty waltz-caprice, "The Wedding Cake."

Future Concerts

At one of the chamber concerts of the Boston Musical Association later in the season the Salzedo harp ensemble, led by the distinguished harpist, Carlos Salzedo, now of New York, will play. Compositions by Salzedo, by Turina and by Thirion will figure on the chamber music programmes of the association.

Mr. Longy is much gratified by the response to his project on the part of talented young musicians of Boston. These have come to him often at considerable effort and time and are showing every willingness for arduous work in order to achieve genuinely artistic standards in the new series of concerts to be given. Miss Gertrude Marshall will be concertmaster of the orchestra. Mrs. Golden will lead the viola section, and Miss L'Africaie will be first 'cellist—all players well and favorably known in Boston. A few Boston Symphony players will be engaged to assist at the concerts. The orchestra of the first concert will be principally strings, with a few wood wind instruments. At the last concert the compositions performed will be more pretentious than those of the first, and the full orchestra will be used. A generous measure of public support is already promised this interesting enterprise.

MONTEUX APPROVES POST'S SUGGESTION

The proposal of the Boston Post, made last week in these columns, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, give private hearings of new works by young American composers at intervals during the musical season, has met with a warm response from Mr. Monteux.

He will make every endeavor to institute a series of such private concerts after the beginning of the new year, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have opportunity to determine the dates, if this is humanly possible, of additions to a concert schedule which is already the most crowded in the history of the orchestra. The number of concerts given by the Boston Symphony this season will be greater than ever before, as the attendance, in every city, promises to surpass that of any winter the orchestra has known.

FAVORS PLAN

"Nevertheless," said Mr. Monteux, when shown the Post article, "I am so heartily in favor of this plan to help native composers by giving them an opportunity of hearing their compositions in actual performance that in spite of an overpowering amount of work before us I shall make a special effort to give a limited number of such hearings in the spring and more of them during the season of 1920-21. The Post suggestion, arising from the private concerts of American compositions which Mr. Stock is going to give with the Chicago Orchestra, is practically the embodiment of a plan I had already in mind for Boston, and one which I had perfected with my orchestra in Paris when the war put a stop to everything.

"I then intended to have my orchestra play privately new scores of young French musicians. The critic Vuillermoz and others of the press, as well as musicians of the capital, were disposed to give all possibe assistance in this plan. I think it is an ideal work for an orchestra to do, consistently, of course, with its primary duties to the great public. Our first duty is obviously a twenty-four programme, as interestingly made and as well performed as possible, for the Symphony Hall audiences in Boston, the same preparations for Cambridge and for many of the principal cities of America which we visited on tour. You may believe that this is no small thing. But, granted the accomplishment of the public concerts, I think a next step is for a great orchestra to give all possible assistance to young native composers, particularly when a way is found of doing this without it being necessary to perform immature compositions before the public."

Private Concerts

The general plan contemplated by Mr. Monteux will be to give from two to four private performances of manuscript compositions by Americans between January and May 1; to invite to these concerts the composers who have submitted scores for Monteux's approval and a few friends of the composers and guests of the orchestra. The compositions will then be read through by the Boston Symphony players and the composer will have the benefit of hearing his own music played by one of the finest orchestras in the world. This invaluable experience will cost him nothing, and if he has produced a work which, in the opinion of Mr. Manteux and other musicians, merits public hearing it will be given at the regular Symphony concerts. As the Post remarked last season, young American composers, who have otherwise no chances of experience in writing symphonic music for a big orchestra, will find at last the opportunity of orchestral experiment, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will become more than ever an agent of musical development and creative art in the community.

Transcript Nov. No. 3

normal way.

Haydn and Mr. Monteux

Not in vain did the Stravinsky of the suite from "The Fire-Bird" address himself through Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra to their more courteous, cultivated and responsive audience of Saturday evening. It heard the music from beginning to end without a single departure; it was manifestly interested and stirred; it lingered even to clap warmly both piece and performance. Not in vain, after all, had conductor and orchestra risked a venture that in itself, as well in the accomplishment, applauded them. True, Mr. Rakhmaninov and his concerto were yet more acclaimed—inevitably before the impressive presence, the encompassing power of the composer as pianist. As such he not only sways an audience; he also invigorates and glamors many a page of a concerto that at another's hands might seem—but it was Mr. Rakhmaninov who played it. Even Haydn of the thin, pretty, neat little symphony, "The Queen of France," lacked not his meed of plaudits. Discreetly, Mr. Monteux reduced his orchestra even in the string choirs; but try as he might the volume of tone remained too heavy, the rhythms and accents too sharp for this tinkling playful chamber-music. It even asks a lighter hand, a more delicate fancy, a finer musical intuition than the conductor brought to it. Time and again he solidified the tone, squared the march of the music. For the first time in the course of the concerts Mr. Monteux was distinctly below his opportunity.

H. T. PARKER

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 26 1919

At the first concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 3, the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist. He will be heard in the Liszt First Concerto in E flat. At this concert Pierre Monteux will appear for the first time here as the new regular conductor of the orchestra, altho he conducted the first Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season. The program will begin with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." Two numbers from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," will follow; the overture, and the Fifth Ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments: cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp. Finally, Mr. Monteux will play Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian Ballet. The music is arranged as a symphonic suite in six parts.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 3, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, provide a program of marked diversity and interest. The brilliant Russian pianist, has chosen Liszt's famous and scintillant first concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Schumann's buoyant First Symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring Symphony." He will do homage to Beethoven by reviving two numbers from the master's only ballet, "The Creature of Prometheus," the overture, and the fifth ballet, an adagio for five solo instruments, 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp. Finally the orchestra will play Stravinsky's Danced Legend, "The Bird of Fire," of which he was the famous interpreter when he conducted the Russian ballet. The music is arranged as a symphonic suite in six parts.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

OCT 1919

Orchestras Avoid Duplication.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are perhaps the first of a number to feel the benefits of a closer union between the various orchestras in the matter of arrangement of programmes. Through an exchange of programmes it was found that both orchestras were planning to give d'Indy's Third Symphony, a war composition, during the Boston Symphony's visit in New York. Monteux withdrew the number from his New York programme, but he had the distinction of introducing the work for the first time in America as other conductors who have announced their intention of sponsoring the composition found their plans spoiled by its appearance on the programme of the Boston Symphony yesterday.

From American
Baltimore, M

OCT 2 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 5 (for which seats will be placed on sale tomorrow at Albaugh's ticket agency), Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist, have between them arranged a program of strik-

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date A OCT 2

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Orchestra to Give Five Concerts in Providence

By every indication of opening in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has entered upon one of the most brilliant seasons in its history. The orchestra has virtually the same illustrious personnel, save in the acquisition of a notable viola player and 'cellist who have come from France to lead the respective string sections. Pronounced and general enthusiasm is expressed in the results which Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has wrought for the first concerts. For several of the cities in which the majority of the season's concerts will be given (the total number scheduled is 110), the seats for all concerts are sold out in advance by subscription. In Providence, where the series will take place on the five Tuesday evenings of Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6, in Infantry Hall as usual, the sale of subscription tickets will open to-morrow at Seddon's newstand, Butler Exchange.

Pierre Monteux, it will be remembered, was offered the regular conductorship last year, but could not relinquish his existing engagement as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, except temporarily, when he led the opening concerts of the symphony season, though not in Providence.

He has collected not only French, Russian and Italian, but a number of American scores. However, he does not believe in exclusions, and he will bar neither Wagner nor any composer which public opinion desires. Above all, he will do full justice to the great symphonists of the past.

It would surely be hard to find in this country five singers and players more noted and more representative than those who are engaged to appear as soloists at each of these concerts.

Sophie Braslau, the rising young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has won an enviable place among our singers. The vibrant and rich beauty of her tones is further enhanced by the charm of her presence.

Emilio de Gogorza, the exceedingly popular Spanish-American baritone, will doubtless be eagerly welcomed as a new soloist with these concerts by those who admire his mellow voice and his distinctive interpretive powers in recital. The opera arias of his repertory will of course take an intenser dramatic and emotional value when heard with great orchestra.

The musicianship of Jean Bedetti was known here only by hearsay until he came from France at the beginning of this season to lead the violoncello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since Sergei Rachmaninoff took the lion's share of the applause among the soloists of last season at the Boston Symphony concerts, the phenomenal pianist will surely be welcomed by Providence in this capacity.

Albert Spalding, the young violinist of fast rising fame, forfeited a whole season of engagements in 1916 to offer his full services to his country. He was commissioned a lieutenant of the A. E. F. in Italy, and did active service in the Aviation Corps. Subsequently he surprised Rome, Paris and London by his brilliant playing. When he played Dvorak's Concerto as the first soloist of the Boston Symphony season in Boston a week ago, his talents were generally found to have a new and engrossing beauty.

om.....

dress New York City

te.....

One of the numbers on the Saturday afternoon programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next week is the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's "danced legend," "The Bird of Fire." The six numbers are in this order: I. Introduction: Kastchei's Enchanted Garden, and Dance of the Bird of Fire. II. Supplications of the Bird of Fire. III ,(a). The Princesses Play with Golden Apples. III (b). Berceuse. IV. The Princesses dance in a Circle. V. Diabolical dance by all the Subjects of Kastchei. Mr. Monteux conducted this brilliant and daring music, and "The Afternoon of a Faun" for performance by the Russian Ballet.

Lyric..... Josef Rosenblatt in recital Tuesday evening. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist, Wednesday evening.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

BESIDES the two works of exceptional interest which will constitute the first part of the opening Boston Symphony programme of the season, to be performed at the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening — Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3), which the great Russian composer-pianist will play with the orchestra—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will produce for the first time in concert here a Suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian Ballet, is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theatre.

Paris had not yet heard "The Rites of Spring"; they had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore Mr. Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. At the end of the piece Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage and the enthusiasts carried the day.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF AT THE LYRIC NOV 5TH

RACHMANINOFF
The Famous Pianist Who Will Be Soloist At The Opening Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N.Y.
NOV - 2 1919

INSTITUTE OFFERINGS

Two Chamber Organizations and Boston Symphony This Week.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for Friday evening. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony and orchestral suite in four parts by the Roumanian Enesco. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the assisting soloist, will devote his attention to Liszt's E-flat Concerto for piano and orchestra.

EVENING SUN
New York City
NOV - 1 1919

The opening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, follows: Schumann, "Spring" Symphony No. 1; Beethoven, overture and adagio from the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, Suite for Orchestra. For the Saturday matinee Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France"; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, suite from "The Fire Bird."

How An Orchestra Rehearses

"MR. MONTEUX did not come to us as a stranger this year," explained a veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "He knows the orchestra thoroughly and the orchestra knows him far better than the public does, for he drilled us through an arduous preparatory period last autumn when there was a considerable change in the personnel.

"Indeed, we know his ways very well. At the first rehearsal then the acoustical difference caused by the hard, empty seats of the auditorium, which send the echoes clattering around, troubled him immediately. So he asked that a curtain be hung in front of the stage, reaching from floor to roof. It has hung at each of his rehearsals since, absorbing the sound and replacing the auditors of Fridays and Saturdays, who probably little realize that they make the music mellow by their physical presence.

"Mr. Monteux is pleasant spoken always, but no conductor has been more rigorously exacting than he. Musicians don't like to be interrupted after every few bars, but no other method will make for results minutely perfect. After thus picking a piece entirely to pieces, Mr. Monteux will open his score the following morning, lead us right through it, and then harangue us about those passages which have not gone precisely to his wish.

"To have power over his men a conductor needs two things: their respect and their confidence. If he is adroit in giving cues, if his ear misses nothing, if he knows to a hair's breadth what he wants and how to get what he wants with the least drain upon the nerves and time of 100 waiting musicians, then respect and confidence are a matter of course. Mr. Monteux's alert ear is a thing to wonder at, nor has he traveled the world over training concerts, operas and ballets without perfecting the art of routine to the Nth degree.

"Before he lifted his baton for the first rehearsal this season he greeted us by saying, 'We shall not need to work so long this year as last.' But there were eight rehearsals before the first concert. I am sure the layman doesn't begin to realize what is required of us. He may imagine that the purpose of a rehearsal is to learn how to play a piece. That is not so. For instance, our first three rehearsals were spent in reading off at sight piece after piece of new music, some of it highly difficult, for the purpose of trying them out. A chance hearer might have regarded those as finished performances. And so they were, but the public performances of the symphony orchestra must be super-finished. To read the most difficult scores at sight is with us the starting point. When we rehearse we merely accustom ourselves to the conductor's shades of stress and balance and tempo, which constitute his personal interpretation. We familiarize ourselves with the music in hand so that we can free ourselves from the effort of reading, so that it can flow with ease from our instruments, so that we can be as instantaneously sensitive to the leader's slender stick as a flicker of light. In other words, a symphony rehearsal means simply a last polish—a final touching up. Except that nothing but familiarity will enable the music to lift the players out of themselves and carry them on its current.

"No, we do not practice our parts at home. In the first place, we do not need to, and in the second place, we would not have the time. Before a violinist is admitted into this orchestra he must play a concerto of his own choice for the conductor, and he must read at sight the violin part of any orchestral score that is put before him. As a matter of fact, I could cite a hundred orchestral passages that are more difficult than any concerto. Debussy's 'Nocturnes,' Ravel's 'Daphnis,' Schmitt's 'Salome' have pages to appall a merely passable violinist. The lightning descent of the strings at the climax of 'Death and Transfiguration' must be made by 30 musicians as one man, and places similarly difficult could be named in any of Strauss' works. A modern composer knows what musicians can do and he exacts the utmost from them. Enesco scores for the violin as for his illustrious self; even Tschaikowsky wrote high configurations in the first movement of his 'Pathetic' Symphony which would be the despair of anyone less than a genuine virtuoso. That is what every player in the symphony orchestra must be—a genuine virtuoso.

"The double-bass player in a theatre, see-sawing sleepily between tonic and dominant, has an easy time of it. The double-basses in a symphony orchestra must execute swift runs—they must be at the top and bottom of their unwieldly instrument at once; as often as not their parts are melodies in unison with the 'cellos.

The New York Concert League announces that the second of the popular priced orchestral concerts given by Arnold Volpe and his Symphony Orchestra of 100 will take place at the New York Hippodrome this afternoon. John Powell, the foremost American composer pianist, and Bernard Woolff, the celebrated tenor, have been engaged as soloists. Mr. Powell is beloved by the American public and at this concert Mr. Volpe will present Mr. Powell's own concerto for piano and orchestra.

THE BALTI

14 Sunday, Nov. 2, 1919

Music and Musicians

Rachmaninoff And Boston Symphony

Two notable features are in store for the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night—the performance of Rachmaninoff's new concerto for piano and orchestra (his third work in this form) to be played by the great Russian himself, and a suite arranged from Stravinsky's "Oiseau de Feu," the ballet which made such a profound impression when the dreadfully overrated Nijinsky and his company did it a couple of years ago.

As Pierre Monteux, the director of the Boston Symphony, conducted the Ballet Russe, nobody is in a better position, perhaps, to present this extraordinary music than he.

Rachmaninoff, during the last few years, has risen to a forward place among contemporaneous composers and virtuosi. He returned to this country early in the war and at that time had nothing even remotely approaching a vogue, though his reputation was well established. His extraordinary temperament, however, and his magnificent playing reawakened interest in him and in a surprisingly short time he was at the height of fame.

His seems to be a personality that is curiously remote and detached, almost with something forbiddingly austere about it. Yet what passion glows in his music, what vast emotional resources are disclosed by it!

John McCormack's Wide

Sergei Rachmaninoff

Sergei Rachmaninoff will play own new concerto for piano and chestra at the opening concert of season by the Boston Orchestra u Pierre Monteux's direction at Lyric next Wednesday night.

Yes, Sousa is quite good enough for us; and as for Bach's "Saint Matthew Passion," with the aid of conductors never interned or deported, we shall enjoy many performances of that mighty masterpiece which breathes no thought of Teutonism but voices only the spirit of the Protestant faith.

is true that Mr. Sousa conducts a military concert band, not a symphonic orchestra. It is also true that he has composed chiefly marches, such as "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which has a remarkably comforting sound to ears incapable of delighting in "Deutschland uber Alles."

It is furthermore a fact that during the war Sousa built up a monster musical organization known as the Great Lakes Training Station Band, which lightened many hours of toil devoted to preparing gallant young Americans for the business of chasing the elusive U-boat, a business in which many of them were brilliantly successful.

Sat Nov 1

HE BALTIMORE NEWS

THE TRUTH ABOUT DR. MUCK

How The Musical Expert Of Department Of Justice Discovered Code.

(From the New York Sun.)

At last the secret is out. Dr. Muck, the distinguished German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the welcoming arms of Berlin, has told the world that his heinous offense against these United States, for which he was subjected to 16 months of comfortable internment, was the preparation of a score of Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to Saint Matthew" without cuts. This score, he declares, was pronounced by musical experts of the Department of Justice to be a code used in communication with the Berlin Foreign Office, in which, curiously enough, Dr. Muck was employed just before his return to this country.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The story has a singularly familiar flavor. Musicians have, on several occasions, been arrested for having suspicious musical manuscripts in their possession.

However, Dr. Muck is back in the right place. He has conveniently forgotten the years of favor which he enjoyed here, and now regards us as a nation of musical barbarians. We have lost Muck, but we still have Sousa, and, as the urbane doctor remarks, he is good enough for us. It

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 1

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra der the direction of its new cond Pierre Monteux, will give the first current season's concerts at the on Wednesday evening, Novemb when the symphony will be the heard "La Reine de France" sym of Haydn, the one in B-flat major terest centers, however, in the pre tion of the much-discussed ballet Stravinsky's "l'Oiseau de Feu," t mous "Fire Bird" music that cr such a sensation when it was intro by the Ballet Russe.

The assisting artist at this co will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who wil his own third concerto, the one minor, No. 3, Op. 30.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 1 - 19

Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist at the open Boston Symphony concert next Monday e ning, will play Liszt's First Concerto in flat. Mr. Monteux, the new conductor, w begin the program with Schumann "Spring" Symphony. No. 1, and of more interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his "Danced Legen "The Fire Bird."

When Mina Tarasova, who is to appear at the Metropolitan Opera House on Wednesday evening, November 19, made her American debut it was agreed that as interpreter of Russian folk songs she was unique. She had an overwhelming success in New York at her first appearance of the season there a few days ago. With her house entirely sold out a few days before the concert a huge crowd stormed the doors, clamoring

Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season, to take place at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, November 5, will play with the orchestra his latest concerto, No. 3, which is said to be even more magnificent than his second concerto, heard at one of these concerts last season. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will begin the program with Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and end it with the suite which Stravinsky has arranged for orchestra from his ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux is not only famous for conducting "The Fire-Bird" in America with the Russian Ballet, he is admired in Paris as the fearless pioneer exponent of all of Stravinsky's revolutionary scores.

From Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

Rachmaninoff Tuesday

At the opening concert of the ton Symphony Orchestra in the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, the soloist will be Rachmaninoff, the Russian p who will play his own "Third certo," which, when heard in York, won even higher praise his "Second," played here with orchestra last season. Pierre Mon will conduct Haydn's graceful phony, "The Queen of France." final number will be the Rumanian Enesco's orchestral suite in parts.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
NOV 2 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season, which will take place in the New National theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master pianist of the Russian His choice for the occasion is his third concerto which, when heard in New York, won even higher praise

From Post
Washington, D. C.

National—Boston Symphony day.

The first concert of the sea the Boston Symphony Orchestra be given at the National T Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Rachmaninoff will be the soloist, his n being his own Third Concerto erre Monteux will conduct H "The Queen of France," and final number the Roumanian Enesco orchestral suite in four parts.

NEW YORK CITY
NOV 1 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, will make its New York during the week and give its first concert of its season on Nov. 7 in Carnegie Hall. The merits of the Boston Symphony are too well known to require comment. It is safe to predict that the orchestra will maintain its high standard under its new conductor. Pierre Monteux endeared himself to New Yorkers during his too brief regime at the Metropolitan Opera House.

RACHMANINOFF
The Famous Pianist Who Will Be Soloist At The Opening Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

INSTITUTE OFFERINGS

Two Chamber Organizations and Boston Symphony This Week.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for Friday evening. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony and orchestral suite in four parts by the Roumanian Enesco. Sergei Rachmaninoff, the assisting soloist, will devote his attention to Liszt's E-flat Concerto for piano and orchestra.

EVENING SUN
New York City
NOV - 1 1919

The opening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, follows: Schumann, "Spring" Symphony No. 1; Beethoven, overture and adagio from the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, Suite for Orchestra. For the Saturday matinee Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France"; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, suite from "The Fire Bird."

Lyric..... Josef Rosenblatt in recital Tuesday evening. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist, Wednesday evening.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

BESIDES the two works of exceptional interest which will constitute the first part of the opening Boston Symphony programme of the season, to be performed at the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening — Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3), which the great Russian composer-pianist will play with the orchestra—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will produce for the first time in concert here a Suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian Ballet, is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theatre.

Paris had not yet heard "The Rites of Spring"; they had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore Mr. Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. At the end of the piece Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage and the enthusiasts carried the day.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF AT THE LYRIC NOV 5TH

How An Orchestra Rehearses

"MR. MONTEUX did not come to us as a stranger this year," explained a veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "He knows the orchestra thoroughly and the orchestra knows him far better than the public does, for he drilled us through an arduous preparatory period last autumn when there was a considerable change in the personnel.

"Indeed, we know his ways very well. At the first rehearsal then the acoustical difference caused by the hard, empty seats of the auditorium, which send the echoes clattering around, troubled him immediately. So he asked that a curtain be hung in front of the stage, reaching from floor to roof. It has hung at each of his rehearsals since, absorbing the sound and replacing the auditors of Fridays and Saturdays, who probably little realize that they make the music mellow by their physical presence.

"Mr. Monteux is pleasant spoken always, but no conductor has been more rigorously exacting than he. Musicians don't like to be interrupted after every few bars, but no other method will make for results minutely perfect. After thus picking a piece entirely to pieces, Mr. Monteux will open his score the following morning, lead us right through it, and then harangue us about those passages which have not gone precisely to his wish.

"To have power over his men a conductor needs two things: their respect and their confidence. If he is adroit in giving cues, if his ear misses nothing, if he knows to a hair's breadth what he wants and how to get what he wants with the least drain upon the nerves and time of 100 waiting musicians, then respect and confidence are a matter of course. Mr. Monteux's alert ear is a thing to wonder at, nor has he traveled the world over training concerts, operas and ballets without perfecting the art of routine to the Nth degree.

"Before he lifted his baton for the first rehearsal this season he greeted us by saying, 'We shall not need to work so long this year as last.' But there were eight rehearsals before the first concert. I am sure the layman doesn't begin to realize what is required of us. He may imagine that the purpose of a rehearsal is to learn how to play a piece. That is not so. For instance, our first three rehearsals were spent in reading off at sight piece after piece of new music, some of it highly difficult, for the purpose of trying them out. A chance hearer might have regarded those as finished performances. And so they were, but the public performances of the symphony orchestra must be super-finished. To read the most difficult scores at sight is with us the starting point. When we rehearse we merely accustom ourselves to the conductor's shades of stress and balance and tempo, which constitute his personal interpretation. We familiarize ourselves with the music in hand so that we can free ourselves from the effort of reading, so that it can flow with ease from our instruments, so that we can be as instantaneously sensitive to the leader's slender stick as a flicker of light. In other words, a symphony rehearsal means simply a last polish—a final touching up. Except that nothing but familiarity will enable the music to lift the players out of themselves and carry them on its current.

"No, we do not practice our parts at home. In the first place, we do not need to, and in the second place, we would not have the time. Before a violinist is admitted into this orchestra he must play a concerto of his own choice for the conductor, and he must read at sight the violin part of any orchestral score that is put before him. As a matter of fact, I could cite a hundred orchestral passages that are more difficult than any concerto. Debussy's 'Nocturnes,' Ravel's 'Daphnis,' Schmitt's 'Salome' have pages to appall a merely passable violinist. The lightning descent of the strings at the climax of 'Death and Transfiguration' must be made by 30 musicians as one man, and places similarly difficult could be named in any of Strauss' works. A modern composer knows what musicians can do and he exacts the utmost from them. Enesco scores for the violin as for his illustrious self; even Tschaikowsky wrote high configurations in the first movement of his 'Pathetic' Symphony which would be the despair of anyone less than a genuine virtuoso. That is what every player in the symphony orchestra must be—a genuine virtuoso.

"The double-bass player in a theatre, see-sawing sleepily between tonic and dominant, has an easy time of it. The double-basses in a symphony orchestra must execute swift runs—they must be at the top and bottom of their unwieldly instrument at once; as often as not their parts are melodies in unison with the 'cellos.

The New York Concert League announces that the second of the popular priced orchestral concerts given by Arnold Volpe and his Symphony Orchestra of 100 will take place at the New York Hippodrome this afternoon. John Powell, the foremost American composer pianist, and Bernard Woolff, the celebrated tenor, have been engaged as soloists. Mr. Powell is beloved by the American public and at this concert Mr. Volpe will present Mr. Powell's own concerto for piano and orchestra.

THE BALTI

Music and Musicians

Rachmaninoff And Boston Symphony

Two notable features are in store for the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night—the performance of Rachmaninoff's new concerto for piano and orchestra (his third work in this form) to be played by the great Russian himself, and a suite arranged from Stravinsky's "Oiseau de Feu," the ballet which made such a profound impression when the dreadfully overrated Nijinsky and his company did it a couple of years ago.

As Pierre Monteux, the director of the Boston Symphony, conducted the Ballet Russe, nobody is in a better position, perhaps, to present this extraordinary music than he.

Rachmaninoff, during the last few years, has risen to a forward place among contemporaneous composers and virtuosi. He returned to this country early in the war and at that time had nothing even remotely approaching a rogue, though his reputation was well established. His extraordinary temperament, however, and his magnificent playing reawakened interest in him and in a surprisingly short time he was at the height of fame.

His seems to be a personality that is curiously remote and detached, almost with something forbiddingly austere about it. Yet what passion glows in his music, what vast emotional resources are disclosed by it!

John McCormack's Wide

Sergei Rachmaninoff

Sergei Rachmaninoff will play own new concerto for piano and chestra at the opening concert of season by the Boston Orchestra u Pierre Monteux's direction at Lyric next Wednesday night.

Yes, Sousa is quite good enough for us; and as for Bach's "Saint Matthew Passion," with the aid of conductors never interned or deported, we shall enjoy many performances of that mighty masterpiece which breathes no thought of Teutonism but voices only the spirit of the Protestant faith.

is true that Mr. Sousa conducts a military concert band, not a symphonic orchestra. It is also true that he has composed chiefly marches, such as "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which has a remarkably comforting sound to ears incapable of delighting in "Deutschland uber Alles."

It is furthermore a fact that during the war Sousa built up a monster musical organization known as the Great Lakes Training Station Band, which lightened many hours of toil devoted to preparing gallant young Americans for the business of chasing the elusive U-boat, a business in which many of them were brilliantly successful.

Sat Nov 1

HE BALTIMORE NEWS

THE TRUTH ABOUT DR. MUCK

How The Musical Expert Of Department Of Justice Discovered Code.

(From the New York Sun.)

At last the secret is out. Dr. Muck, the distinguished German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the welcoming arms of Berlin, has told the world that his heinous offense against these United States, for which he was subjected to 16 months of comfortable internment, was the preparation of a score of Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to Saint Matthew" without cuts. This score, he declares, was pronounced by musical experts of the Department of Justice to be a code used in communication with the Berlin Foreign Office, in which, curiously enough, Dr. Muck was employed just before his return to this country.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The story has a singularly familiar flavor. Musicians have, on several occasions, been arrested for having suspicious musical manuscripts in their possession.

However, Dr. Muck is back in the right place. He has conveniently forgotten the years of favor which he enjoyed here, and now regards us as a nation of musical barbarians. We have lost Muck, but we still have Sousa, and, as the urbane doctor remarks, he is good enough for us. It

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give the first of the current season's concerts at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 5, when the symphony will be the new heard "La Reine de France" symphony of Haydn, the one in B-flat major. The interest centers, however, in the presentation of the much-discussed ballet suite, Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the famous "Fire Bird" music that created such a sensation when it was introduced by the Ballet Russe.

The assisting artist at this concert will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer-pianist, who will play his own third concerto, the one in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert next Monday evening, will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat. M. Monteux, the new conductor, will begin the program with Schumann's "Spring" Symphony. No. 1, and of special interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has arranged from his "Danced Legend," "The Fire Bird."

When Mina Tarasova, who is to appear at the Metropolitan Opera House on Wednesday evening, November 19, made her American debut it was agreed that as interpreter of Russian folk songs she was unique. She had an overwhelming success in New York at her first appearance of the season there a few days ago. With her house entirely sold out a few days before the concert a huge crowd stormed the doors, clamoring

Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff, soloist at the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season, to take place at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, November 5, will play with the orchestra his latest concerto, No. 3, which is said to be even more magnificent than his second concerto, heard at one of these concerts last season. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will begin the program with Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and end it with the suite which Stravinsky has arranged for orchestra from his ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux is not only famous for conducting "The Fire-Bird" in America with the Russian Ballet, he is admired in Paris as the fearless pioneer exponent of all of Stravinsky's revolutionary scores.

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

Rachmaninoff Tuesday

At the opening concert of the ton Symphony Orchestra in the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, the soloist will be Rachmaninoff, the Russian who will play his own "Third certo," which, when heard in York, won even higher praise his "Second," played here with orchestra last season. Pierre Mon will conduct Haydn's graceful phony, "The Queen of France." final number will be the Rumanian Enesco's orchestral suite in parts.

TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.
NOV 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season, which will take place in the New National theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 the soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the master pianist of the Russian. His choice for the occasion is his own third concerto which, when heard at New York, won even higher praise

From Post
Washington,

National—Boston Symphony today.

The first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Rachmaninoff will be the soloist, his number being his own Third Concerto. Pierre Monteux will conduct Haydn's "The Queen of France," and the final number the Roumanian Enesco orchestral suite in four parts.

ess: New York City
NOV 1 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, will visit New York during the week and give its first concert of its season on Nov. 7 in Carnegie Hall. The merits of the Boston Symphony are too well known to require comment. It is safe to predict that the orchestra will maintain its high standard under its new conductor. Pierre Monteux endeared himself to Yorkers during his too brief regime at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Sun
Md.
NOV 1 -

...tol Symphony.
...ymphony Orchestra
...n of its new condu
... will give the first o
...s concerts at the L
... evening, November
...phony" will be the ra
...ne de France" symph
...oné in B-flat major.
...however, in the presc
...ch-discussed ballet s
..."Oiseau de Feu," the
...ird" music that cre
...n when it was introd
...tusse.
...artist at this con
... Rachmaninoff, the g
...ser-pianist, who will
... concerto, the one i
...Op. 130.

...ublic Ledger
..., Pa.
...OV 1 - 1919
...off, soloist at the opening
...ncert next Monday eve
...t's First Concerto in E
... the new conductor, will
...am with Schumann's
...y. No. 1, and of specia
... suite which Stravinsky
... his "Danced Legion."
...sova, who is to appea
... Opera House on Wedne
...ber 19, made her Ameri
...reed that as interprete
...ks she was unique. Sh
...g success in New York
...nce of the season ther
...With her house entirel
...s before the concert
...d the doors, clamorin

Md.
NOV 1
...YMPHONY
...noff, soloist at the
...mphony concert of
... place at the Lyric
...dnesday evening,
...play with the or-
... concerto, No. 3,
...e even more mag-
... second concerto,
...ese concerts last
...onteux, the new
...gin the program
...hony, "The Queen
...nd it with the
...sky has arranged
... his ballet, "The
...nteux is not only
...ing, "The Fire-
...ith the Russian
... in Paris as the
...oment of all of
...onary scores.

...P NOV 2 - 1
Star
...on, D. C.
...inoff Tuesday.
...ng concert of the Bo
... Orchestra in the N
...er, Tuesday afterno
...oloist will be Serg
... the Russian pianis
... his own "Third Con
... when heard in Ne
... higher praise tha
...played here with th
...eason. Pierre Monteux
...aydn's graceful sym
...een of France." The
...ll be the Rumanian
...tral suite in four

...hington, D. C.
...P NOV 2 - 19
...SYMPHONY.
...g Boston Symphony
...ason, which will take
...ew National theater
...fternoon at 4:30, the
... Sergei Rachmaninoff,
...ist of the Russians.
...e occasion is his own
...hich, when heard in
... even higher praise
...ish be played with
Post
Washington, D. C
...ton Symphony, Tues-
...day.
...ncert of the season by
...mphony Orchestra will
... the National Theater
...noon at 4:30. Rachman-
... the soloist, his numb
...n Third Concerto.
... will conduct Haydn
...of France," and for
...he Roumanian Enesco
...te in four parts.
...ORK City
...NOV - 1 1919
...hony Orchestra, con-
... Monteux, will visit
... the week and give the
...s season on Nov. 6.
... The merits of
... are too well known
...t. It is safe to pre
...tra will maintain it
...der its new conductor
...dcarry himself to New

DAY, NOVEMBER 2
ELPHIA RECORD, S

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND RACHMANINOFF

Martinelli and Mlle. Finmain to Give Concert at Academy of Music.

MATINEE MUSICAL CLUB

Frieda Hempel in Recital—Philadelphia Orchestra Without Soloist.

—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen an interesting program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist is Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer-pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus," and for the first time in concert here a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the pioneer performer of Stravinsky. Monteux made Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring." The orchestration of this ballet is so difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. Monteux gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton. Paris had not yet heard "The Rites of Spring;" they had not allowed themselves to hear it.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

Therefore Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown, and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. Probably not a tall hat was unsmashed. Friends and opponents made for the composer simultaneously. He fled for a taxi-cab, but some gendarmes, suspicious at the aspect of the lank, running Russian, arrested him. However, he pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go.

* * *

The first of the Academy Concert

om SUN

ress New York City

te NOV 2 191

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is as follows: Schumann, symphony, B flat, No. 1; Beethoven, overture and adagio from the ballet "The Creature of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, suite for orchestra. For the organization's concert on Saturday afternoon the programme is as follows: Haydn, symphony, in B flat, inscribed "The Queen of France"—Marie Antoinette; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen," Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, suite, "The Firebird."

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE,
..., NOVEMBER 2,

MONTEUX, NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

Pierre Monteux has come with a special reputation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play here on five Tuesday evenings—Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6—for which series tickets are now to be had at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange. The new conductor has long been celebrated on two continents as an artist of broad and catholic tastes, and as a daring innovator with an especial brilliance for revolutionary scores.

As H. T. Parker of the Boston Transcript has written: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music—in the days of the concerts in Paris, he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easiest way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghiley's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectric Metropolitan; in all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

In confirmation of these tendencies, Mr. Monteux has announced: "I think it is time to consider music and war as two different things." Accordingly he has already restored Wagner's music, while leaving the question of Strauss to the state of American public opinion. He has already produced in Boston d'Indy's new Symphony on the war and Stravinsky's ultra-modern Ballet-Suite, "The Fire Bird."

Unable to make many specific announcements on account of uncertainties caused by the precarious state of musical publication in Europe just now, he has nevertheless hinted at new works by Roussel, Havel, Rabaud, Prokovieff, Turina and Casella, and definitely made known the performance of a new symphony by Jean Hure, and Debussy's "Play." He will include on his programs several American scores which he has decided upon after conferences with their composers. By no means will Mr. Monteux neglect the finest music of the past. Besides Franck's choral "Beatitudes," which he hopes to give in Boston, he has mentioned the following great composers: Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Dvorak.

* * *

The use of Christian hymns is caus-

m.....

ress New York City

te..... K NOV 1

Boston Symphony Programmes.

The opening programme of the Bost... Symphony Orchestra to be given in Ca... negie Hall next Thursday evening follow... Schumann, "Spring," Symphony No. 1... Beethoven, Overture and Adagio from th... Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"... Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"... Enesco, Suite for Orchestra. For the Sat... urday matinée Pierre Monteux, the new... conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony...

(Continued on Page 11)

"The Queen of France"; Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

om HERALD

ress New York City

te NOV 2 19...

Four Orchestras in Week to Play Eight Concerts

With eight orchestra concerts coming in a single week, the symphonic season is now seriously under way. This week the New York Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will start their local activities.

HERALD

New York City

NOV 2 1919

With its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, taken from the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to this city for its first pair of concerts on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The evening programme will contain Schumann's "Spring" symphony, two numbers from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and a Roumanian suite, by Enesco. For the matinee Mr. Monteux announces Haydn's symphony, inscribed "The Queen of France," Stravinsky's suite from "The Bird of Fire," Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture and Franck's "The Wild Huntsman."

TIMES

New York City

NOV 2- 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will open its visits here on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall with Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Beethoven's only ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," Debussy's "Faun," and a suite by the Rumanian composer, Enesco.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
NOV 2- 1919

Boston Symphony Thursday.

The opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, follows: Schumann, "Spring," Symphony No. 1; Beethoven Overture and Adagio from the Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, Suite for Orchestra.

For the Saturday matinee, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France"; Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

NOV 2- 191
From American
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

AT its opening concert for the season, which takes place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of November 6, the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conductor, will play Schumann's Symphony No. 1 (Spring); Beethoven's overture and adagio from "Prometheus"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco's suite for orchestra. On the afternoon of November 8 the orchestra will present a Haydn symphony; Beethoven's overture "King Stephen"; Franck's "The Wild Huntsman"; Strawinsky's suite "The Fire Bird."

From World
New York City
NOV 2- 1919

Boston Symphony.

The opening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, is: Schuman—"Spring" Symphony No. 1; Beethoven—Overture and Adagio from the Ballet; "The Creatures of Prometheus;" Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun;" Enesco—Suite for Orchestra.

For the Saturday matinee, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen: Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France;" Beethoven—Overture to "King Stephen;" Franck—"The Wild Huntsman;" Stravinsky—Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

om EVENING MAIL

ddress: New York City

te

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

From American
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 2 - 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Besides the two works of exceptional interest which will constitute the first part of the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra program of the season, to be performed at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, November 5—Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3), which the great Russian composer-pianist will play with the orchestra—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will produce for the first time in concert here a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian Ballet, is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theater. At every one of them, the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

COMING EVENTS

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orcestra, has chosen an exceptionally interesting program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, November 3, which will be further heightened, by

From Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 1 - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will give its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, as the soloist. The program, opening with Schumann's first symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring" symphony, will include two numbers from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire." Rachmaninoff is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat.

INQUIRER
...ss Philadelphia, Pa.
K NOV 2 - 191

MADE A NOTE OF
The Boston Symphony Orchestra,

under the direction of M. Pierre Monteux, will open its local season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the programme will include two excerpts from Beethoven's "Prometheus," Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" ballet suite, which those who saw the Russian ballet will recall, and the "Spring" symphony of Schumann. Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the assisting artist of the occasion and will play Liszt's familiar pianoforte concerto in E. flat.

The full musical service at the Second Presbyterian Church, Twenty-first and Walnut streets, will be resumed this evening, when Frederick Cook, violinist, and Vincent Fanelli, harpist, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be heard in conjunction with the choir and also in trios with the organ. This evening's service will begin at 7.30 o'clock. The choir consists of twenty mixed voices with the following solo quartette: Mrs. Gibb, soprano; Mrs. Joyce, alto; Mr. Stahl, tenor; Mr. Joyce, bass.

Conductor and

PIERRE MONTEUX

a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

Paris has not yet heard "The Rites of Spring!" they had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore Mr. Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusastic, the hostile, and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown, and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece, Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. Probably not a tall hat was unsmashed. Friends and opponents made for the composer simultaneously. He fled for a taxicab, but some gendarmes, suspicious at the aspect of the lank, running Russian, arrested him. However, he pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go.

* * *

...on, the famous pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the overture and adagio from Beethoven's ballet, "Promethesus," and, for the first time in concert here, a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner."

The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required thirty-four rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear

SUN
...s New York City
NOV 1 - 1919

The Truth About Dr. Muck.

At last the secret is out. Dr. MUCK, the distinguished German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the welcoming arms of Berlin, has told the world that his heinous offence against these United States, for which he was subjected to sixteen months of comfortable internment, was the preparation of a score of SEBASTIAN BACH'S "Passion According to Saint MATTHEW" without cuts. This score, he declares, was pronounced by musical experts of the Department of Justice to be a code used in communication with the Berlin Foreign Office, in which, curiously enough, Dr. MUCK was employed just before his return to this country.

The story has a singularly familiar flavor. Musicians have on several occasions been arrested for having suspicious musical manuscripts in their possession. Doubtless Messrs. STRANSKY and BODANZKY have musical ciphers, scribbled in pencil, yet for some reason they have escaped the observation of the Administration sleuths.

However, Dr. MUCK is back in the right place. He has conveniently forgotten the years of favor which he enjoyed here, and now regards us as a nation of musical barbarians. We have lost MUCK, but we still have SOUSA, and, as the urbane doctor remarks, he is good enough for us. It is true that Mr. SOUSA conducts a military concert band, not a symphonic orchestra. It is also true that he has composed chiefly marches, such as "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which has a remarkably comforting sound to ears incapable of delighting in "Deutschland über Alles."

It is furthermore a fact that during the war SOUSA built up a monster musical organization known as the Great Lakes Training Station Band, which lightened many hours of toil devoted to preparing gallant young Americans for the business of chasing the elusive U-boat, a business in which many of them were brilliantly successful.

Yes, SOUSA is quite good enough for us; and as for BACH'S "Saint Matthew Passion," with the aid of conductors never interned nor deported, we shall enjoy many performances of that mighty masterpiece, which breathes no thought of Teutonism, but voices only the spirit of the Protestant faith.

RACHMANINOFF

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music tomorrow night, and Serge Rachmaninoff, who will be the soloist.

EAGLE

...ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

HEALING THE DISCORDS OF WAR.

Brooklyn has occasion to congratulate herself that for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year every seat in the Academy has been sold for the season. Muck and his Germanism are of the past and the memory of his insults and injuries is to be swallowed up in the love of good music, for which this Boston Orchestra has long been the chief propagandist and the finest example.

Sun
Md.
NOV 1-
to Symphony.
Symphony Orchestra,
n of its new conduc
, will give the first o s concerts at the I evening, November
phony will be the ra ne de France" sympho
one in B-flat major.
however, in the prese uch-discussed ballet so
'Oiseau de Feu," the ird" music that cre
n when it was introd Russe.
artist at this con
Rachmaninoff, the gr ser-pianist, who will g concerto, the one in
Op. 30.

ublic Ledger
, Pa.
NOV 1-
off, soloist at the opening oncert next Monday eve zt's First Concerto in E
the new conductor, will
am with Schumann's
No. 1, and of specia
suite which Stravinsky
his "Danced Legion."
sova, who is to appear Opera House on Wedne
ber 19, made her Ameri
xcel that as interprete gs she was unique. She ng success in New Yor
once of the season there
With her house entirel ra before the concert
d the doors, clamorin

Md.
NOV 1
YMPHONY
noff, soloist at the mphony concert of place at the Lyric ednesday evening,
play with the or-
concerto, No. 3.
e even more mag-
second concerto,
hese concerts last onteux, the new gin the program
hony, "The Queen
nd it with the sky has arranged
his ballet, "The nteux is not only
ing "The Fire-
ith the Russian
in Paris as the onent of all of onary scores.

NOV 2
Star
on, D. C. noff Tuesday.
ng concert of the Bo
Orchestra in the Na er, Tuesday afternoo oloist will be Serge
the Russian pianis
his own "Third Con
when heard in Ne
higher praise tha played here with the
eason. Pierre Monteux
aydn's graceful symeen of France." The ll be the Rumanian
tral suite in four

ington, D. C.
P NOV 2 - 19
SYMPHONY.
g Boston Symphony
ason, which will take ew National theater
fternoon at 4:30, the
Sergei Rachmaninoff,
ist of the Russians.
e occasion is his own which, when heard in even higher praise
ish he played with

Post
Washington, D. C.
ton Symphony Tuesday.
ncert of the season by mphony Orchestra will
the National Theater
noon at 4:30. Rachman-
the soloist, his numb
n Third Concerto. H
will conduct Haydn
of France," and for the Roumanian Enesco
te in four parts.
York City
NOV - 1 1916
phony Orchestra, con-
Monteux, will visit
the week and give the its season on Nov. 8
The merits of the
are too well known nt. It is safe to pre estra will maintain its er its new conductor deared himself to New too brief regime at Opera House.

DAY, NOVEMBER 2,
ELPHIA RECORD, S

BOSTON SYMPHONY
AND RACHMANINOFF

Martinelli and Mlle. Finmain to Give Concert at Academy of Music.

MATINEE MUSICAL CLUB

Frieda Hempel in Recital—Philadelphia Orchestra Without Soloist.

—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen an interesting program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist is Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer-pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus," and for the first time in concert here a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the pioneer performer of Stravinsky. Monteux made Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring." The orchestration of this ballet is so difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. Monteux gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theatre. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton. Paris had not yet heard "The Rites of Spring;" they had not allowed themselves to hear it.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

Therefore Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusiastic, the hostile and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown, and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. Probably not a tall hat was unsmashed. Friends and opponents made for the composer simultaneously. He fled for a taxi-cab, but some gendarmes, suspicious at the aspect of the lank, running Russian, arrested him. However, he pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go.

* * *

The first of the Academy Concert

om SUN
ress New York City
te
NOV 2

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is as follows: Schumann, symphony, B flat, No. 1; Beethoven, overture and adagio from the ballet "The Creature of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, suite for orchestra. For the organization's concert on Saturday afternoon the programme is as follows: Haydn, symphony, in B flat, inscribed "The Queen of France"—Marie Antoinette; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen," Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, suite, "The Firebird."

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE,
t. 1., NOVEMBER 2, Musi.

MONTEUX, NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

Pierre Monteux has come with a special reputation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play here on five Tuesday evenings—Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 27, March 9 and April 6—for which series tickets are now to be had at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange. The new conductor has long been celebrated on two continents as an artist of broad and catholic tastes, and as a daring innovator with an especial brilliance for revolutionary scores.

As H. T. Parker of the Boston Transcript has written: "The trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. He is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music—in the days of the concerts in Paris, he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easiest way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghiley's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French Opera for two seasons at the eclectric Metropolitan; in all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background."

In confirmation of these tendencies, Mr. Monteux has announced: "I think it is time to consider music and war as two different things." Accordingly he has already restored Wagner's music, while leaving the question of Strauss to the state of American public opinion. He has already produced in Boston d'Indy's new Symphony on the war and Stravinsky's ultra-modern Ballet-Suite, "The Fire Bird."

Unable to make many specific announcements on account of uncertainties caused by the precarious state of musical publication in Europe just now, he has nevertheless hinted at new works by Roussel, Havel, Rabaud, Prokovieff, Turina and Casella, and definitely made known the performance of a new symphony by Jean Hure, and Debussy's "Play." He will include on his programs several American scores which he has decided upon after conferences with their composers. By no means will Mr. Monteux neglect the finest music of the past. Besides Franck's choral "Beatitudes," which he hopes to give in Boston, he has mentioned the following great composers: Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Dvorak.

* * *

The use of Christian hymns is caus-

m.....
dress New York City
te.....

Boston Symphony Programmes.

The opening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening follows: Schumann, "Spring," Symphony No. 1; Beethoven, Overture and Adagio from the Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, Suite for Orchestra. For the Saturday matinée Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony

(Continued on Page 11)

"The Queen of France"; Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

om HERALD
dress New York City
te.....

Four Orchestras in Week to Play Eight Concerts

With eight orchestra concerts coming in a single week, the symphonic season is now seriously under way. This week the New York Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will start their local activities.

HERALD
New York City
NOV 2

With its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, taken from the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to this city for its first pair of concerts on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The evening programme will contain Schumann's "Spring" symphony, two numbers from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and a Roumanian suite, by Enesco. For the matinee Mr. Monteux announces Haydn's symphony, inscribed "The Queen of France," Stravinsky's suite from "The Bird of Fire," Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture and Franck's "The Wild Huntsman."

TIMES
New York City
NOV 2-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will open its visits here on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall with Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Beethoven's only ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," Debussy's "Faun," and a suite by the Rumanian composer, Enesco.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
NOV 2- 1918

Boston Symphony Thursday.

The opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, follows: Schumann, "Spring," Symphony No. 1; Beethoven Overture and Adagio from the Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco, Suite for Orchestra.

For the Saturday matinee, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France"; Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen"; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

NOV 2- 191
From American
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

AT its opening concert for the season, which takes place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of November 6, the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conductor, will play Schumann's Symphony No. 1 (Spring); Beethoven's overture and adagio from "Prometheus"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Enesco's suite for orchestra. On the afternoon of November 8 the orchestra will present a Haydn symphony; Beethoven's overture "King Stephen"; Franck's "The Wild Huntsman"; Strawinsky's suite "The Fire Bird."

From World
New York City
NOV 2- 1918

Boston Symphony.

The opening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, is: Schuman—"Spring" Symphony No. 1; Beethoven—Overture and Adagio from the Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus;" Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun;" Enesco—Suite for Orchestra.

For the Saturday matinee, Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, has chosen: Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France;" Beethoven—Overture to "King Stephen;" Franck—"The Wild Huntsman;" Stravinsky—Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

om EVENING MAIL
dress: New York City
te

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

From American
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Besides the two works of exceptional interest which will constitute the first part of the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra program of the season, to be performed at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, November 5—Haydn's Symphony, "The Queen of France," and Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3), which the great Russian composer-pianist will play with the orchestra—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will produce for the first time in concert here a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian Ballet, is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required 34 rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theater. At every one of them, the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

COMING EVENTS

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orceestra, has chosen an exceptionally interesting program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, November 3, which will be further heightened, by

From Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 1 - 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, will give its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, as the soloist. The program, opening with Schumann's first symphony in B flat, known as the "Spring" symphony, will include two numbers from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire." Rachmaninoff is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat.

INQUIRER
ss Philadelphia, Pa.

MADE A NOTE OF
The Boston Symphony Orchestra,

under the direction of M. Pierre Monteux, will open its local season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the programme will include two excerpts from Beethoven's "Prometheus," Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" ballet suite, which those who saw the Russian ballet will recall, and the "Spring" symphony of Schumann. Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the assisting artist of the occasion and will play Liszt's familiar pianoforte concerto in E flat.

The full musical service at the Second Presbyterian Church, Twenty-first and Walnut streets, will be resumed this evening, when Frederick Cook, violinist, and Vincent Fanelli, harpist, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be heard in conjunction with the choir and also in trios with the organ. This evening's service will begin at 7.30 o'clock. The choir consists of twenty mixed voices with the following solo quartette: Mrs. Gibb, soprano; Mrs. Joyce, alto; Mr. Stahl, tenor; Mr. Joyce, bass.

Conductor and

PIERRE MONTEUX

a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

Paris has not yet heard "The Rites of Spring!" they had not allowed themselves to hear it. Therefore Mr. Monteux arranged a purely orchestral performance at his "Concerts Monteux" on April 14, 1914. The auditorium was packed with the enthusastic, the hostile, and the merely curious. They listened to the first part in comparative quiet. But the last note was followed by such a terrific din, with missiles freely thrown, and fights in different parts of the hall, that the police had to interfere. At the end of the piece, Stravinsky himself appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasts carried the day. Probably not a tall hat was unsmashed. Friends and opponents made for the composer simultaneously. He fled for a taxicab, but some gendarmes, suspicious at the aspect of the lank, running Russian, arrested him. However, he pointed to his crushed hat, assuring them that he was a deputy, and they let him go.

* * *

on, the famous pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the overture and adagio from Beethoven's ballet, "Promethesus," and, for the first time in concert here, a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner."

The orchestration of this ballet is so tremendously difficult that it required thirty-four rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. At every one of them the noise of hissing and cat-calling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear

SUN
s New York City
NOV 3

The Truth About Dr. Muck.

At last the secret is out. Dr. MUCK, the distinguished German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the welcoming arms of Berlin, has told the world that his heinous offence against these United States, for which he was subjected to sixteen months of comfortable internment, was the preparation of a score of SEBASTIAN BACH'S "Passion According to Saint MATTHEW" without cuts. This score, he declares, was pronounced by musical experts of the Department of Justice to be a code used in communication with the Berlin Foreign Office, in which, curiously enough, Dr. MUCK was employed just before his return to this country.

The story has a singularly familiar flavor. Musicians have on several occasions been arrested for having suspicious musical manuscripts in their possession. Doubtless Messrs. STRANSKY and BODANZKY have musical ciphers, scribbled in pencil, yet for some reason they have escaped the observation of the Administration sleuths.

However, Dr. MUCK is back in the right place. He has conveniently forgotten the years of favor which he enjoyed here, and now regards us as a nation of musical barbarians. We have lost MUCK, but we still have SOUSA, and, as the urbane doctor remarks, he is good enough for us. It is true that Mr. SOUSA conducts a military concert band, not a symphonic orchestra. It is also true that he has composed chiefly marches, such as "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which has a remarkably comforting sound to ears incapable of delighting in "Deutschland über Alles."

It is furthermore a fact that during the war SOUSA built up a monster musical organization known as the Great Lakes Training Station Band, which lightened many hours of toil devoted to preparing gallant young Americans for the business of chasing the elusive U-boat, a business in which many of them were brilliantly successful.

Yes, SOUSA is quite good enough for us; and as for BACH'S "Saint Matthew Passion," with the aid of conductors never interned nor deported, we shall enjoy many performances of that mighty masterpiece, which breathes no thought of Teutonism, but voices only the spirit of the Protestant faith.

RACHMANINOFF

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music tomorrow night, and Serge Rachmaninoff, who will be the soloist.

EAGLE
ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

HEALING THE DISCORDS OF WAR.

Brooklyn has occasion to congratulate herself that for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year every seat in the Academy has been sold for the season. Muck and his Germanism are of the past and the memory of his insults and injuries is to be swallowed up in the love of good music, for which this Boston Orchestra has long been the chief propagandist and the finest example.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 2 - 1919

MUSICAL PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK AND COMING EVENTS

Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras in Symphony Programs

Rachmaninoff, Hempel and Martinelli in the Varied Concerts This Week

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening which will be heightened by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's Ballet, "Prometheus," and, for the first time in concert here, a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so difficult that it required thirty-four rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theater. At every one of them the noise of hissing and catcalling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

(ORIGINAL)
-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1861
ST. BOARD UNION
rom N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The opening Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was soloist. A review of the concert will appear in to-morrow's paper.

TRANSCRIPT, THU
DAY, NOVEMBER 6

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux as conductor and Miss Garrison as assisting singer have agreed together upon the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16. As already announced, it includes Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony—music, from Dr. Muck's time onward, reserved by common consent of conductors and public for such occasion. By happy choice of Miss Garrison, it will include also the wandering and wondrous air, sung by the Queen of Shemakha in the second act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," heard here once in the theatre, but as yet unknown to Symphony Hall. In detail the programme stands:

Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "The Pathetic" ..... Chaikovsky

Air of the Queen of Shemakha from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel," ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Miss Garrison

Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wag

Air, "Charmant Oiseau," from the Opera "The Pearl of Brazil" ..... Da
Miss Garrison

Overture to the Opera, "William Tell" .. Ross

For her numbers at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon next, Mme. Galli-Cu has returned to familiar custom long sin approved by her faithful public. Aga there are old French "Bergerettes" upo her list and again airs from elder Italia operas are plentiful. The list runs:

My Lovely Celia (Old English) ..... Mon
Daffodils A-blowing ..... Germa
Air, "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto" ..... Verd
Variations (With Flute) ..... Proc
L'Heure Exquise ..... Hah
Calvelitos ..... Valverd
I Saw Thee Weep ..... Samuel
Air, "Sempre Libera," from "La Traviata," ..... Verdi
Four French Bergerettes ..... Weckerlin
Mad Scene from "Hamlet" ..... Thomas

The most recent revision of the programme of the Symphony Concerts next week substitutes Beethoven's overture to the play, "King Stephen," long unheard in Boston, for the equally unfamiliar "Bourrée Fantasque" of Chabrier, presumably because the latter piece required more preparation than Mr. Monteux at the moment is able to give it. Furthermore, instead of the ancient cantata by Tunder, Mme. Frijsh will sing an air from Franck's quasi-oratorio, "The Redemption." Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death" and Mme. Frijsh's numbers by Duparc, Musorgsky and Bloch keep place on the programme.

The same symphony, the same tone-poem and the same overture will be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week. The singer, however, will be the much heralded Miss Janacopulos. Her pieces are "The Commander" from Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death"—a rarely heard number; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Eastern Romance" and an air from a French opera of the eighteenth century, Monsigny's "La Belle Arsène."

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Vera

This Miss Vera Janacopulos, who will sing next week Thursday at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, is a "Greek-Brazilian." Whether the Greek went to Brazil or the Brazilian went to Greece is not stated; but no less an authority than the New York Evening Post said boldly on Nov. 8 that Miss Vera is "the most beautiful girl on the concert stage." This was not the ecstatic outburst of a passionate press agent, but the solemn opinion of an editorial writer. We see a long line crossing Harvard bridge on Nov. 18, all armed with opera-glasses. How Miss Vera sings is, of course, a minor matter.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 9 - 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Draw Four Aces.

The four artists, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members of the Tak-Quartette, have joined the faculty of the Detroit Conservatory of Music. The artists are Edward Tak, violinist; Hans Werner, violinist; Joseph Gewirtz, violinist, and Ludwig Nast, cellist.

m EVENING GLOBE
ress: New York City
NOV 12 1919

Dr. Muck, of not wholly sainted memory, five years ago conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of the Seventh Symphany in Carnegie Hall which might well have been recorded as the ideal performance of the most beautiful symphony it has yet been given to man to write. I am foolish enough to wish that every conductor on earth had heard that performance, and in particular had noted the learned doctor's treatment of the introduction to the first movement.

BOSTON POST, FRI
NOVEMBER 14

MAKES HER DEBUT WITH SYMPHONY

Miss Janacopulos Well Received at Concert in Cambridge

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. She is a young woman in her early 20's, of Grecian descent, born in Brazil, educated musically in Paris, where she studied, first as a violinist under the composer, Enesco, and later as a vocalist, making here debut in the French capital in 1914.

SANG RUSSIAN SONGS

She sang four Russian songs with extraordinary authority and eloquence. Miss Janacopulos is doubly fortunate in her musical endowments, since she has a voice of the most uncommon range, freshness and capacity for dramatic expression, and has also the intelligence as a musician, which so many singers lack. She has even more intelligence than that. For there are musicians who know their business intelligently and well, as engineers, or dishwashers, or dentists know their business, without having very much imaginable or emotional sensibility.

But this woman, this Miss Janacopulos, is what she is evidently because of an unusually broad and well-informed mind. For one has to have a mind and use it to sing the four songs on last night's programme and do each one of them justice, when each song is entirely different in style and substance from the other.

"The Commander"

The first song was "The Commander," a surpassingly grim and dramatic song of Moussorgsky, inspired by the poem of Count Golenitcheff-Koutousoff, in which Death, at midnight, mounted on his charger, proudly surveys the ruin and the carnage of the battlefield and summons the dead to pass before him in review. It is a song which requires imagination as well as the most uncommon vocal and technical equipment. In all respects it seemed that Miss Janacopulos was equal to its demands, in the opening picture of battle, in the invocation to the night spreading its shadows over the fallen, in the apostrophe of the terrible commander—an extremely impressive performance.

Then there was the interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming "The Rose Hath Charmed the Nightingale" and the poetic performance of Borodin's "Sleeping Princess," a performance, in contrast to "The Commander," astonishing in its atmosphere, its exquisite fineness of coloring, its intimate mood.

But perhaps the most unusual achievement of the singer was the interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Gathering Mushrooms"—mushrooms which are apt to poison the white haired husband and pave the way for the indulgence of the passion of the young bride. There was then the feeling of peasant patois, which could never be translated into English, of irony, of menace underneath the lilting, strangely rythmed, folk-like character of the music. These were songs that displayed equally the intelligence, temperament and vocal resource of the singer. Unless all signs fail there is in Miss Janacopulos a singer who will quickly take a very important position among her colleagues of the concert stage.

Other features of the concert was the appearance of Mr. Denayer, first violist of the orchestra, when he played the solo viola part with admirable finish and warmth of tone, of Berlioz' "Childe Harold" symphony, and the performance of George W. Chadwick's "The Angel of Death," which was well received.

A Voice and a Passion

Vera Janacopulos

Rising Singer Soon to Be Heard in Boston and in Cambridge, Greek by Race, Brazilian by Birth, American in Newly Won Note

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 2 - 1919

MUSICAL PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK AND COMING EVENTS

Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras in Symphony Programs

Rachmaninoff, Hempel and Martinelli in the Varied Concerts This Week

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening which will be heightened by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's Ballet, "Prometheus," and, for the first time in concert here, a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so difficult that it required thirty-four rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theater. At every one of them the noise of hissing and catcalling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

(ORIGINAL)
5-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881

rom

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The opening Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was given at the Academy of Music last evening, Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was soloist. A review of the concert will appear in to-morrow's paper.

TRANSCRIPT, THU

DAY, NOVEMBER 6

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux as conductor and Miss Garrison as assisting singer have agreed together upon the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16. As already announced, it includes Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony—music, from Dr. Muck's time onward, reserved by common consent of conductors and public for such occasion. By happy choice of Miss Garrison, it will include also the wandering and wondrous air, sung by the Queen of Shemakha in the second act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," heard here once in the theatre, but as yet unknown to Symphony Hall. In detail the programme stands:

Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "The Pathetic" ..... Chaikovsky
Air of the Queen of Shemakha from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel," ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Miss Garrison
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagn
Air, "Charmant Oiseau," from the Opera "The Pearl of Brazil" ..... Dav
Miss Garrison
Overture to the Opera, "William Tell" .. Rossi

For her numbers at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon next, Mme. Galli-Cur has returned to familiar custom long sinc approved by her faithful public. Agai there are old French "Bergerettes" upo her list and again airs from elder Italia operas are plentiful. The list runs:

My Lovely Celia (Old English) ..... Monr
Daffodils A-blowing ..... Germa
Air, "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto" ..... Verd
Variations (With Flute) ..... Proch
L'Heure Exquise ..... Hahn
Calvelitos ..... Valverde
I Saw Thee Weep ..... Samuels
Air, "Sempre Libera," from "La Traviata," ..... Verdi
Four French Bergerettes ..... Weckerlin
Mad Scene from "Hamlet" ..... Thomas

The most recent revision of the programme of the Symphony Concerts next week substitutes Beethoven's overture to the play, "King Stephen," long unheard in Boston, for the equally unfamiliar "Bourrée Fantasque" of Chabrier, presumably because the latter piece required more preparation than Mr. Monteux at the moment is able to give it. Furthermore, instead of the ancient cantata by Tunder, Mme. Frijsh will sing an air from Franck's quasi-oratorio, "The Redemption." Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death" and Mme. Frijsh's numbers by Duparc, Musorgsky and Bloch keep place on the programme.

The same symphony, the same tone-poem and the same overture will be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week. The singer, however, will be the much heralded Miss Janacopulos. Her pieces are "The Commander" from Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death"—a rarely heard number; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Eastern Romance" and an air from a French opera of the eighteenth century, Monsigny's "La Belle Arsène."

Mr. Arthur Loesser ... suite fro...

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Vera

This Miss Vera Janacopulos, who will sing next week Thursday at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, is a "Greek-Brazilian." Whether the Greek went to Brazil or the Brazilian went to Greece is not stated; but no less an authority than the New York Evening Post said boldly on Nov. 8 that Miss Vera is "the most beautiful girl on the concert stage." This was not the ecstatic outburst of a passionate press agent, but the solemn opinion of an editorial writer. We see a long line crossing Harvard bridge on Nov. 13, all armed with opera-glasses. How Miss Vera sings is, of course, a minor matter.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Draw Four Aces.

The four artists, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members of the Tak-Quartette, have joined the faculty of the Detroit Conservatory of Music. The artists are Edward Tak, violinist; Hans Werner, violinist; Joseph Gewirtz, violinist, and Ludwig Nast, cellist.

...ting Bureau in the World

m EVENING GLOBE
lress: New York City

NOV 2...

Dr. Muck, of not wholly sainted memory, five years ago conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of the Seventh Symphany in Carnegie Hall which might well have been recorded as the ideal performance of the most beautiful symphony it has yet been given to man to write. I am foolish enough to wish that every conductor on earth had heard that performance, and in particular had noted the learned doctor's treatment of the introduction to the first movement.

BOSTON POST, FRI
, NOVEMBER 14

MAKES HER DEBUT WITH SYMPHONY

Miss Janacopulos Well Received at Concert in Cambridge

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. She is a young woman in her early 20's, of Grecian descent, born in Brazil, educated musically in Paris, where she studied, first as a violinist under the composer, Enesco, and later as a vocalist, making here debut in the French capital in 1914.

SANG RUSSIAN SONGS

She sang four Russian songs with extraordinary authority and eloquence. Miss Janacopulos is doubly fortunate in her musical endowments, since she has a voice of the most uncommon range, freshness and capacity for dramatic expression, and has also the intelligence as a musician, which so many singers lack. She has even more intelligence than that. For there are musicians who know their business intelligently and well, as engineers, or dishwashers, or dentists know their business, without having very much imaginable or emotional sensibility.

But this woman, this Miss Janacopulos, is what she is evidently because of an unusually broad and well-informed mind. For one has to have a mind and use it to sing the four songs on last night's programme and do each one of them justice, when each song is entirely different in style and substance from the other.

"The Commander"

The first song was "The Commander," a surpassingly grim and dramatic song of Moussorgsky, inspired by the poem of Count Golenitcheff-Koutousoff, in which Death, at midnight, mounted on his charger, proudly surveys the ruin and the carnage of the battlefield and summons the dead to pass before him in review. It is a song which requires imagination as well as the most uncommon vocal and technical equipment. In all respects it seemed that Miss Janacopulos was equal to its demands, in the opening picture of battle, in the invocation to the night spreading its shadows over the fallen, in the apostrophe of the terrible commander—an extremely impressive performance.

Then there was the interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming "The Rose Hath Charmed the Nightingale" and the poetic performance of Borodin's "Sleeping Princess," a performance, in contrast to "The Commander," astonishing in its atmosphere, its exquisite fineness of coloring, its intimate mood.

But perhaps the most unusual achievement of the singer was the interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Gathering Mushrooms"—mushrooms which are apt to poison the white haired husband and pave the way for the indulgence of the passion of the young bride. There was then the feeling of peasant patois, which could never be translated into English, of irony, of menace underneath the lilting, strangely rythmed, folk-like character of the music. These were songs that displayed equally the intelligence, temperament and vocal resource of the singer. Unless all signs fail there is in Miss Janacopulos a singer who will quickly take a very important position among her colleagues of the concert stage.

Other features of the concert was the appearance of Mr. Denayer, first violist of the orchestra, when he played the solo viola part with admirable finish and warmth of tone, of Berlioz' "Childe Harold" symphony, and the performance of George W. Chadwick's "The Angel of Death," which was well received.

A Voice and a Passion

Vera Janacopulos

Rising Singer Soon to Be Heard in Boston and in Cambridge, Greek by Race, Brazilian by Birth, American in Newly Won Note

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 2 - 1919

MUSICAL PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK AND COMING EVENTS

Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras in Symphony Programs

Rachmaninoff, Hempel and Martinelli in the Varied Concerts This Week

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a program for the opening concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening which will be heightened by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who is to play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's Ballet, "Prometheus," and, for the first time in concert here, a suite from Stravinsky's daring ballet, "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Monteux's reputation in America as conductor of the Russian ballet is nothing to his reputation in Paris, where he is regarded as the great pioneer performer of Stravinsky. He made all of Stravinsky's music known to Paris—even the revolutionary "Rites of Spring," in Stravinsky's "third manner." The orchestration of this ballet is so difficult that it required thirty-four rehearsals before Mr. Monteux was ready to reveal it to the public, with Nijinsky dancing the principal part. He gave five performances at the Champs Elysees Theater. At every one of them the noise of hissing and catcalling, with counter-demonstrations of applause, was so deafening that he could at times not hear a single note, while the dancers had nothing to follow but his baton.

(ORIGINAL)
-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881

STANDARD UNION
making an extensive survey of wat front conditions with a view stabilizing and increasing city rev nues from the use of docks a owner of Accounts has

BOSTON POST, FR
NOVEMBER 14

MAKES HER DEBUT WITH SYMPHONY

Miss Janacopulos Well Received at Concert in Cambridge

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. She is a young woman in her early 20's, of Grecian descent, born in Brazil, educated musically in Paris, where she studied, first as a violinist under the composer, Enesco, and later as a vocalist, making here debut in the French capital in 1914.

SANG RUSSIAN SONGS

She sang four Russian songs with extraordinary authority and eloquence. Miss Janacopulos is doubly fortunate in her musical endowments, since she has a voice of the most uncommon range, freshness and capacity for dramatic expression, and has also the intelligence as a musician, which so many singers lack. She has even more intelligence than that. For there are musicians who know their business intelligently and well, as engineers, or dishwashers, or dentists know their business, without having very much imaginable or emotional sensibility.

But this woman, this Miss Janacopulos, is what she is evidently because of an unusually broad and well-informed mind. For one has to have a mind and use it to sing the four songs on last night's programme and do each one of them justice, when each song is entirely different in style and substance from the other.

"The Commander"

The first song was "The Commander," a surpassingly grim and dramatic song of Moussorgsky, inspired by the poem of Count Golenitcheff-Koutousoff, in which Death, at midnight, mounted on his charger, proudly surveys the ruin and the carnage of the battlefield and summons the dead to pass before him in review. It is a song which requires imagination as well as the most uncommon vocal and technical equipment. In all respects it seemed that Miss Janacopulos was equal to its demands, in the opening picture of battle, in the invocation to the night spreading its shadows over the fallen, in the apostrophe of the terrible commander—an extremely impressive performance.

Then there was the interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming "The Rose Hath Charmed the Nightingale" and the poetic performance of Borodin's "Sleeping Princess," a performance, in contrast to "The Commander," astonishing in its atmosphere, its exquisite fineness of coloring, its intimate mood.

But perhaps the most unusual achievement of the singer was the interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Gathering Mushrooms"—mushrooms which are apt to poison the white haired husband and pave the way for the indulgence of the passion of the young bride. There was then the feeling of peasant patois, which could never be translated into English, of irony, of menace underneath the lilting, strangely rythmed, folk-like character of the music. These were songs that displayed equally the intelligence, temperament and vocal resource of the singer. Unless all signs fail there is in Miss Janacopulos a singer who will quickly take a very important position among her colleagues of the concert stage.

Other features of the concert was the appearance of Mr. Denayer, first violist of the orchestra, when he played the solo viola part with admirable finish and warmth of tone, of Berlioz' "Childe Harold" symphony, and the performance of George W. Chadwick's "The Angel of Death," which was well received.

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux as conductor and Miss Garrison as assisting singer have agreed together upon the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16. As already announced, it includes Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony—music, from Dr. Muck's time onward, reserved by common consent of conductors and public for such occasion. By happy choice of Miss Garrison, it will include also the wandering and wondrous air, sung by the Queen of Shemakha in the second act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," heard here once in the theatre, but as yet unknown to Symphony Hall. In detail the programme stands:

Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "The Pathetic" ..... Chaikovsky
Air of the Queen of Shemakha from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel," ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Miss Garrison
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner Air, "Charmant Oiseau," from the Opera, "The Pearl of Brazil" ..... David
Miss Garrison
Overture to the Opera, "William Tell" .. Rossini

For her numbers at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon next, Mme. Galli-Cur has returned to familiar custom long sin approved by her faithful public. Aga there are old French "Bergerettes" upo her list and again airs from elder Italia operas are plentiful. The list runs:

My Lovely Celia (Old English) ..... Mon
Daffodils A-blowing ..... Germa
Air, "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto" ..... Verd
Variations (With Flute) ..... Proc
L'Heure Exquise ..... Hah
Calvelitos ..... Valverd
I Saw Thee Weep ..... Samuel
Air, "Sempre Libera," from "La Traviata," ..... Verdi
Four French Bergerettes ..... Weckerlin
Mad Scene from "Hamlet" ..... Thomas

The most recent revision of the programme of the Symphony Concerts next week substitutes Beethoven's overture to the play, "King Stephen," long unheard in Boston, for the equally unfamiliar "Bourrée Fantasque" of Chabrier, presumably because the latter piece required more preparation than Mr. Monteux at the moment is able to give it. Furthermore, instead of the ancient cantata by Tunder, Mme. Frijsh will sing an air from Franck's quasi-oratorio, "The Redemption." Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death" and Mme. Frijsh's numbers by Duparc, Musorgsky and Bloch keep place on the programme.

The same symphony, the same tone-poem and the same overture will be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week. The singer, however, will be the much heralded Miss Janacopulos. Her pieces are "The Commander" from Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death"—a rarely heard number; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Eastern Romance" and an air from a French opera of the eighteenth century, Monsigny's "La Belle Arsène."

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Vera

This Miss Vera Janacopulos, who will sing next week Thursday at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, is a "Greek-Brazilian." Whether the Greek went to Brazil or the Brazilian went to Greece is not stated; but no less an authority than the New York Evening Post said boldly on Nov. 8 that Miss Vera is "the most beautiful girl on the concert stage." This was not the ecstatic outburst of a passionate press agent, but the solemn opinion of an editorial writer. We see a long line crossing Harvard bridge on Nov. 13, all armed with opera-glasses. How Miss Vera sings is, of course, a minor matter.

NEW YORK
STABLISHED 1881
NOV 9 - 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Draw Four Aces.

The four artists, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members of the Tak-Quartette, have joined the faculty of the Detroit Conservatory of Music. The artists are Edward Tak, violinist; Hans Werner, violinist; Joseph Gewirtz, violinist, and Ludwig Nast, cellist.

m EVENING GLOBE
ress: New York City
NOV 12 1919

Dr. Muck, of not wholly sainted memory, five years ago conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of the Seventh Symphany in Carnegie Hall which might well have been recorded as the ideal performance of the most beautiful symphony it has yet been given to man to write. I am foolish enough to wish that every conductor on earth had heard that performance, and in particular had noted the learned doctor's treatment of the introduction to the first movement.

A Voice and a Passion

Vera Janacopulos

Rising Singer Soon to Be Heard in Boston and in Cambridge, Greek by Race, Brazilian by Birth, American in Newly Won Note

Transcript — Nov. 1

Russian Music ==- French

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF CONTRASTING RUSSIANS

Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet of "The Fire-Bird" and Rakhmaninov's Third Piano Concerto for the First Times—Indifference to the One and Zest for the Other or, Rather, for the Composer as Pianist and Personality—The Appeal of Power Versus the Appeal of Magic CONDUCTORS propose; but, in measure, audiences dispose. Mr. Monteux obviously designed the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" as the outstanding piece at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Beyond peradventure it is music glowing with intrinsic beauty or vivid with delineative suggestion. As plainly it is music written with rare individuality of means, method, imagination. It is a renowned music withal that has gone up and down the theatres of Europe and America, that has exercised no small influence upon the younger generation of composers the world over. Finally, it is music that warms Mr. Monteux's fullest and finest powers. In his days with the Russian Ballet he led often in it; for its own sake he justly cherishes it; never before has he been able to play it upon so adept and responsive an instrument as the present Symphony Orchestra; with reason he sought and gained a performance pulsing with rhythmic life, graphic with harmonic and instrumental color; full-voiced of sustained song, missing not a measure of pictorial or poetizing suggestion. Such a music so played was intended to be, and deserved to be, the conductor's crown to his first group of Symphony Concerts.

"Dis aliter visum." The gods otherwise decreed—but less the gods than the goddesses who fill so large a part of the parquet on Friday afternoons at Symphony Hall. younger divinities, they "passed up" Stravinsky and "The Fire-Bird," departed in noisy file while Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were sounding the first measures of more than one movement; returned to both at the end the faintest and hastiest crackle of applause. Unless precedent fails, the audiences of Saturday evening, musically more curious, more receptive and better informed, will use Stravinsky and "The Fire-Bird"—to say nothing of conductor and band—in larger accord with their deserts. Possibly for the first time anywhere—one more unique distinction for this town—music by Stravinsky (his earlier experiments aside) has been coldly, almost deliberately, slighted. Elsewhere, whether the audience resented or approved, and usually it has done both simultaneously opinion and feeling have run warm and high.

Perhaps, however, the audience was in no mood for further new sensations after it had heard Mr. Rakhmaninov play his concerto for piano in D minor, the second number of the afternoon. With the pianist-composer, it could drink its fill of puissant and illuding personality. The most mistrustful hearer could not doubt the mastery of every technical means, the range of manifold and expressive eloquence with which he, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave the music voice. So heard, the response of the audience was quick and deep, warm and unanimous. How the concerto would sound from less revealing mind and commanding hand than the composer's is hard to say. It is ten years since Mr. Rakhmaninov published the piece and inscribed it to Josef Hofmann. Yet in that decade, if report runs accurately, the pianist has not elected—or, as some cynically say, dared—to hazard it. Indeed, according to more of this prattle of the lobbies, it had been played only once before—in the autumn of 1909 at one of Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York in the course of Mr. Rakhmaninov's first visit to the United States. It is hard, again, after a single hearing, to penetrate far into the revised concerto as it came in measure yesterday into new being. Suffice it that no novel music and no "assisting artist" in many a year of the Symphony Concerts have been applauded as were Mr. Rakhmaninov and this concerto in D minor.

At the least a few plausible impressions abide from this first hearing. The concerto abounds, for example, in measures of artful and moving euphony between the piano and other instruments or choirs of the orchestra—passages in which the imaginative end and the expressive means are so expertly and feelingly blended that they stir the ear with sensuous delight. Give Mr. Rakhmaninov his darkling strings, his gleaming horn, his murmuring piano and the heart of many a hearer turns to water. Again, the concerto does not lack measures of swirling power, as when, for example, toward the end of the finale, the piano seems to martial the whole orchestra before it and with mighty chords, Chaikovsky-wise, drive it forward and upward into as mighty and sonorous a climax. Akin are the starker measures as in the first movement, in which the piano seems to etch the pattern of the music upon the ear incisively, indelibly. Nowhere, almost needless to say does Mr. Rakhmaninov use the piano merely as display instrument. Yet, scarcely a composer of our time has searched out its possibilities more thoroughly, employed them more imaginatively, more variously. As learned, and in degree as imaginative is the composer with harmonic and instrumental color, especially when he may part or fuse piano and orchestra at will. If Mr. Rakhmaninov sometimes repeats himself in these processes, they lack neither sublety nor illusion. As signally, he writes these piano concertos—the second heard last January, no less than this third—with a propulsive power that bears the hearer along the composer's course. They are not a willed task to Mr. Rakhmaninov; they are an upswelling act of creation. No wonder, ninety-nine out of a hundred ears answer with a reciprocal warmth.

On the other hand—to set down further impressions and less confidently—this concerto in D-minor is an excessively moody, a highly variable, at moments even a repetitious music. Russian composer still, in spite of long residence at Dresden and occasional deference to German models, Mr. Rakhmaninov cannot forego many a repetition through his finale. True, they are vivid, vigorous, occasionally intensified repetitions, but they do delay and diffuse what the composer obviously purposed as a flood of masterful sound. Slav likewise by irresistible temperament, Mr. Rakhmaninov cannot forbear the play through the music of many a fitful and, to the cooler Anglo-Saxon mind and heart, bewildering mood. They seem to confuse the brief slow movement—intermezzo the composer labels it—to make it restless brooding rather than deeply flowing instrumental song. In clearer and sharper illusion they make the finale hectic, though they leave it somewhat disjointed. They do the music most service when from first measure to last they character the long first movement yet keep place in ordered and mounting progress. Through this Allegro, Mr. Rakhmaninov's controlling mind enkindled imagination and ready technical resource go hand in hand. The music, lowers and mutters, struggles into voice only to be subdued, brightens, quickens, is again overshadowed and stayed, sombre, sorrowful, fate-smitten—a veritable tone-poem in atmosphere and emotion out of which the piano speaks with changeful, penetrating, puissant voice. Concertos in our day have usually been made, whether piano or violin the virtuoso behind or a dutiful composer, was the occasion. Mr. Rakhmaninov imagines his even when there are discoverable blemishes and mannerisms upon them. In this first movement of the concerto of yesterday, such imagination has seldom run deeper or better sustained itself.

Yet there was not a reason why Rakhmaninov's music should have overshadowed Stravinsky's (as it surely did to most of the audience) except in the visible and audible presence of the composer as pianist. The presumption is that the composer is also audible through his own measures, even, if otherwise, he be no more than a name above them. But what is even so celebrated a name as Stravinsky, beside Mr. Rakhmaninov's point personality close to every anticipating hearer? There are no excuses to be made for the cool indifference to the suite from "The Fire-Bird." It could hardly be played in clearer revelation, in more pervading illusion. True, it is music of the theatre written to vivify, enhance and enrich a pictorial and fanciful action, drawn from old Russian legend, mimed and danced upon the stage. Stravinsky, however, has so chosen the music that only one of the excerpts is dimmed by transfer to the concert-hall—the final dances of the sorcerer and his train. Heard by itself, the music is fantastic, grotesque, bold and broken of rhythm, streaming with macabre color, fertile in pungent modulation, whipping the air with wild gesture and frantic posturing. Yet, for illusion needing the visible presence of bearded old Kotschei and his uncanny folk. Throughout the suite, Stravinsky of right assumes some acquaintance, in or out of the theatre, with the fable of "The Fire-Bird." But when has a composer of these latter days been denied his "programme." For naught else, except the advertisements did "programme-books" iom into being.

Ultra-modern music, if the hearer likes the phrase—"The Fire-Bird" surely is, but it runs in no baffling idiom. Rather, to any sort of practised ear in this nineteenth year of the twentieth century it runs as clear as the day in matter, manner, imagery, illusion. To the students and the connoisseurs may be left debate about Stravinsky's ways with the generating and the characterizing motives from which rise the course and the contents of his music. To them also may be left praise of his command of rhythms and daring with them, of his invention and resource with harmonies and timbres. The usual hearer busies himself little with these means to ends. For him the immediate sensation that the music yields him. The more, then, the wonder that so many failed to perceive yesterday the atmosphere of old legend swiftly, pervasively woven by the prelude, or the fluttering incandescence of the measures, radiant, glowing, magical, fairy-like, in which the Fire Bird herself is first revealed.

As wondrous in intrinsic quality and delineative suggestion is the music of her entreaties to the Tsarevitch, her captor. It is iridescent with her motion; yet vibrates with her petitionings. It makes her miming almost piteously visible; yet heard without thought of her, it quivers with its own melodic loveliness. There are those who wail and will not be comforted because there is no sustained melody in "ultra-modern music." Did they listen yesterday to the lullaby that soothes the sleep of the Tsarevna that is to be, to the so-called "Round" of the captive princesses? If they did, they heard music of full voiced instrumental song, glowing through transparent texture, almost as simple in impression as it is sophisticated of facture. And when, unless it be in Laparra's Basque Suite of last spring, has music so gleamed with swift, radiant, graceful, playful motion as does that in which Stramsky's princesses toss the golden apples? In a sense, anywhere and anyhow, it matters little how this music from "The Fire-Bird" happens to be received. Beauty, imagination, invention, illusion, individuality still speak out of it. A unique temperament and talent, near in kind to genius made it—and feared not.

H. T. PARKER

Visioning Stravinsky's Music

The Fire-Bird

From Bakst's Fantastic Costume Sketch

EAGLE

ress Brooklyn, N. Y. Oct 56

ORCHESTRAS OF THURSDAY

New York Symphony in the Afternoon—Boston Orchestra in the Evening.

Carnegie Hall resounded yesterday with orchestral evocations. In the afternoon the New York Symphony Society inaugurated its forty-second season, and Walter Damrosch his thirty-fifth year as conductor; in the evening the Boston Symphony introduced Pierre Monteux, late French conductor at the Metropolitan, in the role of permanent director. Mr. Monteux served a brief apprenticeship last year, prior to the coming of the scholarly Mr. Rabaud.

The Symphony Society's program was short and pithy: the C Minor Symphony of Brahms, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with Albert Spalding as assisting artist, and the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolda." Brahms' spirit soared in secret above the commonplaces of a humdrum life. Lige Herr Teufelsdreck, he saw from his vantage tower more than the roofs of the city. But there was little of the soaring spirit in Mr. Damrosch's reading yesterday. The band was there ready to do any conductor's bidding; its playing had all the finest qualities of clarity, unanimity and expressive nuance. By Mr. Damrosch's bidding, however, it never rose above the artistic level of a college text-book on logic. Even the slow movement flagged, especially when Mr. Tinlot's solo violin diluted its good Hamburg beer with denaturing absinthe.

Mr. Spalding is one of the returned heroes, but apparently the public is tired of parades, for it received him as it would any other viollinist. He lifted by the virtue of his straightforward playing the Mendelssohn music from its dangerously saccharine depths. He remains a virile, sound young violinist, without foibles, without exaggerations, and—it must be added—without charm. Mr. Damrosch gave him adequate assistance and did not fail at the end to greet the audience with nods and becks and wreathed smiles.

The "Tristan" score is always sure fire. Toscanini had an individual fire to gather within one small compass all the fires of passion.

The Bostonians' program held Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, the Overture and Ballet No. V from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus," Debussy's "Faun's Afternoon" and Enesco's "Suite for Orchestra" (Opus 9). This evening in the Academy of Music the first and last numbers will be repeated and between will stand Rachmaninoff's version of Liszt's E-flat concerto. Therefore, deponent, being duly sworn, will limit himself for the present to the unrepeated compositions.

Beethoven sounded occasionally. This "Prometheus" brought no fire from heaven. There was the excuse of an ordered work, so much down and the balance on delivery. That the composer had feeling for the dance is incontrovertible, but he always evinces restraint when writing for mere bodily movement. Perhaps Isadora Duncan chose the A Major Symphony advisedly and let such things as the "Prometheus" alone. The various individual artists of the band's personnel had their innings in the opening measures of the Adagio and furnished information, to those who needed such, of the individual excellence of the organization.

Mr. Monteux gave an inspired reading of the Debussy tone-poem. Its material appeals to his regard for the moderns and certainly he had at his command last evening an instrument capable of complete revelation of the music's content.

h NEW YORK COMMERCIAL

ress: New York City

Interest in the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, was keen. Mr. Monteux, who conducted at the Metropolitan for a time, is well known in New York, while the Boston Symphony has long been synonymous with artistic achievement. Much was anticipated, therefore, from the Boston organization under the baton of the great French conductor, and the distinguished audience which filled Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening was not disappointed. The program was a generous one. It included Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, opus 38; an overture and ballet from "Prometheus" by Beethoven, the Enesco suite for orchestra and the "d'apres midi d'un Faune" of Debussy.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was brilliant, dynamic. It was played with spontaneity, but with an elaboration of detail which made much of and noted every episode. The exultant, triumphant spirit of spring, which is the motif of the Schumann symphony, was sharply delineated in the playing. The song quality of the larghetto was somewhat marred by an excited tension in the violins, but the symphony as a whole was brilliant and soul satisfying.

Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered with a precision that was interesting and rhythmical, but not the poetic suggestive "Faune" as we know it. The playing of Beethoven's ballet was mellow, fluent and beautiful. The audience acclaimed it, particularly the adagio movement with solo passeges for violoncello, flute, clarinet and harp.

The Boston Symphony is always preeminent among music organizations. It is interesting to note its transition from the rugged sincerity and eloquence of Dr. Muck, to the finesse, precision and style of the great French conductor who now wields the baton.

Visioning Stravinsky's Music

A Princess

From a Sketch by Bakst in the Ancient Russian Manner

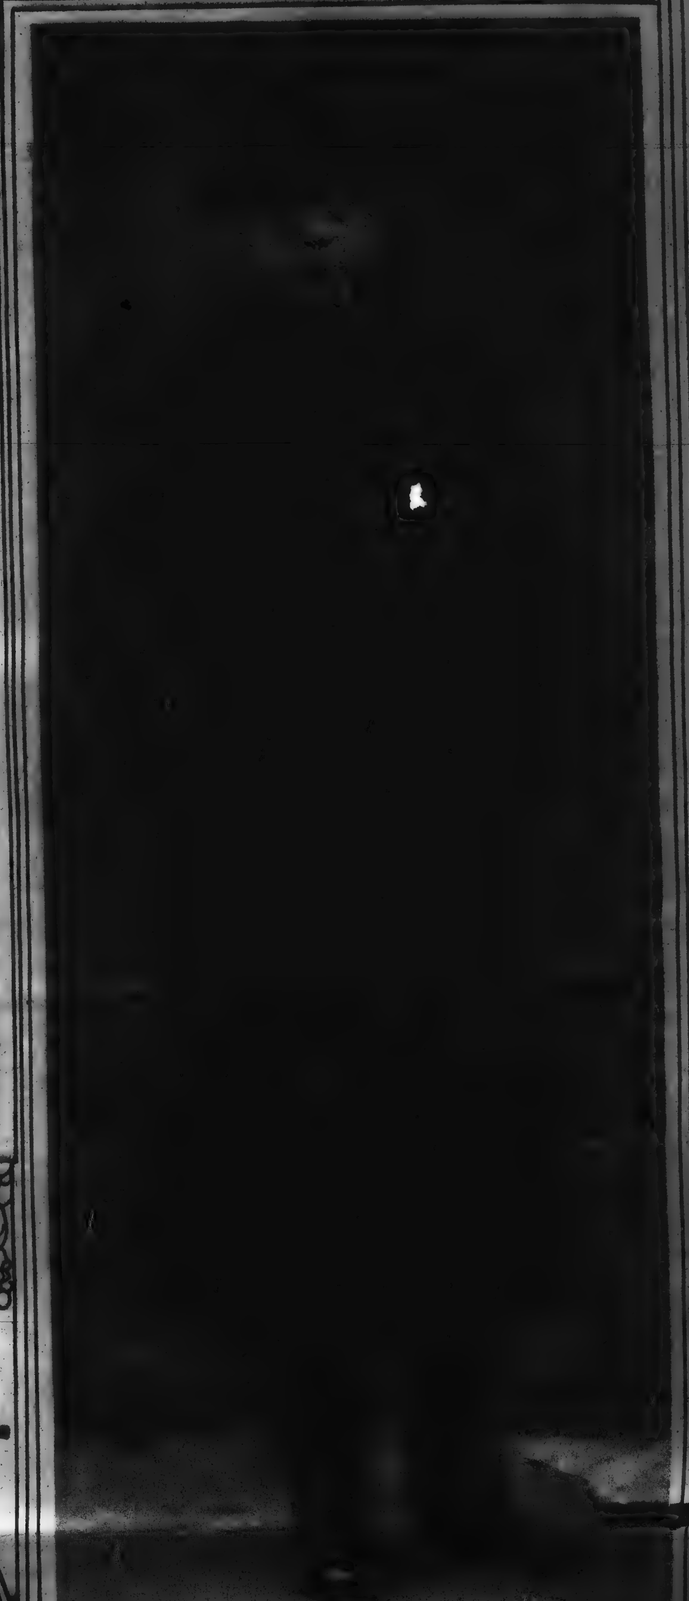
Sunday Nov. 9, 1919

FILMED AS BOUND

WHEN A RUSSIAN GIANT WALKED IN UPON A SYMPHONY CONCERT ONE FRIDAY AFTERNOON

At the Rear Entrance of Symphony Hall, and a Prime Reason for the Crowd in Front—Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Wrong End of the Line. Since the Second Balcony, Which Now Alone Is Unreserved, Contains 505 Seats, the 506th Music Lover and All After Him Must Be Turned Away. That Part of the Line Which Has Rounded the Corner from Huntington Avenue to Gainsboro Street Stands Upon Slim Hopes



Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Composer-Pianist who Dominates by His Masterful Music, and by His Stature as Well; Photographed on the Last Day of October, a Few Minutes Before He Stepped

Sunday Nov. 9, 1919

FILMED AS BOUND

WHEN A RUSSIAN GIANT WALKED IN UPON A SYMPHONY CONCERT ONE FRIDAY AFTERNOON

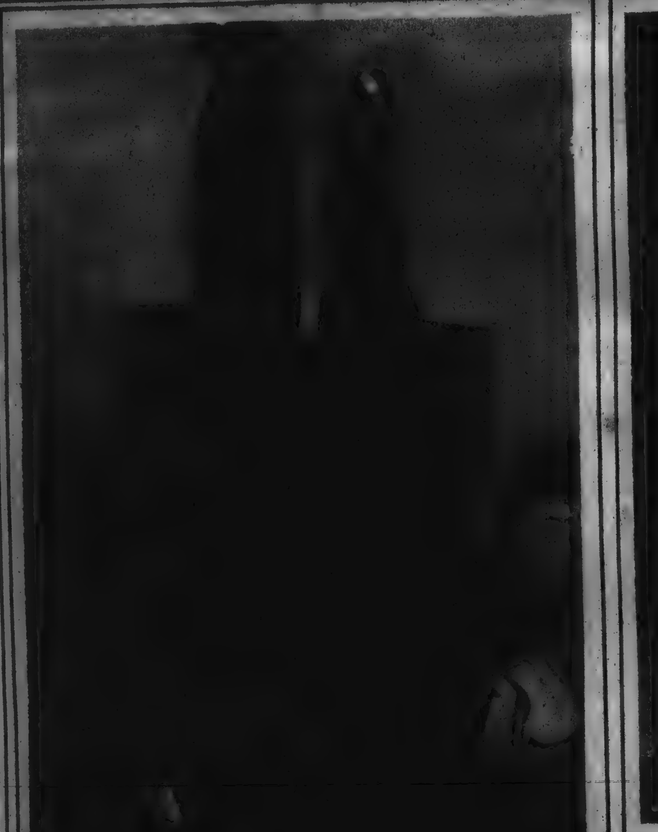
At the Rear Entrance of Symphony Hall, and a Prime Reason for the Crowd in Front—Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Wrong End of the Line. Since the Second Balcony, Which Now Alone Is Unreserved, Contains 505 Seats, the 506th Music Lover and All After Him Must Be Turned Away. That Part of the Line Which Has Rounded the Corner from Huntington Avenue to Gainsboro Street Stands Upon Slim Hopes

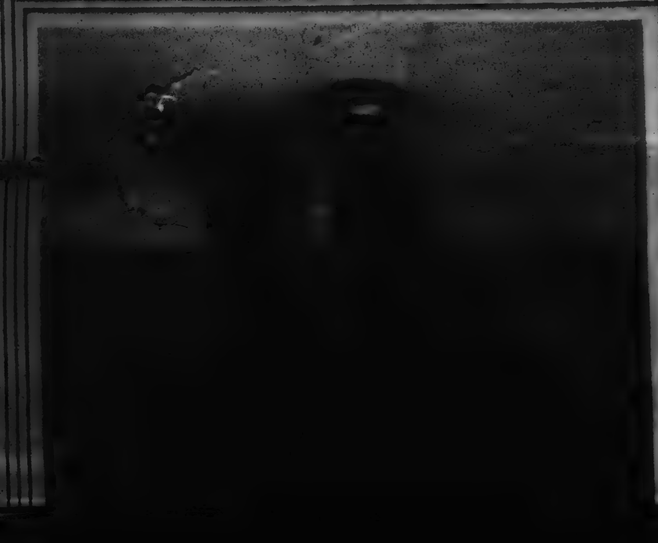
Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Composer-Pianist who Dominates by His Masterful Music, and by His Stature as Well; Photographed on the Last Day of October, a Few Minutes Before He Stepped

FILMED AS BOUND

Some Principals Among the Symphony Players. From Left to Right: Jean Bedetti and Frederic Denayer, Newly Come from France, Beating a Very Considerable Reputation with Them, to Head the 'Cello and Viola Sections; Gustav Helm, Albert Sand and George Wendler, the Trumpet, Clarinet and French Horn Respectively, Upon Whose Matchless Musicianship the Superfine Performance of the Great Orchestra Largely Depends

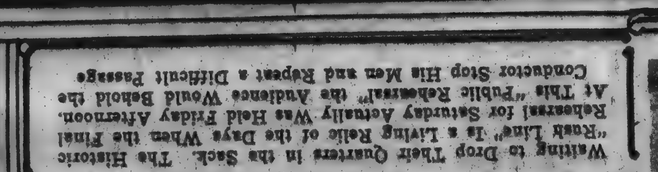


Serge Rachmaninoff, the Composer-Pianist who Dominates by His Masterful Music and by His Stature as Well; Photographed on the Last Day of October, a Few Minutes Before He Stepped Upon the Stage to Play His Latest Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra



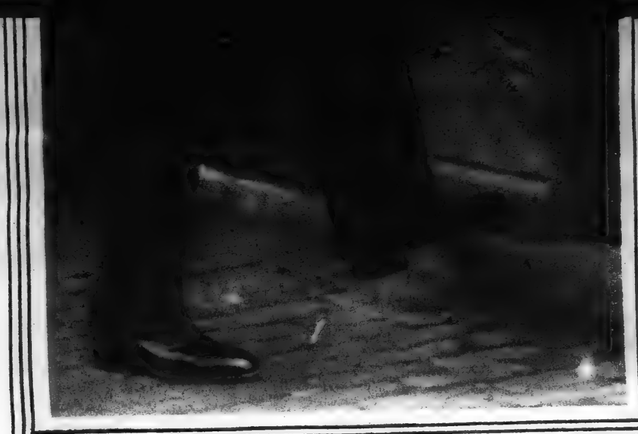
Julius Theodorowicz, Who Shares Mr. Franklin's Desk as Second Concert Master. He Has Been a Member for the Last Twenty-One Years

At the Rear Entrance of Symphony Hall, and a Fine Reason for the Crowd in Front—Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra



Waiting to Drop Their Quarters in the Sack. The Historic "Rush Line" Is a Living Relic of the Days When the Final Rehearsal for Saturday Actually Was Held Friday Afternoon. At This "Public Rehearsal" the Audience Would Behold the Conductor Stop His Men and Repeat a Difficult Passage

Frederic Franklin, the Youngest Concert Master of the Orchestra Since Franz Knoisel Led the Violins in the Eighties. Mr. Franklin Was Previously Concert Master of the Russian Ballet



At the Rear Entrance of Symphony Hall, and a Prime Reason for the Crowd in Front—Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Waiting to Drop Their Quarters in the Sack. The Historic "Rush Line" Is a Living Relic of the Days When the Final Rehearsal for Saturday Actually Was Held Friday Afternoon. At This "Public Rehearsal" the Audience Would Behold the Conductor Stop His Men and Repeat a Difficult Passage

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Composer-Pianist who Dominates by His Masterful Music, and by His Stature as Well; Photographed on the Last Day of October, a Few Minutes Before He Stepped Upon the Stage to Play His Latest Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Julius Theodorowicz, Who Shares Mr. Fradkin's Desk as Second Concert Master. He Has Been a Member for the Last Twenty-One Years

Some Principals Among the Symphony Players. From Left to Right: Jean Bedetti and Frederic Denayer, Newly Come from France, Bearing a Very Considerable Reputation with Them, to Head the 'Cello and Viola Sections; Gustav Heim, Albert Sand and George Wendler, the Trumpet, Clarinet and French Horn Respectively, Upon Whose Matchless Musicianship the Superfine Performance of the Great Orchestra Largely Depends

Frederic Fradkin, the Youngest Concert Master of the Orchestra Since Franz Kneisel Led the Violins in the Eighties. Mr. Fradkin Was Previously Concert Master of the Russian Ballet

FILMED AS BOUND

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Makes His Bow as Regular Conductor at the Academy of Music

The Academy presented a solid, roof-high phalanx of hearers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their new leader, Pierre Monteux, and the enormous art of the pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, last evening. A year ago M. Monteux appeared on the dais as a loan from the Metropolitan Opera till the arrival of Henri Rabaud. Last night saw him confirmed in permanent command. The picture that he makes as a leader and the mental concept from which it proceeds have as little as possible of Prussian militarism about them. His music is not run in the goose-step mold. His baton is persuasive and pleading. Every bit of the curvilinear geometry of his leadership is urbane and suave; he is polite and deferential, as if he felt himself an artist among artists, a gentleman among gentlemen. Yet beneath the velvet of the mode one feels the iron (wrought iron, not cast iron, for the latter is hard and brittle) of a firm authority.

He had brought out the first desk of the first violins and likewise of the second violins from their usual alignment to a place directly under his right hand and his left as he stood upon the dais. The voices of the quartet were not detached from the rest thereby, but they served in a way to link the visible leadership to the audible musical milieu.

The first symphony of Schumann has much to say of the composer's full-hearted domestic happiness—the violins give it lyric utterance, the horns sonorously declaim it, the cellos are the choral re-enforcement of the idea—and all is music, pure, sweet, serene, though now it is a hymn and again it is an idyll. The message that goes from violins to cellos in the slow movement seems the progress of a prayer. Lest the argument should come too close to the seraphim to be human, it is brought down to earth again by the bright, happy dancing of the Scherzo with the bouncing violins and the coherent horns and the delicious flute carried the mood on to the ending "animato e grazioso" as the legend read. All the players afterward were made to rise. In Beethoven's exquisite "Prometheus" ballet music we had five soloists—Bedetti's cello, Laurent's flute, Sands's clarinet, Laus's bassoon, Holy's harp, all masterfully played; and again these players were singled out, thrice, to stand and bow.

The evening's great figure was the Russian supermusician, Rachmaninoff, who, like Kreisler, had put behind his music manliness that exalts and inspires the playing. He does not hold his art out at his arms' length to his audience; he gives his whole being to it utterly, and he makes the notes sing on after his hands leave them by something more than the mere sostenuto of his pedal work. He summons the whole of the piano, even as he mobilizes all of himself, into instant and constant action. His mind presides and his fingers obey; and the Liszt E flat concerto, with the important sibilation of the triangle in the offing, was breathlessly over all too soon. The orchestra players (sure appreciators of an art that is fine and real) were stirred as well as the audience, and they had done their best to make it the superlative and the memorable performance that the thundering applause saluted.

Then came graceful and fanciful Stravinsky—carrying the whimsy over the brink into futurism, and still in the six episodes of "The Bird of Fire" giving us in plangent hues the moving picture of the program. The misty, ghostly spirit-flame seemed to hover above the magic garden; there was a crepuscular whistling up and down the fingerboards, and the harp fell on the ear half bird-note and half bell. Princesses played the game of ball with the golden apples to a swift and shifting pirouette and a tonal iridescence; the Lullaby followed the lethal harp with a sleepy drone of the bassoon, and lastly the "diabolic dance" filled the air with all the outlandish spluttering and quacking that muted brasses could supply.

F. L. W.

Batlle, the Farber ... Mary Doner, Lawrance D'Orsay.

Phila. Record Nov 4

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR

Boston Orchestra's Fine Performance—Rochmaninoff Heard.

When Pierre Monteux conducted the first concert of the Boston Orchestra series in the Academy of Music last season it was as an accommodation to the directors of the Boston organization, who engaged him to appear as a substitute for their French conductor, Henri Rabaud. That first concert was one of the most enjoyable of last winter's series, although Monteux was directing a combination of musicians practically strange to him. His appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Orchestra, in the Academy last night, was under different auspices and revealed the well-known operatic director as a musician of singularly appealing charm. He has a fine orchestra and one that shows the result of much drill and hard work. The tone is good, very brilliant, but musical and rhythmic.

The program displayed the orchestra almost entirely in a gay mood, since the evening was largely devoted to expositions of ballet music, even the B flat major symphony of Schumann known as the "Spring Symphony" being full of light and freshness, while the Beethoven composition was a ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and the Stravinsky suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," a dance legend, interspersed with rhythmic, if eccentric, dance motifs. While each work was distinctive and there was a great deal of contrast and variety, such a program required for its successful performance a conductor of skill and dramatic instinct. Monteux made everything interesting, even the ultra Stravinsky music, of which the two most attractive selections of the suite were the "Berceuse" and "The Princesses Play With the Golden Apples." It can easily be foreseen that the Monteux concerts will be a financial and artistic success.

Last night's soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, is evidently to enjoy this season the tremendous vogue he created so suddenly last winter. He drew an audience that exhausted the seating capacity of the Academy, while hundreds were unable to obtain admittance. The Liszt E-flat major Concerto, well worn as it is, was a brilliant thing, fresh and enjoyable in his markedly masculine hands, and its conclusion brought a great ovation to the player and orchestra.

Phila. Natth Amer. Nov. 4

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAKES GOOD START

Opens Here With Excellent Performance; Rachmaninoff Soloist

PROGRAM VARIED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fifth season here last night with a program of variety and merit and a performance that was excellent. As at the first appearance here last season, Pierre Monteux conducted, but this year the orchestra will remain under his charge, which circumstance augurs happy results and arouses keen expectations for the future.

There was even greater unanimity of playing than we have heard on previous occasions, and the ensemble was warmer and richer. But the string choirs, particularly the first and second violins, have yet to a h eve the volume and color we have in time past found in the playing of this organization.

Sergei Rachmaninoff was the so oist. Under his hands the many superfi ial parts of the Liszt E flat minor concerto achieve something akin to greatness. It is a case of the younger genius succoring the older, whose work has been handled unkindly by time. The skill and intellectua ity that Rachmaninoff brought to this performance gave the concerto a unity that is not always apparent in the work. His seemingly effortless power made the bravura passages truly heroic.

An interesting contrast was the placing of ballet music by Beethoven and Stravinsky on the program. The Beethoven, "Creatures of Prometheus," was lovely in its calm classicism, particularly the "Ballet No. 5," which gave opportunities to the solo cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and the harp. The cello work was especia ly distinguished.

Stravinsky's work, "The Fire Bird" ballet, does not stand the test of the concert platform as well. In the last analysis it is descriptive music, and when divorced from the action much of the interest is lost. The effect is somewhat that of hearing continuous dialogue spoken by concealed actors.

The First Symphony of Schumann headed the program. The changing moods of tender sentiment and fresh exuberance that abound in the work were given full play by Mr. Monteux in his spirited reading.

PRAISE FOR RACHMANINOFF AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Audience Spell-bound by Marvelous Playing of Great Russian Artist—Director Monteux Makes Pleasing Impression.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

There were two strong magnets to draw Philadelphians to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night—curiosity and expectancy; there was curiosity as to how Pierre Monteux would handle the once famous orchestra, and there was the expectancy of hearing the piano played by Sergei Rachmaninoff. Added to these magnetic attractions was the element of a program calculated to interest all types of music lovers—Beethoven and the Schumann First Symphony to satisfy the classicists, the Liszt E flat Piano Concerto to thrill the emotionalists and the Stravinski "Fire Bird" music to appease the modernists and sensationalists.

These contrasting composers furnished a program that spoke most promisingly of Mr. Monteux as a program maker; fortunately he will not be confronted with the war-time banns and prejudices that handicapped the programs of Mr. Rabaud, nor is there reason to fear that he will suffer the attacks of "program-profounditis" that spasmodically seized Karl Muck. Mr. Monteux is quite a different type of man from either of his two immediate predecessors; his personality embraces the "politesse" of the affable Henri Rabaud, but unlike Mr. Rabaud in that he can, when the occasion requires, give full rein to a temperament that is basically fiery, enthusiastic and intense. Whether his attributes comprise some of the scholarly attainments of Mr. Muck cannot be determined at this early date, nor is it possible to judge the result of his taking command of the Boston Orchestra.

Judgment Not Possible at Present.

It requires more than a few months of close association between orchestra players and conductor, in order to estimate the influence of the leader and the ability and willingness of the men to transmute his impressions and inspirations; it also requires that the conductor have intimate knowledge of the playing ability of each man under him, that he may know just what sort of material there is, with which to mold his work of art. So that while the prospects regarding the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra are full of rosy promise, it is not possible, at present, to say that any especially prominent results are yet apparent.

Given two or three seasons to become acclimated, to know his men and for them to know him, and he will most probably restore the orchestra to its one-time standard of excellence; his musicianship is a known quantity, his personality can be pretty accurately surmised, but his ability to take Muck's "left-overs" and subjugate them to his baton is for the future to decide—we hope and believe that he can do it.

Of the other attraction at last night's concert it is ever a delight to speak. He is the man of the hour on the concert platform, composer of some of the great music of his day and possing a technical equipment that makes him a true virtuso—a sort of Rubinstein of this generation.

Meets Natural Enthusiasm.

Mr. Rachmanninoff decided on Franz Liszt as the composer to be delineated at the concert last night and selected the E at Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. The famous concerto, with its wealth of melody, masterly orchestration, dazzling pianistics and fine balance between piano and orchestra, everything in fact that goes into the make-up of a great concerto—this concerto was played by Mr. Rachmanninoff in such masterly style that the enthusiasm that seized the audience was perfectly natural emotion—the people had listened to a great artist's reading of a great work.

The soloist was recalled and recalled, it seemed that he could not bow often enough to satisfy his worshiping audience.

The first number of the program was the Robert Schumann "Spring" Symphony, full of grateful music from the first page till the last. Mr. Monteux at once showed that his is no turgid conception of the symphony—there was a vigorous rhythmic swing to the first movement that kept it vital throughout. The three other movements were given a correspondingly energetic interpretation and especially in the last movement did the orchestra begin to sound like the old Boston Symphony.

Beethoven's Overture and charming ballet music followed. In the ballet music the first 'cellist, flutist, clairionetist, harpist and first bassoon became for the time being something akin to soloists—in fact the ballet music (the Adagio, No. 5), seemed quite like a piece of chamber music. Beethoven's music was followed by the Liszt Concerto, and the program concluded with the Suite of Igor Stravinski, intended as a musical accompaniment to the pantomimic Russian Legend, "The Bird of Fire." Stravinski's fantastic music has been played here before, so that it was not a complete novelty to Philadelphians last night.

But fascinating as is "The Bird of Fire," it will doubtless require many hearings before it becomes a favorite with the average concert-goer. The professional musician is intensely interested in Stravinski's often grotesque instrumentations, and in truth there is plenty of food for thought and emulation in the scoring of the composition, but the layman misses the cleverness of the thing, he cannot be expected to catch at first or even second hearing the obscured melodic material and consequently he is firmly convinced that he is listening to mere noise. However, Stravinski's "Bird of Fire" does contain some mighty interesting pages of real music, and while of course its most powerful influence is felt when it is carrying out its mission (that of supplying a musical background for a ballet), nevertheless it is a most welcome addition to the orchestra programs of today.

PROGRAM.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor.

Schumann
Symphony in B-flat major No 1, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace; Trio I; Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Beethoven
"The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Overture.
Ballet No. 5, Adagio.
(Violoncello solo, J. Bedetti; flute, G. Laurent; clarinet, A. Sand; bassoon, A. Laus; harp, A. Holy).

Liszt
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

Stravinsky
Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Bird of Fire"), a Danced Legend.
I. Introduction; Jardin enchante de Kastchei et danse de l'oiseau de feu ("Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Bird of Fire").
II. Supplications de l'iseau de feu.
III. Jeu des princess avec les pommes d'or ("The Princesses play with Golden Apples").
(IIIa). Berceuse ("Lullaby").
IV. Ronde des princesses ("The Princesses dance in a Circle").
V. Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Kastchei (Diabolical Dance by all the subjects of Kastchei").

SOLOIST
SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

TWO LEADERS QUIT

Phila. Inquirer Nov 4

carrying on her campaign by speaking before various organizations.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, gave its first concert of the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included the "Prometheus" music of Beethoven and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" ballet and had the B-flat or so-called "Spring" symphony of Schumann for its principal feature. This latter is a work with which all amateurs are agreeably familiar. Bright, buoyant and melodiously beautiful it is as fresh and sparkling as the morning dew and it aptly and eloquently expresses the spirit of the season with which it is identified. It was competently and enjoyably played, with a good quality of tone and considerable brilliancy of execution, and the appreciative tribute which the performance elicited from a critical audience was very well deserved.

That the orchestra is all that once it was is more than could truthfully be said, for in the processes of disintegration and reconstruction through which it has lately passed something and even much of its former unrivaled unity and homogeniety has unavoidably been lost. To recover the perfection to which through a continuity of management extended over a period of more than thirty years it had been brought, is much more than can be accomplished over night. It must be the work of time. It is, however, gratifying to note that under Mr. Monteux's able and devoted guidance substantial progress is being made. Certainly the orchestra played better last night, with a greater precision, a more flexible mobility and a finer harmony of ensemble, than it has at any time since its disruption, and that the prestige it once enjoyed will eventually be regained may be regarded as assured.

Of the other orchestral numbers on the list the most notable was the Stravinsky ballet, which although it loses something by reason of its dissociation from the dance which it is intended to accompany, was impressive and interesting in its ultra-modern originality. Stravinsky deals too much in daring dissonances for his score to be pleasing to the ear in a tuneful way, but the effects which he produces are often extraordinary, and while one may not always approve of it his music is continuously interesting. The assisting artist of the occasion was that admirable Russian pianist, Mr. Sergie Rachmaninoff, whose great reputation as a virtuos was fully sustained by his masterly reading of the E-flat concerto of Liszt. This is a more sympathetic and substantial composition than the one that was heard last week and Rachmaninoff played it for all it was worth.

WILL TELL NEEDS

Bulletin
ladelphia, Pa.
NOV 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony

Monteux Conducts Opening Concert With Rachmaninoff, Soloist

FROM Schumann and Beethoven, with an interlude in the form of a Liszt piano concerto, to the ultra-modern Stravinsky, ranged the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season, in the Academy of Music last evening. The concert introduced Pierre Monteux as the permanent conductor of the organization, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, as soloist.

It was not the first time Monteux had directed the Boston musicians in this city, though his initial appearance as their regular conductor, and as such he was received with marked cordiality and appreciation. Thus, while best known here as one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company, his ability as a purely orchestral leader also had been duly recognized, so that his success last evening calls for no extended comment. Monteux has much of the French poise and polish, the inclination to idealize and to give emphasis to the poetic and the romantic, but there is a sufficiency of firmness and authority in his conducting, so that he holds his forces well in hand and seems to inspire the players to do their best.

The symphony was the popular "Spring" of Schumann—at least it has been given this appellation of the vernal dawn of the year, and not inappropriately. It is a work of buoyant spirit and inherent charm, flowering like the springtime itself, with veritable fields of melodious blossoms. It was played with admirable precision and verve, though the tone at times was more brilliant than full and mellow, with even some tendency to stridency on the part of the brasses. There was perhaps more real pleasure for most of the listeners in the Beethoven ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," which followed, particularly in the adagio, with its series of solos for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, played with fine effect, respectively, by Messrs. Bedetti, Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy.

The Liszt Concerto in E-flat major is florid and exacting in its technical requirements, after the characteristic manner of the composer, and, served to show Rachmaninoff's ability as a pianist of the "showy" sort, in contrast to the more serious aspect of some of his former appearances here. He played the intricate composition with much beauty of tone, poetic feeling and rare brilliancy of execution. It was a noteworthy achievement, which won for him a veritable ovation of applause.

At the end came the Stravinsky ballet suite, "L'Oiseau de Feu." ("Bird of Fire") which was given here in its dance form by the Russian Ballet several years ago. It is interesting for its unusual effects, ingenious and weird enough to satisfy the most ardent lover of "modernistic" music, and was remarkably played and evidently enjoyed by at least a portion of the audience. But it is the sort of picturesque, descriptive music that is most appropriately played as accompaniment to the visualized grotesqueries of the fantastic legend which inspired it.

As to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater last night, several facts require mention particularly.

The orchestra showed itself to be now a great orchestra as to artistic potentialities and development of those potentialities.

The "full house," which was characteristic of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Baltimore before the event which disrupted the orchestra during the world war and which was representative of Baltimore's best in numerous respects, was a realization once more.

The orchestra, under its present and new permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, who appeared as such in Baltimore for the first time last night, revealed possession of a fine personality and individuality which are brilliant, capable and deserving.

A comprehensive and intelligently arranged program was presented.

Baltimoreans were provided with actual opportunity to hear examples of one phase of ultra-modern thought in music.

Baltimoreans had another rare opportunity to hear one of the exceptionally great musicians of the times, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist and composer, both play and produce (with the collaboration of the orchestra) one of his own compositions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its management have every right to be proud of its concert in Baltimore last night, and continuation of this plane of achievement will make its present series of five concerts here, just begun, notable among the valuable art exhibits and mental and spiritual cultural facilities at present available in this city.

It was a magnificent concert, of which the performance of the concerto was the vitalizing element and worth traveling miles and miles to hear. Rachmaninoff showed himself again to be a personage of rare value of whose profoundly moving qualities it is not easy to speak adequately. He was recalled to the stage seven times by the audience. The program consisted of Haydn's Symphony in B flat, "The Queen of France;" Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 3 in D minor; and Stravinsky's suite, arranged by himself from his ballet, "The Fire Bird."

J. N. H.

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Makes His Bow as Regular Conductor at the Academy of Music

The Academy presented a solid, roof-high phalanx of hearers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their new leader, Pierre Monteux, and the enormous art of the pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, last evening. A year ago M. Monteux appeared on the dais as a loan from the Metropolitan Opera till the arrival of Henri Rabaud. Last night saw him confirmed in permanent command. The picture that he makes as a leader and the mental concept from which it proceeds have as little as possible of Prussian militarism about them. His music is not run in the goose-step mold. His baton is persuasive and pleading. Every bit of the curvilinear geometry of his leadership is urbane and suave; he is polite and deferential, as if he felt himself an artist among artists, a gentleman among gentlemen. Yet beneath the velvet of the mode one feels the iron (wrought iron, not cast iron, for the latter is hard and brittle) of a firm authority.

He had brought out the first desk of the first violins and likewise of the second violins from their usual alignment to a place directly under his right hand and his left as he stood upon the dais. The voices of the quartet were not detached from the rest thereby, but they served in a way to link the visible leadership to the audible musical milieu.

The first symphony of Schumann has much to say of the composer's full-hearted domestic happiness—the violins give it lyric utterance, the horns sonorously declaim it, the cellos are the choral re-enforcement of the idea—and all is music, pure, sweet, serene, though now it is a hymn and again it is an idyll. The message that goes from violins to cellos in the slow movement seems the progress of a prayer. Lest the argument should come too close to the seraphim to be human, it is brought down to earth again by the bright, happy dancing of the Scherzo with the bouncing violins and the coherent horns and the delicious flute carried the mood on to the ending "animato e grazioso" as the legend read. All the players afterward were made to rise. In Beethoven's exquisite "Prometheus" ballet music we had five soloists—Bedetti's cello, Laurent's flute, Sands's clarinet, Laus's bassoon, Holy's harp, all masterfully played; and again these players were singled out, thrice, to stand and bow.

The evening's great figure was the Russian supermusician, Rachmaninoff, who, like Kreisler, had put behind his music manliness that exalts and inspires the playing. He does not hold his art out at his arms' length to his audience; he gives his whole being to it utterly, and he makes the notes sing on after his hands leave them by something more than the mere sostenuto of his pedal work. He summons the whole of the piano, even as he mobilizes all of himself, into instant and constant action. His mind presides and his fingers obey; and the Liszt E flat concerto, with the important sibilation of the triangle in the offing, was breathlessly over all too soon. The orchestra players (sure appreciators of an art that is fine and real) were stirred as well as the audience, and they had done their best to make it the superlative and the memorable performance that the thundering applause saluted.

Then came graceful and fanciful Stravinsky—carrying the whimsy over the brink into futurism, and still in the six episodes of "The Bird of Fire" giving us in plangent hues the moving picture of the program. The misty, ghostly spirit-flame seemed to hover above the magic garden; there was a crepuscular whistling up and down the fingerboards, and the harp fell on the ear half bird-note and half bell. Princesses played the game of ball with the golden apples to a swift and shifting pirouette and a tonal iridescence; the Lullaby followed the ethal harp with a sleepy drone of the bassoon, and lastly the "diabolic dance" filled the air with all the outlandish spluttering and quacking that muted brasses could supply.

F. L. W.

Phila. Record Nov 4

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR

Boston Orchestra's Fine Performance—Rachmaninoff Heard.

When Pierre Monteux conducted the first concert of the Boston Orchestra series in the Academy of Music last season it was as an accommodation to the directors of the Boston organization, who engaged him to appear as a substitute for their French conductor, Henri Rabaud. That first concert was one of the most enjoyable of last winter's series, although Monteux was directing a combination of musicians practically strange to him. His appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Orchestra, in the Academy last night, was under different auspices and revealed the well-known operatic director as a musician of singularly appealing charm. He has a fine orchestra and one that shows the result of much drill and hard work. The tone is good, very brilliant, but musical and rhythmic.

The program displayed the orchestra almost entirely in a gay mood, since the evening was largely devoted to expositions of ballet music, even the B flat major symphony of Schumann known as the "Spring Symphony" being full of light and freshness, while the Beethoven composition was a ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and the Stravinsky suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," a dance legend, interspersed with rhythmic, if eccentric, dance motifs. While each work was distinctive and there was a great deal of contrast and variety, such a program required for its successful performance a conductor of skill and dramatic instinct. Monteux made everything interesting, even the ultra Stravinsky music, of which the two most attractive selections of the suite were the "Berceuse" and "The Princesses Play With the Golden Apples." It can easily be foreseen that the Monteux concerts will be a financial and artistic success.

Last night's soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, is evidently to enjoy this season the tremendous vogue he created so suddenly last winter. He drew an audience that exhausted the seating capacity of the Academy, while hundreds were unable to obtain admittance. The Liszt E-flat major Concerto, well worn as it is, was a brilliant thing, fresh and enjoyable in his markedly masculine hands, and its conclusion brought a great ovation to the player and orchestra.

Phila. North Amer. Nov 4

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAKES GOOD START

Opens Here With Excellent Performance; Rachmaninoff Soloist

PROGRAM VARIED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-fifth season here last night with a program of variety and merit and a performance that was excellent. As at the first appearance here last season, Pierre Monteux conducted, but this year the orchestra will remain under his charge, which circumstance augurs happy results and arouses keen expectations for the future.

There was even greater unanimity of playing than we have heard on previous occasions, and the ensemble was warmer and richer. But the string choirs, particularly the first and second violins, have yet to a h eve the volume and color we have in time past found in the playing of this organ zation.

Sergei Rachmaninoff was the so oist. Under his hands the many superfi lal parts of the Liszt E flat minor concerto achieve something akin to greatness. It is a case of the younger genius succoring the older, whose work has been handled unkindly by time. The skill and intellectua ity that Rachmaninoff brought to t is performance gave the concerto a unity that is not always apparent in the work. His seemingly effortless power made the bravura passages truly heroic.

An interesting contrast was the placing of ballet music by Beethoven and Stravinsky on the program. The Beethoven, "Creatures of Prometheus," was lovely in its calm classicism, particularly the "Ballet No. 5," which gave opportunities to the solo cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and the harp. The cello work was especia ly distinguished.

Stravinsky's work, "The Fire Bird" ballet, does not stand the test of the concert platform as well. In the last analysis it is descriptive music, and when divorced from the action much of the interest is lost. The effect is somewhat that of hearing continuous dialogue spoken by concealed actors.

The First Symphony of Schumann headed the program. The changing moods of tender sentiment and fresh exuberance that abound in the work were given full play by Mr. Monteux in his spirited reading.

PRAISE FOR RACHMANINOFF AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Audience Spell-bound by Marvelous Playing of Great Russian Artist—Director Monteux Makes Pleasing Impression.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

There were two strong magnets to draw Philadelphians to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night—curiosity and expectancy; there was curiosity as to how Pierre Monteux would handle the once famous orchestra, and there was the expectancy of hearing the piano played by Sergei Rachmaninoff. Added to these magnetic attractions was the element of a program calculated to interest all types of music lovers—Beethoven and the Schumann First Symphony to satisfy the classicists, the Liszt E flat Piano Concerto to thrill the emotionalists and the Stravinski "Fire Bird" music to appease the modernists and sensationalists.

These contrasting composers furnished a program that spoke most promisingly of Mr. Monteux as a program maker; fortunately he will not be confronted with the war-time bans and prejudices that handicapped the programs of Mr. Rabaud, nor is there reason to fear that he will suffer the attacks of "program-profounditis" that spasmodically seized Karl Muck. Mr. Monteux is quite a different type of man from either of his two immediate predecessors; his personality embraces the "politesse" of the affable Henri Rabaud, but unlike Mr. Rabaud in that he can, when the occasion requires, give full rein to a temperament that is basically fiery, enthusiastic and intense. Whether his attributes comprise some of the scholarly attainments of Mr. Muck cannot be determined at this early date, nor is it possible to judge the result of his taking command of the Boston Orchestra.

Judgment Not Possible at Present.

It requires more than a few months of close association between orchestra players and conductor, in order to estimate the influence of the leader and the ability and willingness of the men to transmute his impressions and inspirations; it also requires that the conductor have intimate knowledge of the playing ability of each man under him, that he may know just what sort of material there is, with which to mold his work of art. So that while the prospects regarding the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra are full of rosy promise, it is not possible, at present, to say that any especially prominent results are yet apparent.

Given two or three seasons to become acclimated, to know his men and for them to know him, and he will most probably restore the orchestra to its one-time standard of excellence; his musicianship is a known quantity, his personality can be pretty accurately surmised, but his ability to take Muck's "left-overs" and subjugate them to his baton is for the future to decide—we hope and believe that he can do it.

Of the other attraction at last night's concert it is ever a delight to speak. He is the man of the hour on the concert platform, composer of some of the great music of his day and possing a technical equipment that makes him a true virtuso—a sort of Rubinstein of this generation.

Meets Natural Enthusiasm.

Mr. Rachmanninoff decided on Franz Liszt as the composer to be delineated at the concert last night and selected the E at Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. The famous concerto, with its wealth of melody, masterly orchestration, dazzling pianistics and fine balance between piano and orchestra, everything in fact that goes into the make-up of a great concerto—this concerto was played by Mr. Rachmanninoff in such masterly style that the enthusiasm that seized the audience was perfectly natural emotion—the people had listened to a great artist's reading of a great work.

The soloist was recalled and recalled, it seemed that he could not bow often enough to satisfy his worshiping audience.

The first number of the program was the Robert Schumann "Spring" Symphony, full of grateful music from the first page till the last. Mr. Monteux at once showed that his is no turgid conception of the symphony—there was a vigorous rhythmic swing to the first movement that kept it vital throughout. The three other movements were given a correspondingly energetic interpretation and especially in the last movement did the orchestra begin to sound like the old Boston Symphony.

Beethoven's Overture and charming ballet music followed. In the ballet music the first 'cellist, flutist, clairionetist, harpist and first bassoon became for the time being something akin to soloists—in fact the ballet music (the Adagio, No. 5), seemed quite like a piece of chamber music. Beethoven's music was followed by the Liszt Concerto, and the program concluded with the Suite of Igor Stravinski, intended as a musical accompaniment to the pantomimic Russian Legend, "The Bird of Fire." Stravinski's fantastic music has been played here before, so that it was not a complete novelty to Philadelphians last night.

But fascinating as is "The Bird of Fire," it will doubtless require many hearings before it becomes a favorite with the average concert-goer. The professional musician is intensely interested in Stravinski's often grotesque instrumentations, and in truth there is plenty of food for thought and emulation in the scoring of the composition, but the layman misses the cleverness of the thing, he cannot be expected to catch at first or even second hearing the obscured melodic material and consequently he is firmly convinced that he is listening to mere noise. However, Stravinski's "Bird of Fire" does contain some mighty interesting pages of real music, and while of course its most powerful influence is felt when it is carrying out its mission (that of supplying a musical background for a ballet), nevertheless it is a most welcome addition to the orchestra programs of today.

PROGRAM.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor.

Schumann
Symphony in B-flat major No 1, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace; Trio I; Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
IV, Allegro animato e grazioso.

Beethoven
"The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Overture.
Ballet No. 5, Adagio.
(Violoncello solo, J. Bedetti; flute, G. Laurent; clarinet, A. Sand; bassoon, A. Laus; harp, A. Holy).

Liszt
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

Stravinsky
Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Bird of Fire"), a Danced Legend.
I. Introduction; Jardin enchante de Kastchei et danse de l'oiseau de feu ("Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Bird of Fire").
II. Supplications de l'oiseau de feu.
III. Jeu des princess avec les pommes d'or ("The Princesses play with Golden Apples").
(IIIa). Berceuse ("Lullaby").
IV. Ronde des princesses ("The Princesses dance in a Circle").
V. Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Kastchei (Diabolical Dance by all the subjects of Kastchei").

SOLOIST
SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

---

carrying on her campaign by speaking before various organizations.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, gave its first concert of the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included the "Prometheus" music of Beethoven and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" ballet and had the B-flat or so-called "Spring" symphony of Schumann for its principal feature. This latter is a work with which all amateurs are agreeably familiar. Bright, buoyant and melodiously beautiful it is as fresh and sparkling as the morning dew and it aptly and eloquently expresses the spirit of the season with which it is identified. It was competently and enjoyably played, with a good quality of tone and considerable brilliancy of execution, and the appreciative tribute which the performance elicited from a critical audience was very well deserved.

That the orchestra is all that once it was is more than could truthfully be said, for in the processes of disintergration and reconstruction through which it has lately passed something and even much of its former unrivaled unity and homogeniety has unavoidably been lost. To recover the perfection to which through a continuity of management extended over a period of more than thirty years it had been brought, is much more than can be accomplished over night. It must be the work of time. It is, however, gratifying to note that under Mr. Monteux's able and devoted guidance substantial progress is being made. Certainly the orchestra played better last night, with a greater precision, a more flexible mobility and a finer harmony of ensemble, than it has at any time since its disruption, and that the prestige it once enjoyed will eventually be regained may be regarded as assured.

Of the other orchestral numbers on the list the most notable was the Stravinsky ballet, which although it loses something by reason of its dissociation from the dance which it is intended to accompany, was impressive and interesting in its ultra-modern originality. Stravinsky deals too much in daring dissorances for his score to be pleasing to the ear in a tuneful way, but the effects which he produces are often extraordinary, and while one may not always approve of it his music is continuously interesting. The assisting artist of the occasion was that admirable Russian pianist, Mr. Sergie Rachmaninoff, whose great reputation as a virtuos was fully sustained by his masterly reading of the E-flat concerto of Liszt. This is a more sympathetic and substantial composition than the one that was heard last week and Rachmaninoff played it for all it was worth.

Phila. Inquirer Nov 4

TWO LEADERS QUIT

WILL TELL NEEDS

Bulletin Philadelphia, Pa. NOV 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony

Monteux Conducts Opening Concert With Rachmaninoff, Soloist

FROM Schumann and Beethoven, with an interlude in the form of a Liszt piano concerto, to the ultra-modern Stravinsky, ranged the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season, in the Academy of Music last evening. The concert introduced Pierre Monteux as the permanent conductor of the organization, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, as soloist.

It was not the first time Monteux had directed the Boston musicians in this city, though his initial appearance as their regular conductor, and as such he was received with marked cordiality and appreciation. Thus, while best known here as one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company, his ability as a purely orchestral leader also had been duly recognized, so that his success last evening calls for no extended comment. Monteux has much of the French poise and polish, the inclination to idealize and to give emphasis to the poetic and the romantic, but there is a sufficiency of firmness and authority in his conducting, so that he holds his forces well in hand and seems to inspire the players to do their best.

The symphony was the popular "Spring" of Schumann—at least it has been given this appellation of the vernal dawn of the year, and not inappropriately. It is a work of buoyant spirit and inherent charm, flowering, like the springtime itself, with veritable fields of melodious blossoms. It was played with admirable precision and verve, though the tone at times was more brilliant than full and mellow, with even some tendency to stridency on the part of the brasses. There was perhaps more real pleasure for most of the listeners in the Beethoven ballet. "The Creatures of Prometheus," which followed, particularly in the adagio, with its series of solos for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, played with fine effect, respectively, by Messrs. Bedetti, Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy.

The Liszt Concerto in E flat major is florid and exacting in its technical requirements, after the characteristic manner of the composer, and, served to show Rachmaninoff's ability as a pianist of the "showy" sort, in contrast to the more serious aspect of some of his former appearances here. He played the intricate composition with much beauty of tone, poetic feeling and rare brilliancy of execution. It was a noteworthy achievement, which won for him a veritable ovation of applause.

At the end came the Stravinsky ballet suite, "L'Oiseau de Feu," ("Bird of Fire"), which was given here in its dance form by the Russian Ballet several years ago. It is interesting for its unusual effects, ingenious and weird enough to satisfy the most ardent lover of "modernistic" music, and was remarkably played and evidently enjoyed by at least a portion of the audience. But it is the sort of picturesque, descriptive music that is most appropriately played as accompaniment to the visualized grotesqueries of the fantastic legend which inspired it.

As to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater last night, several facts require mention particularly.

The orchestra showed itself to be now a great orchestra as to artistic potentialities and development of those potentialities.

The "full house," which was characteristic of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Baltimore before the event which disrupted the orchestra during the world war and which was representative of Baltimore's best in numerous respects, was a realization once more.

The orchestra, under its present and new permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, who appeared as such in Baltimore for the first time last night, revealed possession of a new personality and individuality which are brilliant, capable and deserving.

A comprehensive and intelligently arranged program was presented.

Baltimoreans were provided an actual opportunity to hear examples of one phase of ultra-modern thought in music.

Baltimoreans had another rare opportunity to hear one of the exceptionally great musicians of the times, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist and composer, both play and produce (with the collaboration of the orchestra) one of his own compositions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its management have every right to be proud of its concert in Baltimore last night, and continuation of this plane of achievement will make its present series of five concerts here, just begun, notable among the valuable art exhibits and mental and spiritual cultural facilities at present available in this city.

It was a magnificent concert, of which the performance of the concerto was the vitalizing element and worth traveling miles and miles to hear. Rachmaninoff showed himself again to be a personage of rare value of whose profoundly moving qualities it is not easy to speak adequately. He was recalled to the stage seven times by the audience. The program consisted of Haydn's symphony in B flat, "The Queen of France;" Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 3 in D minor; and Stravinsky's suite, arranged by himself from his ballet, "The Fire Bird."

J. N. H.

Boston American
Nov 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

MONTEUX, NEW CONDUCTOR, IS WARMLY GREETED.

RACHMANINOFF IS SOLOIST

Russian Pianist Presents Own Composition and Wins Favor of Capacity Audience at the Lyric—Program Is of Excellent Character and Reflects Genius of New Director—Society Folk Turn Out and Hold Box Parties.

With Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, made its first appearance of the season last night at the Lyric before the largest audience that has appeared at the Boston Symphony Concerts in Baltimore for several years. Every seat in the house was taken, and a large number were standing in the rear of the hall, the seats having all been sold early in the afternoon. There were a number of box parties and society was well represented throughout the audience.

Monteux, who was formerly conductor of the ballet and French operas with the Metropolitan Opera Company, was remembered in Baltimore for the magnificent way in which he conducted temporarily the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the city during the early part of last season, and when he appeared on the stage last night as the new conductor of the orchestra he was hailed with delight. The audience could feel the new life and vigor that thrilled the players the moment the baton was lifted, and the tonal balance, quality and spirit of the ensemble as the program advanced spoke eloquently for the splendid ability of the conductor as well as the genius of the orchestra.

Rachmaninoff, who has created such a furore in America since his first apeparance in this country in 1909, was received with the same enthusiasm accorded him last year when he was heard with the Boston Symphony. His playing has increased in technical finish and interpretation, and in the presentation of his own composition, a concerto No. 3 in D. minor, he manifested such freedom and inspiration that he was met at the conclusion with such a storm of applause that it almost brought down the house, and he was recalled again and again to the platform, although no encores were given.

The concerto is characteristic of all Rachmaninoff's music—sombre and brooding at times, filled with Slavic beauty, and again almost tempestuous in its emotional qualities.

In addition to Rachmaninoff's concerto, in which the orchestra had the happy faculty of playing a real accomplishment, bringing the piano into strong relief, Monteux opened his program with a Haydn's historic symphony in B-flat, inscribed "The Queen of France, in honor, it is said, of Marie Antoinette; and concluded it with a twentieth century composition, Stravinsky's Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" (The Fire Bird).

Monteux, who conducted a performance of this ballet in London and at the Theater des Champs Elysees, proved a real interpreter in his perfect control of the orchestra through the delicate and swirling passages so full of color and beauty, and gave such a vivid picture that the fantasia legend became almost a reality, and the audience seemed loath to leave at the end.

Among those in the boxes last night were Mrs. David Bartlett, Mrs. A. W. Gieske, Dr. and Mrs. Julius Friedenwald, Mr. Charles E. Ford, Mr. Robert Lehr, Mrs. William Manly, Dr. Henry Barton Jacobs, Mr. William Lucas and Mr. Swan Frick.

From SUN
Address New York City
Date NOV 6 19

WILSON FAMILY AT CONCERT.

President's Daughters in Boston Symphony Audience.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 4.—Mrs. William G. McAdoo, Mrs. Francis Bowes Sayre and Miss Margaret Wilson, daughters of the President; Mrs. W. H. Bolling and Miss Bolling, mother and sister of Mrs Wilson; Mrs. Garfield and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, occupied the Presidential box at the National Theatre this afternoon for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice-President, was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh in her box.

Lady Swaythling of London, who is the guest of Mme. Groulich, wife of the [illegible] Minister, will sing at [illegible] to be held here [illegible]

Balt. Sun.
Nov. 6 Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Sergei Rachmaninoff.

The first of the current season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, took place last evening at the Lyric, the assisting artist being Sergei Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer-pianist, who is perhaps the most talked of, certainly the most interesting, player on the concert stage today.

The occasion was a gala one in every particular, because the Boston Orchestra, which is in splendid form and played exquisitely last evening, has now definitely regained all of its old-time prestige. The house was entirely sold out, the audience, from a social point of departure, being one of the most brilliant that has assembled at the music hall this winter. Not only were there no vacant seats on the floor of the house, but many persons stood behind the brass rails of the parterre and in the balcony as well, and after Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance the enthusiasm was extraordinary. Some persons even cheered! As usual an additional feature of the entertainment consisted in the turning on and off of the Lyric's trick lights, the psychologic value of this particular diversion, however, being at no time quite apparent. During the symphony only two rows of ceiling lights and the appalling front lights of the boxes were in evidence. During the Stravinsky ballet music the new and blinding nitrogen lights were used. Part of the concerto was given in a sombre half-light, then other globes were flashed on. These things, it is only fair to state, added little to the significance of the program, which last evening was one of extraordinary interest.

The orchestra played first, and with charming grace, the dainty old "Queen of France" symphony, by Haydn, an exquisite thing of its kind, "lavender and old-lace" music, the complement of a romantic age that is passed, and afterward its antithesis, the extraordinarily imaginative Stravinsky ballet score which other conductors have hesitated to present here, fearing that Baltimore would not prove sufficiently receptive to enjoy its fantastic qualities. It is a wonderful work that must be a peculiarly successful expression of the Russian fairy dance drama that it is meant to accompany and its very intricate instrumentation and its delicate tonal qualities were beautifully projected, and with rare skill, by the big band of musicians last evening.

Not for many years has more exquisite piano playing been heard here than that of Mr. Rachmaninoff, the limpid quality of his tone, its sensuous beauty and, at times, its extraordinary brilliance, were incomparable. His performance was marked by rare poetic beauty and by the deepest sympathy always. He played his own third concerto, a splendid work of unusual orchestral richness, in which, as always with the moderns, the piano is used as one instrument of the orchestra rather than as a mere solo instrument. The introspective significance of this work and its frankly nationalistic quality were things that combined to make it a memorable offering, both the work and the composer's reading of it arousing the house to unwonted enthusiasm.

J. O. L.

Balt. Eve. Sun.
Nov. LYRIC 6

The Boston Orchestra And Sergei Rachmaninoff.

It is interesting to note, in considering further the third Rachmaninoff piano concerto, which its distinguished composer played so superbly last evening with the Boston Orchestra, that the day of the purely pianistic concerto no longer obtain, the piano part in the modern works being at times little more than a mere obligato, an arabesque added to the wonderful melodies that are so inimitably developed in the string and wood-wind choirs. This is peculiarly the case in the new Rachmaninoff work, a mystical and inherently poetic composition, that has a strangely introspective suggestion. Like all Russian music, it seems to express a state of mind, moods exalted and depressed, as well as spiritual aspirations, but these characteristics never at any time entirely overshadow its pure romanticism.

The work is more definitely pianistic in the slow movement and is unusual in form in that there are frequent episodes in which the piano alone is played, the orchestra remaining silent, then taking up the thread of the musical discourse in a development that has the quiet, appealing beauty of a nocturne. At times there is a suggestion of mystery, delicate episodes that seem like the passing of the breeze, then comes a more virile passage. The work becomes martial in a series of great crescendos indicative of galloping hosts, the composition ending in a triumphant love song. It is beautifully scored, especially striking passages being the episodes in which the piano is used as a background for a dialogue on the wood-wind.

The pianist gave a wonderful performance of this work, a reading replete with mood and characterized by a rare imaginative instinct. His tone, bell-like and clear, has that limpid, caressing quality that is as rare as it is exquisite. Clean cut and brilliant, the performance of this thoughtful, expressive artist had the most remarkable distinction. He is one of the most interesting figures in the art world today, and last evening he was received with acclaim.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance, very properly, was the "feature" of the evening, but one must not lose sight of the privilege enjoyed in having this opportunity to, at least, hear the Stravinsky "Fire-Bird" music, the most insistent characteristic of which is its extraordinary delicacy. It is a musical fabric of intricate design that fairly shimmers. It has the quality of some amazing piece of changeable silk, because, while it is program music in the accepted sense of the term, it is not seeking to suggest the concrete things of life, but the things of enchantment. It is the musical accompaniment of a pantomime that has to do with an old Russian fairy tale.

There are ogres and princesses, knights that have been turned to stone and mysterious castles which none may enter safely unless protected by some magic talisman. This music has great elusive beauty, its curious resolutions and unusual intervals making for strangely fantastic effects that must indeed be a rare complement to the dancers. Its rhythms are fascinating, and it, too, is replete with mood, yet in spite of its tonal richness it is always a dream mood that it expresses. It scarcely suggests real life at all.

[illegible] exquisitely beautiful epi-

Balt News- Thursday, Nov. 6, 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Glory Of Pre-War Days Recalled By Brilliant Concert, With Rachmaninoff As Soloist.

Conditions in the palmiest days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's splendid pre-war past were never more brilliant than last night, when the organization gave its first local concert of the season at the Lyric under the direction of its new permanent director, Pierre Monteux, and with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer as the soloist.

The concert continued the series of musical successes that have so far made the present season wholly extraordinary. The audience was not only both musical and highly fashionable but it was also very large. Indeed, the house was sold out and many stood.

The Orchestra demonstrated impressively not only that it is equipped to maintain its great traditions but also that it has actually gained decided power since it was last heard here.

M. Monteux's directing throughout was brilliantly successful. Without showing the slightest tendency toward the spectacular, he achieved superb results and his work always was characterized by magnetism to which the players responded as if to a live force.

Surely the selection of no two numbers in the whole range of musical literature could display wider range of taste, greater versatility of appreciation than Haydn's "Queen of France" Symphony, which opened the program, and the suite arranged by Stravinsky from his "L'Oiseau de Feu Ballet," which closed it.

The symphony is a charming example of its composer's style. It is replete with lovely melody, and in respect to this as well as to its orchestration, it seems the very acme of unsophisticated simplicity alongside of such a daringly radical score as the Stravinsky.

The music of "L'Oiseau de Feu" is sui generis, even in an age of wild foreign individualism, to say nothing of the indigenous sort. It is absorbingly interesting from start to finish, with episodes of exquisite poetic nature (such as the "Supplication" and the "Berceuse") taking form against a bizarre background, populous with strange, restless figures. Fantastic sounds arise above the complex outcry of the full orchestra—isolated sounds, now shrill and piercing, now deep-voiced—but through it all clearly defined purpose is discernible and the flitting vision of a new beauty.

It was not strange that the audience did not "get" such a composition at first hearing. It is the kind of music that those who know realize requires the most merciless rehearsing, but which the uninitiated are justified, perhaps, in thinking requires no rehearsing at all.

Not in recent years has any pianist made a profounder impression in this city than Rachmaninoff in the performance of his own Third Concerto. This is a rarely beautiful, an intensely emotional, work, smouldering with passion that, in the big climaxes, bursts forth, as it were, like escaping flames. To hear such a composition played with such mastery of all of the pianist's temperamental and technical resources is an experience long to be remembered. The audience was tremendously stirred and Rachmaninoff was forced to take a succession of calls.

JACK DAW.

[illegible] ece was brill

sode is the fire-bird's plea for freedom after she is caught in the hunter's snare.

But strange and appealing is the "Lullaby" that follows the more lively "Princesses at Play" movement. Even the "Danse Infernal" is a dream orgy. Less material music it would be difficult to imagine. It is all extraordinarily interesting and it was quite exquisitely played last evening by the big orchestra, which was in splendid form, Pierre Monteux conducting with a fine sympathy throughout the concert.

The symphony with which the concert opened was the delicious old fourth of Haydn's "Loge Olympique" group, the one in B-flat major, popularly known as "La Reine de France," because of the unproved legend that it was the favorite symphony of Marie Antoinette—dainty, elegant music that was played last evening with delightful spirit and clean attack by Mr. Monteux's men.

J. O. L.

m EVENING SUN
dress New York City
NOV 7 - 191

Music

Boston's Orchestra.

With two symphony orchestras beginning their seasons of concerts, yesterday's was a tale of two cities. The evening brought to Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux elevated from his last year's transiency to the position of permanent conductor. Strides not politic to describe have brought at least two of our own local orchestras to the brink of excellence, but the fact remains that as an organization of concerted skill it will be difficult for any of them this year, the next or the next, to reach the Bostonian high music mark.

The gnash and crackle of former seasons playing is undoubtedly gone; let it go. There are other styles of conducting, and Mr. Monteux has one quite his own. A gentler, kindlier handling of the score and its interpreters need not make for dulness; it certainly does not under M. Monteux, whose Metropolitan experiences were thorough and catholic enough to tell him that American tastes are not wholly French—either of subjects or their handling. Under his baton reign elegance, mildness, a fine grace. More sprightliness, too, than under Rabaud's of last season. And it need not remain to be seen—since it is already evident—that with these softer promptings the Boston is still the admirable, invariably capable orchestra of the unmentionable past.

Schumann's first symphony commenced a programme of no very unusual interest. The spring passions which Schumann liked to call attention to in it were not so vehemently accentuated but that the whole was an exquisite pattern. Flower beds rather than rioting hillsides; little brown bulbs of thematic material blossoming nicely into the rows of blooms they had the musical right to hope to be. Later on came the Rumanian Enesco's suite for orchestra, opus 9, first heard here eight years ago, preceded by Debussy's "Afternoon of Faun," tried and true as a concert favorite, now that the much mooted—and alas, hooted—veil of Nijinsky the Mallarmite has drifted away to be a foolish cloud across the face of oblivion.

Let fly, now, all historical interest toward the one other piece upon the programme, portions of a ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven. Doubtless it is good and proper altogether to delve back into the all too open books of masters. Pearls are always humbly housed in their beginnings. But in such an example as this ballet an old Prometheus is caught napping and a young Beethoven striving. Curiosity and deference are the bad boys of music. When they go into the garden to dig up Beethoven eighth-rate they should be kept away from the dining room table. The sweetly pretty adagio from the ballet gained its effects only by the worthiness with which it was performed; the overture could not manage even this.

The matchless band from Boston town brought with it to Carnegie Hall a programme of stimulating variety and a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. A new conductor, for though a year ago Mr. Monteux led two concerts of the orchestra in New York, he was then only its "acting" chief. He has now been installed regularly. His first programme for New York consisted of Schumann's symphony in B flat, the overture, and the fifth ballet piece from Beethoven's ballet "The Creatures of Prometheus," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the Enesco suite for orchestra op. 9.

The "Spring" symphony of Schumann used to be a battle horse of the Boston orchestra when Wilhelm Gericke held the reins. Persons who cherish the delusion that Gericke was a cold and sluggish classicist, interested exclusively in technical details, should have heard his reading of this symphony. But no one could read the thrice familiar work more romantically, with more of the ecstatic lift and rush of spring, than did Mr. Monteux last night. In the first movement the orchestral tone was not wholly clarified; a bit too much of March lingered in the blare of the brasses. But this condition was transient; orchestra and conductor had not quite struck their pace. The performance of the scherzo, with its two trios, was something to treasure in the memory, and the finale was most inspiriting.

The Beethoven overture, well played, sounded unimportant because musically it is unimportant — Beethoven at low ebb—but the pretty ballet adagio, which, I believe, had not been heard in local concert rooms in years and years, sounded quite delicious, being played exquisitely, save for some rasping by the solo 'cello.

Then came the topmost peak of the concert, "The Afternoon of a Faun." Mr. Monteux is the acknowledged prophet and high priest of Debussy. Others lead the prelude to Mallarmé's eclogue and the results are more or less satisfactory, but Mr. Monteux leads it as Debussy himself might. It is a vain thing to babble about understanding, poetry, adjustment, and quality of tone; the performance of the prelude last night was of breathless beauty, more beautiful even than performances of the same work conducted by Mr. Monteaux when he was with the Diaghileff ballet troupe by reason of the superiority of the orchestra yesterday.

The unison prelude to Enesco's suite served to proclaim the incomparable quality of the Boston strings, a rich sonority and a precision without flaw. The piece was led and played with a grand flourish; one thought of a super-Ysaye fiddling supremely on a Brobdingnagian fiddle. The minuet is quaint and intriguing in workmanship, but overlong. The "Intermède" has both charm and brevity, and the vigorous finale tops off a corner in capital fashion. The performance of the entire suite was masterly and Mr. Monteux made the ending properly exhilarating.

The behavior of the audience, which filled the hall, was interesting. Mr. Monteux, a former soldier of the French army, it received as coolly as if the United States had lately been at war with France. The chill was diminished perceptibly at the end of the Schumann symphony, but the amount of applause hardly warranted Mr. Monteaux in bidding his men, as he did, to rise and acknowledge it with him. The Beethoven adagio and the Debussy piece were received a trifle more warmly. This is indeed a topsy-turvy world. The latest symphony audience in frigid Boston broke into cheers. Here is exuberant New York freezing a visitor on its own hearthstone.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 7

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
NOV 7 - 19

Music.

Monteux Leads Bostonians in Brilliant Concert.

The orchestral season took a big additional spurt in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The afternoon brought the first concert this autumn of the Symphony Society; the evening, the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The former event, like the New England preacher on Thanksgiving Day, can be left to take care of itself. The pieces played were Brahms's C minor symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto (with Albert Spalding as the solo fiddler), and the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

This is a programme that some authorities pronounce safe and sane; others, unsafe and insane. Happily, the professional concert goer does not

The swelling flood of orchestral music now sweeping New York was augmented by the first performances yesterday of two famous orchestras in Carnegie Hall, the New York Symphony in the afternoon, with Walter Damrosch as conductor for the thirty-fifth year of his career, and the Boston Symphony in the evening with Pierre Monteux, formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, leading the players from the Hub for the first time in New York.

The soliist with the New York Symphony was Albert Spalding, who played Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor with his usual artistic understanding.

Mr. Damrosch through his orchestra gave a finished performance in both the Wagner and Brahms numbers, to the evident satisfaction of a rather critically inclined audience which filled the hall.

Mr. Monteux was happier in leading his players through modern works, like Dubussy's "Afternoon with a Faun" and Enescos Suite than in the First Symphony of Schumann.

Balt American
Nov 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

MONTEUX, NEW CONDUCTOR, IS WARMLY GREETED.

RACHMANINOFF IS SOLOIST

Russian Pianist Presents Own Composition and Wins Favor of Capacity Audience at the Lyric—Program Is of Excellent Character and Reflects Genius of New Director—Society Folk Turn Out and Hold Box Parties.

With Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, made its first appearance of the season last night at the Lyric before the largest audience that has appeared at the Boston Symphony Concerts in Baltimore for several years. Every seat in the house was taken, and a large number were standing in the rear of the hall, the seats having all been sold early in the afternoon. There were a number of box parties and society was well represented throughout the audience.

Monteux, who was formerly conductor of the ballet and French operas with the Metropolitan Opera Company, was remembered in Baltimore for the magnificent way in which he conducted temporarily the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the city during the early part of last season, and when he appeared on the stage last night as the new conductor of the orchestra he was hailed with delight. The audience could feel the new life and vigor that thrilled the players the moment the baton was lifted, and the tonal balance, quality and spirit of the ensemble as the program advanced spoke eloquently for the splendid ability of the conductor as well as the genius of the orchestra.

Rachmaninoff, who has created such a furore in America since his first appearance in this country in 1909, was received with the same enthusiasm accorded him last year when he was heard with the Boston Symphony. His playing has increased in technical finish and interpretation, and in the presentation of his own composition, a concerto No. 3 in D. minor, he manifested such freedom and inspiration that he was met at the conclusion with such a storm of applause that it almost brought down the house, and he was recalled again and again to the platform, although no encores were given.

The concerto is characteristic of all Rachmaninoff's music—sombre and brooding at times, filled with Slavic beauty, and again almost tempestuous in its emotional qualities.

In addition to Rachmaninoff's concerto, in which the orchestra had the happy faculty of playing a real accomplishment, bringing the piano into strong relief, Monteux opened his program with a Haydn's historic symphony in B-flat, inscribed "The Queen of France, in honor, it is said, of Marie Antoinette; and concluded it with a twentieth century composition, Stravinsky's Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" (The Fire Bird).

Monteux, who conducted a performance of this ballet in London and at the Theater des Champs Elysees, proved a real interpreter in his perfect control of the orchestra through the delicate and swirling passages so full of color and beauty, and gave such a vivid picture that the fantasia legend became almost a reality, and the audience seemed loath to leave at the end.

Among those in the boxes last night were Mrs. David Bartlett, Mrs. A. W. Gieske, Dr. and Mrs. Julius Friedenwald, Mr. Charles E. Ford, Mr. Robert Lehr, Mrs. William Manly, Dr. Henry Barton Jacobs, Mr. William Lucas and Mr. Swan Frick.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date

WILSON FAMILY AT CONCERT.

President's Daughters in Boston Symphony Audience.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 4.—Mrs. William G. McAdoo, Mrs. Francis Bowes Sayre and Miss Margaret Wilson, daughters of the President; Mrs. W. H. Bolling and Miss Bolling, mother and sister of Mrs Wilson; Mrs. Garfield and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, occupied the Presidential box at the National Theatre this afternoon for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice-President, was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh in her box.

Lady Swaythling of London, who is the guest of Mme. Grouitch, wife of the Serbian Minister, will sing at the Serbian fete to be held here Thursday

Balt. Sun.
Nov. 6

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Sergei Rachmaninoff.

The first of the current season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, took place last evening at the Lyric, the assisting artist being Sergei Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer-pianist, who is perhaps the most talked of, certainly the most interesting, player on the concert stage today.

The occasion was a gala one in every particular, because the Boston Orchestra, which is in splendid form and played exquisitely last evening, has now definitely regained all of its old-time prestige. The house was entirely sold out, the audience, from a social point of departure, being one of the most brilliant that has assembled at the music hall this winter. Not only were there no vacant seats on the floor of the house, but many persons stood behind the brass rails of the parterre and in the balcony as well, and after Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance the enthusiasm was extraordinary. Some persons even cheered! As usual an additional feature of the entertainment consisted in the turning on and off of the Lyric's trick lights, the psychologic value of this particular diversion, however, being at no time quite apparent. During the symphony only two rows of ceiling lights and the appalling front lights of the boxes were in evidence. During the Stravinsky ballet music the new and blinding nitrogen lights were used. Part of the concerto was given in a sombre half-light, then other globes were flashed on. These things, it is only fair to state, added little to the significance of the program, which last evening was one of extraordinary interest.

The orchestra played first, and with charming grace, the dainty old "Queen of France" symphony, by Haydn, an exquisite thing of its kind, "lavender and old-lace" music, the complement of a romantic age that is passed, and afterward its antithesis, the extraordinarily imaginative Stravinsky ballet score, which other conductors have hesitated to present here, fearing that Baltimore would not prove sufficiently receptive to enjoy its fantastic qualities. It is a wonderful work that must be a peculiarly successful expression of the Russian fairy dance drama that it is meant to accompany and its very intricate instrumentation and its delicate tonal qualities were beautifully projected, and with rare skill, by the big band of musicians last evening.

Not for many years has more exquisite piano playing been heard here than that of Mr. Rachmaninoff, the limpid quality of his tone, its sensuous beauty and, at times, its extraordinary brilliance, were incomparable. His performance was marked by rare poetic beauty and by the deepest sympathy always. He played his own third concerto, a splendid work of unusual orchestral richness, in which, as always with the moderns, the piano is used as one instrument of the orchestra rather than as a mere solo instrument. The introspective significance of this work and its frankly nationalistic quality were things that combined to make it a memorable offering, both the work and the composer's reading of it arousing the house to unwonted enthusiasm.

J. O. L.

Balt. Sun.
Nov. 6

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra And Sergei Rachmaninoff.

It is interesting to note, in considering further the third Rachmaninoff piano concerto, which its distinguished composer played so superbly last evening with the Boston Orchestra, that the days of the purely pianistic concerto no longer obtain, the piano part in the modern works being at times little more than a mere obligato, an arabesque added to the wonderful melodies that are so intricably developed in the string and wood-wind choirs. This is peculiarly the case in the new Rachmaninoff work, a mystical and inherently poetic composition, that has a strangely introspective suggestion. Like all Russian music, it seems to express a state of mind, moods exalted and depressed, as well as spiritual aspirations, but these characteristics never at any time entirely overshadow its pure romanticism.

The work is more definitely pianistic in the slow movement and is unusual in form in that there are frequent episodes in which the piano alone is played, the orchestra remaining silent, then taking up the thread of the musical discourse in a development that has the quiet, appealing beauty of a nocturne. At times there is a suggestion of mystery, delicate episodes that seem like the passing of the breeze, then comes a more virile passage. The work becomes martial in a series of great crescendos indicative of galloping hosts, the composition ending in a triumphant love song. It is beautifully scored, especially striking passages being the episodes in which the piano is used as a background for a dialogue on the wood-wind.

The pianist gave a wonderful performance of this work, a reading replete with mood and characterized by a rare imaginative instinct. His tone, bell-like and clear, has that limpid, caressing quality that is as rare as it is exquisite. Clean cut and brilliant, the performance of this thoughtful, expressive artist had the most remarkable distinction. He is one of the most interesting figures in the art world today, and last evening he was received with acclaim.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance, very properly, was the "feature" of the evening, but one must not lose sight of the privilege enjoyed in having this opportunity to, at least, hear the Stravinsky "Fire-Bird" music, the most insistent characteristic of which is its extraordinary delicacy. It is a musical fabric of intricate design that fairly shimmers. It has the quality of some amazing piece of changeable silk, because, while it is program music in the accepted sense of the term, it is not seeking to suggest the concrete things of life, but the things of enchantment. It is the musical accompaniment of a pantomime that has to do with an old Russian fairy tale.

There are ogres and princesses, knights that have been turned to stone and mysterious castles which none may enter safely unless protected by some magic talisman. This music has great elusive beauty, its curious resolutions and unusual intervals making for strangely fantastic effects that must indeed be a rare complement to the dancers. Its rhythms are fascinating, and it, too, is replete with mood, yet in spite of its tonal richness it is always a dream mood that it expresses. It scarcely suggests real life at all.

[illegible] exquisitely beautiful epi-

Balt News- Thursday, Nov. 6, 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Glory Of Pre-War Days Recalled By Brilliant Concert, With Rachmaninoff As Soloist.

Conditions in the palmiest days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's splendid pre-war past were never more brilliant than last night, when the organization gave its first local concert of the season at the Lyric under the direction of its new permanent director, Pierre Monteux, and with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer as the soloist.

The concert continued the series of musical successes that have so far made the present season wholly extraordinary. The audience was not only both musical and highly fashionable but it was also very large. Indeed, the house was sold out and many stood.

The Orchestra demonstrated impressively not only that it is equipped to maintain its great traditions but also that it has actually gained decided power since it was last heard here.

M. Monteux's directing throughout was brilliantly successful. Without showing the slightest tendency toward the spectacular, he achieved superb results and his work always was characterized by magnetism to which the players responded as if to a live force.

Surely the selection of no two numbers in the whole range of musical literature could display wider range of taste, greater versatility of appreciation than Haydn's "Queen of France" Symphony, which opened the program, and the suite arranged by Stravinsky from his "L'Oiseau de Feu Ballet," which closed it.

The symphony is a charming example of its composer's style. It is replete with lovely melody, and in respect to this as well as to its orchestration, it seems the very acme of unsophisticated simplicity alongside of such a daringly radical score as the Stravinsky.

The music of "L'Oiseau de Feu" is sui generis, even in an age of wild foreign individualism, to say nothing of the indigenous sort. It is absorbingly interesting from start to finish, with episodes of exquisite poetic nature (such as the "Supplication" and the "Berceuse") taking form against a bizarre background, populous with strange, restless figures. Fantastic sounds arise above the complex outcry of the full orchestra—isolated sounds, now shrill and piercing, now deep-voiced—but through it all clearly defined purpose is discernible and the flitting vision of a new beauty.

It was not strange that the audience did not "get" such a composition at first hearing. It is the kind of music that those who know realize requires the most merciless rehearsing, but which the uninitiated are justified, perhaps, in thinking requires no rehearsing at all.

Not in recent years has any pianist made a profounder impression in this city than Rachmaninoff in the performance of his own Third Concerto. This is a rarely beautiful, an intensely emotional, work, smouldering with passion that, in the big climaxes, bursts forth, as it were, like escaping flames. To hear such a composition played with such mastery of all of the pianist's temperamental and technical resources is an experience long to be remembered. The audience was tremendously stirred and Rachmaninoff was forced to take a succession of calls.

JACK DAW.

[illegible] pce was brilli

The most [illegible] episode is the fire-bird's plea for freedom after she is caught in the hunter's snare.

But strange and appealing is the "Lullaby" that follows the more lively "Princesses at Play" movement. Even the "Danse Infernal" is a dream orgy. Less material music it would be difficult to imagine. It is all extraordinarily interesting and it was quite exquisitely played last evening by the big orchestra, which was in splendid form, Pierre Monteux conducting with a fine sympathy throughout the concert.

The symphony with which the concert opened was the delicious old fourth of Haydn's "Loge Olympique" group, the one in B-flat major, popularly known as "La Reine de France," because of the unproved legend that it was the favorite symphony of Marie Antoinette—dainty, elegant music that was played last evening with delightful spirit and clean attack by Mr. Monteux's men.

J. O. L.

m EVENING SUN

dress New York City

Music

Boston's Orchestra.

With two symphony orchestras beginning their seasons of concerts, yesterday's was a tale of two cities. The evening brought to Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux elevated from his last year's transiency to the position of permanent conductor. Strides not politic to describe have brought at least two of our own local orchestras to the brink of excellence, but the fact remains that as an organization of concerted skill it will be difficult for any of them this year, the next or the next, to reach the Bostonian high music mark.

The gnash and crackle of former seasons playing is undoubtedly gone; let it go. There are other styles of conducting, and Mr. Monteux has one quite his own. A gentler, kindlier handling of the score and its interpreters need not make for dulness; it certainly does not under M. Monteux, whose Metropolitan experiences were thorough and catholic enough to tell him that American tastes are not wholly French—either of subjects or their handling. Under his baton reign elegance, mildness, a fine grace. More sprightliness, too, than under Rabaud's of last season. And it need not remain to be seen—since it is already evident—that with these softer promptings the Boston is still the admirable, invariably capable orchestra of the unmentionable past.

Schumann's first symphony commenced a programme of no very unusual interest. The spring passions which Schumann liked to call attention to in it were not so vehemently accentuated but that the whole was an exquisite pattern. Flower beds rather than rioting hillsides; little brown bulbs of thematic material blossoming nicely into the rows of blooms they had the musical right to hope to be. Later on came the Rumanian Enesco's suite for orchestra, opus 9, first heard here eight years ago, preceded by Debussy's "Afternoon of Faun," tried and true as a concert favorite, now that the much mooted—and alas, hooted—veil of Nijinsky the Mallarmite has drifted away to be a foolish cloud across the face of oblivion.

Let fly, now, all historical interest toward the one other piece upon the programme, portions of a ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven. Doubtless it is good and proper altogether to delve back into the all too open books of masters. Pearls are always humbly housed in their beginnings. But in such an example as this ballet an old Prometheus is caught napping and a young Beethoven striving. Curiosity and deference are the bad boys of music. When they go into the garden to dig up Beethoven eighth-rate they should be kept away from the dining room table. The sweetly pretty adagio from the ballet gained its effects only by the worthiness with which it was performed; the overture could not manage even this.

The matchless band from Boston town brought with it to Carnegie Hall a programme of stimulating variety and a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. A new conductor, for though a year ago Mr. Monteux led two concerts of the orchestra in New York, he was then only its "acting" chief. He has now been installed regularly. His first programme for New York consisted of Schumann's symphony in B flat, the overture, and the fifth ballet piece from Beethoven's ballet "The Creatures of Prometheus," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the Enesco suite for orchestra op. 9.

The "Spring" symphony of Schumann used to be a battle horse of the Boston orchestra when Wilhelm Gericke held the reins. Persons who cherish the delusion that Gericke was a cold and sluggish classicist, interested exclusively in technical details, should have heard his reading of this symphony. But no one could read the thrice familiar work more romantically, with more of the ecstatic lift and rush of spring, than did Mr. Monteux last night. In the first movement the orchestral tone was not wholly clarified; a bit too much of March lingered in the blare of the brasses. But this condition was transient; orchestra and conductor had not quite struck their pace. The performance of the scherzo, with its two trios, was something to treasure in the memory, and the finale was most inspiriting.

The Beethoven overture, well played, sounded unimportant because musically it is unimportant — Beethoven at low ebb—but the pretty ballet adagio, which, I believe, had not been heard in local concert rooms in years and years, sounded quite delicious, being played exquisitely, save for some rasping by the solo 'cello.

Then came the topmost peak of the concert, "The Afternoon of a Faun." Mr. Monteux is the acknowledged prophet and high priest of Debussy. Others lead the prelude to Mallarmé's eclogue and the results are more or less satisfactory, but Mr. Monteux leads it as Debussy himself might. It is a vain thing to babble about understanding, poetry, adjustment, and quality of tone; the performance of the prelude last night was of breathless beauty, more beautiful even than performances of the same work conducted by Mr. Monteaux when he was with the Diaghileff ballet troupe by reason of the superiority of the orchestra yesterday.

The unison prelude to Enesco's suite served to proclaim the incomparable quality of the Boston strings, a rich sonority and a precision without flaw. The piece was led and played with a grand flourish; one thought of a super-Ysaye fiddling supremely on a Brobdingnagian fiddle. The minuet is quaint and intriguing in workmanship, but overlong. The "Intermède" has both charm and brevity, and the vigorous finale tops off a corner in capital fashion. The performance of the entire suite was masterly and Mr. Monteux made the ending properly exhilarating.

The behavior of the audience, which filled the hall, was interesting. Mr. Monteux, a former soldier of the French army, it received as coolly as if the United States had lately been at war with France. The chill was diminished perceptibly at the end of the Schumann symphony, but the amount of applause hardly warranted Mr. Monteaux in bidding his men, as he did, to rise and acknowledge it with him. The Beethoven adagio and the Debussy piece were received a trifle more warmly. This is indeed a topsy-turvy world. The latest symphony audience in frigid Boston broke into cheers. Here is exuberant New York freezing a visitor on its own hearthstone.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TELEGRAM

Address: New York City.

Date

The swelling flood of orchestral music now sweeping New York was augmented by the first performances yesterday of two famous orchestras in Carnegie Hall, the New York Symphony in the afternoon, with Walter Damrosch as conductor for the thirty-fifth year of his career, and the Boston Symphony in the evening with Pierre Monteux, formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, leading the players from the Hub for the first time in New York.

The soliist with the New York Symphony was Albert Spalding, who played Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor with his usual artistic understanding.

Mr. Damrosch through his orchestra gave a finished performance in both the Wagner and Brahms numbers, to the evident satisfaction of a rather critically inclined audience which filled the hall.

Mr. Monteux was happier in leading his players through modern works, like Dubussy's "Afternoon with a Faun" and Enescos Suite than in the First Symphony of Schumann.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

Music.

Monteux Leads Bostonians in Brilliant Concert.

The orchestral season took a big additional spurt in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The afternoon brought the first concert this autumn of the Symphony Society; the evening, the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The former event, like the New England preacher on Thanksgiving Day, can be left to take care of itself. The pieces played were Brahms's C minor symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto (with Albert Spalding as the solo fiddler), and the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

This is a programme that some authorities pronounce safe and sane; others, unsafe and insane. Happily, the professional concert goer does not

...NE
New York City
NOV 7 - 1919

...ston Symphony Opens Its Season at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may change its backer, its manager and its conductor, but its New York public remains faithful. The famous orchestra (alas! we can call it Major Higginson's no longer) found Carnegie Hall filled last night with an audience possessed of all its old-time brilliancy, while Mr. Monteux, appearing for the first time in New York as the orchestra's regular conductor, received a greeting as he entered the conductor's stand which was more than merely polite. Before the end of the first movement of the opening Schumann symphony had been played one thing was gratefully evident—that the personnel of the orchestra had recovered from the severe schakeup it had received by the expulsion of its German members. Last night it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old, homogeneous, resonant in tone, perfectly balanced throughout its choirs. And this fact alone speaks volumes for its conductor.

It cannot, however, be said that Mr. ...onteux gave an inspired or an ex...ting reading of the Schumann B ...at major Symphony; indeed it seemed ...times as if the spirit of winter ...ther than spring were upon it. This ...me heaviness of hand was apparent ...the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," but in ...he adagio Mr. Monteux at last came to ...is own and gave of it a performance of great charm. In Debussy's prelude to "L'Après Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Monteux was, however, most completely successful. Rarely had this oft played composition received a more delicate or more sympathetic reading, and conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received. The concert closed with Enesco's Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9.

...rom Times
New York City

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

Two Orchestras In Carnegie Hall.

The open season for orchestras is here, and after a beginning by the New Symphony Orchestra, the New York Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, followed in the evening by the Boston Orchestra; with more by these three and by the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras in the immediate foreground.

Some new faces are visible in the ranks of the Symphony Orchestra, with correspondingly new instrumental voices in the tone—a new oboe, Mr. Mathion; a new clarinet, Mr. Lindeman; a new bassoon, Mr. Letellier. Mr. Barrere, first flute, returns from a season's absence; others have returned from service in the war—Mr. Roentgen, now second 'cellist, and Mr. Posselle, second flute. The orchestra has benefited by these additions and otherwise. Its tone never sounded better, never richer, fuller, or more translucent than in its playing yesterday. Such a tone is a joy to hear.

There was hardly full opportunity to become acquainted at this concert with the qualities of the new players, though they all seemed worthy of the company into which they have been accepted. The oboe has the characteristic French tone, rather small and sub-acid, skillfully managed and flexible. They will all be heard more fully with interest.

There was an audience large enough to fill the hall that seemed glad to return to the hearing of orchestral music, and sympathetic, full of appreciation and enthusiasm. The program consisted of Brahms's first symphony in C minor and the prelude and final scene of "Tristan und Isolde" in the arrangement for orchestra alone, between which was placed Mendelssohn's violin concerto, played by Mr. Albert Spalding, who himself then made his first appearance here since his absence in the war.

Unfortunately, all the richness and fine potentialities of the orchestra in its existing state were not yesterday directed into the most advantageous channels; for its playing did not show the finish and precision in detail that are essential to the finest orchestral performances. Allowance, no doubt, must be made for the fact that the season is new, and the pace not yet thoroughly established. But the too frequent roughness and slipshod playing would not wholly account for the quality of the performance of Brahms's first symphony, which was not one of the best that Mr. Damrosch has put to his credit. There was something uncomfortably like the perfunctory in it at times. The larger outlines were not always firmly drawn, nor details of the inner voices finely clarified. It was not a performance that exhibited all the rugged vehemence of the noble first movement nor the singing beauty of the andante. There was much that was finer in the last movement, especially in the delivery of the eloquent solo passages for flute and horn.

Mr. Spalding was greeted warmly, and played Mendelssohn's concerto with vigor and spirit, not with so much refinement and artistic ripeness of style as when he last played here, and without the fullest deference to all that Mendelssohn prescribed for his interpre...rs; one manifestation of this being ...e pauses for rest, refreshment and ap...plause that Mr. Spalding introduced be...tween the movements, though perhaps ...servance of the composer's intentions ...is not indispensable to the proper ...formance of the music. But Mr. ...ding's admirers will hope to hear ...the near future play with a dis-

New York City
NOV 7 - 1919

Boston Opera Under Mr. Monteux.

With its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, taken from the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its New York concerts last night in Carnegie Hall. Although the orchestra has undergone a complete reorganization since Karl Muck was interned and subsequently deported, there has been no falling off in attendance.

The first concerts last season were directed by Mr. Monteux pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, so that his conducting is not unknown here, but he never appeared to better advantage as a symphonic leader. In the line of staple symphonic works Mr. Monteux is not as proficient as most of the other principal New York conductors, but in ultra modern things he is extremely good. It would be difficult to find any one who could equal his performance of Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune." He had led it before here with the Ballet Russe, but never so effectively.

Perhaps this reference to the Debussy piece is putting the frills and flourishes before the staples. The most important number on the programme was undoubtedly Schumann's First Symphony. It was played well, but not brilliantly. There was life and a certain Latin gracefulness about the reading of this beautiful work. But there was a lack of finish, and often an overbalancing of strings above wood winds and brasses. It was a steady, plodding interpretation, not an exalted reading, such as Schumann's music should have.

Mr. Monteux is far more at home in modern things. The restless, ever changing colors and rhythms of the moderns are brought to light clearly. There was a Suite of Enesco, a Roumanian composer living in Paris. It has been played here by the Philharmonic, but it is by no means familiar, though it has many moments of great beauty. Like the Debussy this number was cleverly played.

The orchestra itself has not changed materially since last here, although several important players have left. The strings are still excellent, and the wood winds skillful, if a trifle in volume.

As far as French music is concerned, and the whole school of modern music which follows Debussy, the Boston Orchestra will be able to hold its own with any. It remains to be seen how well the classics will be played.

...to hear the orchestra provide a more finished accompaniment.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance this season, under its new conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux; and opened another new chapter in its history to its New York friends and admirers. Mr. Monteux is no stranger to New York or to the orchestra's audience. He will be remembered as having charge of the orchestra in the brief interim last Autumn before the arrival of Mr. Rabaud; and also as a conductor, some seasons ago, at the Metropolitan Opera House. The orchestra itself showed the presence of many new members, the absence of many old ones; but of the old familiar faces not all are gone.

Mr. Monteux is no Chauvinist in program making. He played last evening Schumann's symphony in B flat, the "Spring" symphony, the overture and one movement from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Georges Enesco's Suite, Op. 9.

Old friends and admirers of the orchestra had no doubt prepared themselves to hear in its playing something other than they had been accustomed to, different even from what they had heard last season. Nor was this expectation disappointed. The tone of the organization is a new one: brilliant, tending toward hardness, with more heard from the side of the brasses than formerly, and that less mellow, with fluency and, on the whole, excellent quality from the wood winds. Something else has taken the place of the golden and transparent beauty of former days.

Mr. Monteux, when he appeared at the head of the orchestra last Autumn, was a deputy, waiting for his principal's arrival. Now he is the permanent chief, and has had the time and opportunity to make his intentions prevail in the orchestra's performances. His beat is very positive, his modeling of the phrase crisp and in high relief. His reading of the symphony was full of nervous tension, highly strung in its sharp contrasts of dynamics wherein sometimes tone was forced in strings and brass. Much was made of every episode; nothing was left unnoted; and in the elaboration of detail something was lost of the engaging and spontaneous flow of the music. In the song of the larghetto something was lost of its tranquil beauty, molested by unexpected violences. This Spring symphony is filled with an exulting spirit, but it does not verge upon the feverish.

The music from Beethoven's ballet pleased, especially the adagio, in which there were solo passages for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp well played. Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered explicitly rather than suggestively; the shimmering, vaporous atmosphere was clarified by an area of anything except a few staple foods. ...deliberate attempt, therefore, to increa... still more the already towering cost ... cotton goods will not be widely popula... nor will it tend to perpetuate resign...tion as regards immunities that nev... had any justification except the fa... that they were profitable to two grou... much feared by office-holders.

Senator Enos's bill seeks to remedy ... old evil in a rather clumsy way, but ... does seek to remedy it, and even that

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

If Walter Damrosch, thirty-five years hence, conducts with the same clarity that he displayed yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, we promise to be in the audience. The occasion was not only the first concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra this season, but it also brought to us the inauguration of Mr. Damrosch's activities as a conductor of thirty-five years' standing. He may now be fairly described as a veteran, though not a superfluous nor a lagging one. Notwithstanding the changes in several departments of the orchestra, it has seldom played with more elasticity, sonority and genuine musical quality. It was a delight to the ear, its plangency and tonal homogeneity.

The musical melting pot has fused the various choirs, and there was a gratifying nicety in the adjustment of entrances. No slips marred our pleasure. The nuances were admirable, and the fortissimo resilient as well as resounding. No loose ends, no arpeggiating of chords when not called for, and the richness of the strings, rich to lusciousness, was as ever a boon for ears wounded by the city's clatter.

Gustave Tinlot is still concertmaster and contributed no little to the beauty of the Brahms Andante. There are Mr. Willeke, first cellist; Rene Pollain, a tower of strength among the violas; George Barrere, master flutist; Mathieu, oboe, and a fine bassoonist, Louis Letellier. The first horn is Santiago Richart, Walter Lilleback is leader of the trombones and Karl Glassman presides over the tympani; no need here to enumerate further. It is a rare band, and it needs no critical bush.

Time was when Boston and Brahms were synonymous. Back Bay, which prided itself on being also Bach Bay, became Brahmin for the sake of Brahms, because the Hamburg composer was considered cryptic, remote, recondite, a bonze of art, and not a big hearted, romantic composer. This was during the consulship of Gericke, and it lasted till some demon of the perverse poisoned the Sacred Codfish by throwing the scene of Tristan into its golden municipal bowl. It must have been Emil Paur. At any rate, Wagner is now admitted to be a forward looking composer, while Brahms—oh, well, Brahms has become the property of every one. He is sung and played in every town throughout the land. There is a reason. He writes musical music, not psychological jig-saw puzzles. Above all, he is not difficult to understand.

The first Symphony, which opened the programme yesterday, leans heavily on Beethoven, yet it is Brahmsian to the core, not so crabbed as the E minor Symphony, but profounder than the second and third symphonic works. Mr. Damrosch's reading was commonplace, especially in the allegretto, which was heavy handed. However, the slow movement was suffused with the serenity of spirit that is the major characteristic of this lovely song. Shall we ever again recapture the mood in this age of vain noise, vain posturings and a daily diet of east wind? Then might we cry, "Nunc dimittis!"

Albeft Spalding played the Mendelssohn violin Concerto brilliantly and was recalled half a dozen times. He was evidently nervous, which nervousness was reflected in his jerky phrasing, wiry tone, the top notes often pinched and hard, and lack of repose both in matter and manner. As he swayed too much on his feet so he swayed in his bars. But he has temperament, and there was a gratifying legato in the andante. The rondo he dashed off, running away in rapid passages. His tone is not so large as penetrating. He has fleet fingers and a light bow arm. Altogether a gifted young man, who only lacks the charm which comes with complete self command.

The afternoon ended with the prelude and finale from Tristan, of course played in English.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

That bully band from Boston, also known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made its first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. A large number of Boston "fans" filled the auditorium and gave the "guests" a rousing welcome, well deserved, and welcomed, too, Conductor Pierre Monteux, once a familiar face in the orchestra pit of the Metropolitan Opera House. It may be remembered that Mr. Monteux stepped into the breach this time last year and conducted, after an insufficient number of rehearsals, the first pair of the Boston concerts, as Henri Rabaud had not yet arrived from France. He has had more time this autumn and his work with the orchestra shows it, not that he will ever set our musical Hudson afire with his baton. Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routiniere, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classics. Nevertheless, one feels sure with him, and it may be asserted without fear of denial that he has more fire in his beat than his predecessor, a gifted composer, yet always irresistibly suggesting an undertaker presiding ove... the obsequies of the various composi... tions he so mournfully conducted. Bu... Pierre Monteux has not a light touch. He is seldom Gallic.

Schumann's first symphony, with its springlike airs and romantic rustlings, as if in some dim Old World garden, went rather heavily. Naturally the joyous last movement sounded more Schumannesque than its companions. Even if the scoring is opaque, there is a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night. Strangely enough the conductor seemed more at ease in an "overture to a heroic and allegorical ballet. 'The Creatures of Prometheus,'" by, of all musicians in the world, Beethoven. Mr. Hale tells us in his notes that the composition was composed in 1800, the scenario arranged and written by Salvatore Vigano, a popular dancer and arranger of ballets, Stendhal's Vigano. If you are a Stendhalian it will be superfluous to tell you anything about this idol of the extraordinary Frenchman and writer, Henry Beyle, one of whose many pen names was Stendhalian. And for us that is the most significant thing about the resurrected work.

The overture is, as befits Beethoven, well-built, but not particularly novel; old material has been utilized. Th... Ballet No. 5 is an adagio and th... listener wonders how it was dance... to such serious, semi-sacred tones ... chaste must have been the terpsi...

Debussy's Faun again enjoyed a ...rutilant afternoon—metaphysically be ...it understood; the dream of a dream, ...the reverberations of which filled the ...chambers of his ardent brain. a mar...vellous evocation of a soul-state re...lated in terms of musical mysticism. ...Unhappily it wasn't mystic, nor ...poetic. It sounds like the statement ...of a fact, not the evocation of a ...memory-image. But beautiful be...cause of the sheer sensuous quality ...of the scoring. The first matinee of ...the series takes place to-morrow at ...Carnegie Hall.

SUN
... New York City
NOV

DAY OF HARMONY IN SOBER METROPOLIS

New York Symphony Society Holds First Concert of Its Season.

BOSTON PLAYERS HEARD

Walter Damrosch Begins Thirty-fifth Year as Conductor.

It was a day of harmony in this now most sober metropolis. Orchestral concords made glad the afternoon and the evening thereof. The New York Symphony Society gave the first concert of its season in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and in the evening the always welcome visitors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard also for the first time this autumn. Walter Damrosch began his thirty-fifth year as conductor of the local organization, Pierre Monteux his first as that of the Bostonians. True he did conduct some concerts a year ago, but only as a substitute for Henri Rabaud, who was delayed, who came later, discovered that directing concerts in this country was not what he had fondly fancied it to be, and sailed away.

The Symphony Society of New York is middle aged. Some of its present members are grandchildren of the founders. It has been at work for forty-two years. It has learned much, grown greatly. Since last season several of the playing members have left its ranks, but yesterday it sounded better than ever. Some have come back, notably George Barrere, the first flute; Roscoe Possell, the second flute, lately first flute of Pershing's own band, and Engelbert Roentgen, second solo cellist, lately of the Seventy-seventh Division. There are a new clarinet, a new oboe and a new bassoon, all of the first rank.

The programme yesterday comprised three numbers and was commendably short. Brahms's C minor symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto and the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" went well together, and the end was reached at 4:50. The orchestra was a delight to the ear. The quality of tone was uncommonly beautiful, rich and transparent. There was admirable balance, and such technical requirements as those of attack, precision and unanimity were completely satisfied. The mighty C minor symphony was played unaffectedly and smoothly. We have often heard it played with more virility. There was more passion in the delivery of the Wagner music.

The soloist was Albert Spalding, returned from worthy military service in Italy. The audience received him as coldly as if he had been a member of the German General Staff. After the first movement of the concerto, however, there was prolonged and enthusiastic applause. Mr. Spalding, who is a serious artist if there ever was one, played Mendelssohn's long honored composition in a most manly style. A big, sonorous, opulent tone, intonation of inpeccable correctness and a style vivacious without frivolity and elegant without effeminacy, were the chief characteristics of an admirable performance.

The programme presented by the Boston musicians in the evening consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, the overture and adagio from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" music, Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and Enescos' suite, opus 9. The symphony that bloomed in the spring of Schumann's happiness appeared to have little to do with the case of last night when the hounds of winter were on its traces. But it served well to display the present quality of the famous orchestra, which seemed to have gained in cloudiness and to have lost something of its old starry depths. The symphony was played somewhat crudely, somewhat rudely, but with no little of the buoyant vigor for which its score calls.

Beethoven's Premethean fire could never have caused him to be chained to a rock. To "let the punishment fit the crime" he should have been tied to a rocking chair. It is difficult even to conjecture why conductors drag out the least significant compositions of great masters. Possibly Mr. Monteux desired to exhibit certain solo players, who stood up many times to acknowledge the generous applause of a kindly audience.

In the Debussy music Mr. Monteux was entirely at home. The orchestra played it very well, indeed, and it was good to hear. Debussy never created anything more opulent in imagination, more subtle in the witchery of color than this tonal picture of a faun's dalliance. To-morrow afternoon, at the first matinee of the orchestra, there will be more ballet music, this time by Stravinsky.

From Herald
New York City
NOV 1919

MUSIC

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Pierre Monteux led his second concert here as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme was principally of little known works of well known composers. The symphony was one of Haydn, inscribed to "To the Queen of France," probably because it was a favorite of Marie Antoinette. In the symphony Mr. Monteux and his men were not so happy as in Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman." His beat was too aggressive for his lightly graceful music. Yet there were fine things in his reading and in the admirable playing of the men from Boston. There was a seldom heard overture by Beethoven, "King Stephen," played creditably, though not brilliantly.

In the Franck symphonic poem the orchestra played with fine effect. Mr. Monteux is skilful with French music. Many of the most famous Teutonic conductors—and nearly all symphonic conductors in America are of German origin—have made Franck's music sound far less effective. The final number was a suite based upon Stravinsky's "The Fire Bird," which Mr. Monteux directed here with the Ballet Russe. It is colorful, striking music, and it was well played, but it is better

TRIBUNE
New York City
NOV 7 - 1915

Boston Symphony Opens Its Season at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may change its backer, its manager and its conductor, but its New York public remains faithful. The famous orchestra (alas! we can call it Major Higginson's no longer) found Carnegie Hall filled last night with an audience possessed of all its old-time brilliancy, while Mr. Monteux, appearing for the first time in New York as the orchestra's regular conductor, received a greeting as he entered the conductor's stand which was more than merely polite. Before the end of the first movement of the opening Schumann symphony had been played one thing was gratefully evident—that the personnel of the orchestra had recovered from the severe schakeup it had received by the expulsion of its German members Last night it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old, homogeneous, resonant in tone, perfectly balanced throughout its choirs. And this fact alone speaks volumes for its conductor.

It cannot, however, be said that Mr. Monteux gave an inspired or an exciting reading of the Schumann B flat major Symphony; indeed it seemed at times as if the spirit of winter rather than spring were upon it. This same heaviness of hand was apparent in the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," but in the adagio Mr. Monteux at last came to his own and gave of it a performance of great charm. In Debussy's prelude to "L'Après Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Monteux was, however, most completely successful. Rarely had this oft played composition received a more delicate or more sympathetic reading, and conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received. The concert closed with Enesco's Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9.

From Times
New York City

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

Two Orchestras In Carnegie Hall.

The open season for orchestras is here, and after a beginning by the New Symphony Orchestra, the New York Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, followed in the evening by the Boston Orchestra; with more by these three and by the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras in the immediate foreground.

Some new faces are visible in the ranks of the Symphony Orchestra, with correspondingly new instrumental voices in the tone—a new oboe, Mr. Mathion; a new clarinet, Mr. Lindeman; a new bassoon, Mr. Letellier. Mr. Barrere, first flute, returns from a season's absence; others have returned from service in the war—Mr. Roentgen, now second 'cellist, and Mr. Posselle, second flute. The orchestra has benefited by these additions and otherwise. Its tone never sounded better, never richer, fuller, or more translucent than in its playing yesterday. Such a tone is a joy to hear.

There was hardly full opportunity to become acquainted at this concert with the qualities of the new players, though they all seemed worthy of the company into which they have been accepted. The oboe has the characteristic French tone, rather small and sub-acid, skillfully managed and flexible. They will all be heard more fully with interest.

There was an audience large enough to fill the hall that seemed glad to return to the hearing of orchestral music, and sympathetic, full of appreciation and enthusiasm. The program consisted of Brahms's first symphony in C minor and the prelude and final scene of "Tristan und Isolde" in the arrangement for orchestra alone, between which was placed Mendelssohn's violin concerto, played by Mr. Albert Spalding, who himself then made his first appearance here since his absence in the war.

Unfortunately, all the richness and fine potentialities of the orchestra in its existing state were not yesterday directed into the most advantageous channels; for its playing did not show the finish and precision in detail that are essential to the finest orchestral performances. Allowance, no doubt, must be made for the fact that the season is new, and the pace not yet thoroughly established. But the too frequent roughness and slipshod playing would not wholly account for the quality of the performance of Brahms's first symphony, which was not one of the best that Mr. Damrosch has put to his credit. There was something uncomfortably like the perfunctory in it at times. The larger outlines were not always firmly drawn, nor details of the inner voices finely clarified. It was not a performance that exhibited all the rugged vehemence of the noble first movement nor the singing beauty of the andante. There was much that was finer in the last movement, especially in the delivery of the eloquent solo passages for flute and horn.

Mr. Spalding was greeted warmly, and played Mendelssohn's concerto with vigor and spirit, not with so much refinement and artistic ripeness of style as when he last played here, and without the fullest deference to all that Mendelssohn prescribed for his interpreters; one manifestation of this being the pauses for rest, refreshment and applause that Mr. Spalding introduced between the movements, though perhaps observance of the composer's intentions here is not indispensable to the proper performance of the music. But Mr. Spalding's admirers will hope to hear him in the near future play with a dis-

New York City
NOV 7 - 1915

Boston Opera Under Mr. Monteux.

With its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, taken from the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its New York concerts last night in Carnegie Hall. Although the orchestra has undergone a complete reorganization since Karl Muck was interned and subsequently deported, there has been no falling off in attendance.

The first concerts last season were directed by Mr. Monteux pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud, so that his conducting is not unknown here, but he never appeared to better advantage as a symphonic leader. In the line of staple symphonic works Mr. Monteux is not as proficient as most of the other principal New York conductors, but in ultra modern things he is extremely good. It would be difficult to find any one who could equal his performance of Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune." He had led it before here with the Ballet Russe, but never so effectively.

Perhaps this reference to the Debussy piece is putting the frills and flourishes before the staples. The most important number on the programme was undoubtedly Schumann's First Symphony. It was played well, but not brilliantly. There was life and a certain Latin gracefulness about the reading of this beautiful work. But there was a lack of finish, and often an overbalancing of strings above wood winds and brasses. It was a steady, plodding interpretation, not an exalted reading, such as Schumann's music should have.

Mr. Monteux is far more at home in modern things. The restless, ever changing colors and rhythms of the moderns are brought to light clearly. There was a Suite of Enesco, a Roumanian composer living in Paris. It has been played here by the Philharmonic, but it is by no means familiar, though it has many moments of great beauty. Like the Debussy this number was cleverly played.

The orchestra itself has not changed materially since last here, although several important players have left. The strings are still excellent, and the wood winds skillful, if a trifle in volume.

As far as French music is concerned, and the whole school of modern music which follows Debussy, the Boston Orchestra will be able to hold its own with any. It remains to be seen how well the classics will be played.

to hear the orchestra provide a more finished accompaniment.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance this season, under its new conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux; and opened another new chapter in its history to its New York friends and admirers. Mr. Monteux is no stranger to New York or to the orchestra's audience. He will be remembered as having charge of the orchestra in the brief interim last Autumn before the arrival of Mr. Rabaud; and also as a conductor, some seasons ago, at the Metropolitan Opera House. The orchestra itself showed the presence of many new members, the absence of many old ones; but of the old familiar faces not all are gone.

Mr. Monteux is no Chauvinist in program making. He played last evening Schumann's symphony in B flat, the "Spring" symphony, the overture and one movement from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Georges Enesco's Suite, Op. 9.

Old friends and admirers of the orchestra had no doubt prepared themselves to hear in its playing something other than they had been accustomed to, different even from what they had heard last season. Nor was this expectation disappointed. The tone of the organization is a new one: brilliant, tending toward hardness, with more heard from the side of the brasses than formerly, and that less mellow, with fluency and, on the whole, excellent quality from the wood winds. Something else has taken the place of the golden and transparent beauty of former days.

Mr. Monteux, when he appeared at the head of the orchestra last Autumn, was a deputy, waiting for his principal's arrival. Now he is the permanent chief, and has had the time and opportunity to make his intentions prevail in the orchestra's performances. His beat is very positive, his modeling of the phrase crisp and in high relief. His reading of the symphony was full of nervous tension, highly strung in its sharp contrasts of dynamics wherein sometimes tone was forced in strings and brass. Much was made of every episode; nothing was left unnoted; and in the elaboration of detail something was lost of the engaging and spontaneous flow of the music. In the song of the larghetto something was lost of its tranquil beauty, molested by unexpected violences. This Spring symphony is filled with an exulting spirit, but it does not verge upon the feverish.

The music from Beethoven's ballet pleased, especially the adagio, in which there were solo passages for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp well played. Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered explicitly rather than suggestively; the shimmering, vaporous atmosphere was clarified by an area of anything except a few staple foods. deliberate attempt, therefore, to increa still more the already towering cost cotton goods will not be widely popula nor will it tend to perpetuate resign tion as regards immunities that nev had any justification except the fa that they were profitable to two grou much feared by office-holders.

Senator EDGE's bill seeks to remedy old evil in a rather clumsy way, but does seek to remedy it, and even that

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

If Walter Damrosch, thirty-five years hence, conducts with the same clarity that he displayed yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, we promise to be in the audience. The occasion was not only the first concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra this season, but it also brought to us the inauguration of Mr. Damrosch's activities as a conductor of thirty-five years' standing. He may now be fairly described as a veteran, though not a superfluous nor a lagging one. Notwithstanding the changes in several departments of the orchestra, it has seldom played with more elasticity, sonority and genuine musical quality. It was a delight to the ear, its plangency and tonal homogeneity.

The musical melting pot has fused the various choirs, and there was a gratifying nicety in the adjustment of entrances. No slips marred our pleasure. The nuances were admirable, and the fortissimo resilient as well as resounding. No loose ends, no arpeggiating of chords when not called for, and the richness of the strings, rich to lusciousness, was as ever a boon for ears wounded by the city's clatter.

Gustave Tinlot is still concertmaster and contributed no little to the beauty of the Brahms Andante. There are Mr. Willeke, first cellist; Rene Pollain, a tower of strength among the violas; George Barrere, master flutist; Mathieu, oboe, and a fine bassoonist, Louis Letellier. The first horn is Santiago Richart, Walter Lilleback is leader of the trombones and Karl Glassman presides over the tympani; no need here to enumerate further. It is a rare band, and it needs no critical bush.

Time was when Boston and Brahms were synonymous. Back Bay, which prided itself on being also Bach Bay, became Brahmin for the sake of Brahms, because the Hamburg composer was considered cryptic, remote, recondite, a bonze of art, and not a big hearted, romantic composer. This was during the consulship of Gericke, and it lasted till some demon of the perverse poisoned the Sacred Codfish by throwing the scone of Tristan into its golden municipal bowl. It must have been Emil Paur. At any rate, Wagner is now admitted to be a forward looking composer, while Brahms—oh, well, Brahms has become the property of every one. He is sung and played in every town throughout the land. There is a reason. He writes musical music, not psychological jig-saw puzzles. Above all, he is not difficult to understand.

The first Symphony, which opened the programme yesterday, leans heavily on Beethoven, yet it is Brahmsian to the core, not so crabbed as the E minor Symphony, but profounder than the second and third symphonic works. Mr. Damrosch's reading was commonplace, especially in the allegretto, which was heavy handed. However, the slow movement was suffused with the serenity of spirit that is the major characteristic of this lovely song. Shall we ever again recapture the mood in this age of vain noise, vain postur ings and a daily diet of east wind? Then might we cry, "Nunc dimittis!"

Albeft Spalding played the Mendelssohn violin Concerto brilliantly and was recalled half a dozen times. He was evidently nervous, which nervousness was reflected in his jerky phrasing, wiry tone, the top notes often pinched and hard, and lack of repose both in matter and manner. As he swayed too much on his feet so he swayed in his bars. But he has temperament, and there was a gratifying legato in the andante. The rondo he dashed off, running away in rapid passages. His tone is not so large as penetrating. He has fleet fingers and a light bow arm. Altogether a gifted young man, who only lacks the charm which comes with complete self command.

The afternoon ended with the prelude and finale from Tristan, of course played in English.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

That bully band from Boston, also known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made its first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. A large number of Boston "fans" filled the auditorium and gave the "guests" a rousing welcome, well deserved, and welcomed, too, Conductor Pierre Monteux, once a familiar face in the orchestra pit of the Metropolitan Opera House. It may be remembered that Mr. Monteux stepped into the breach this time last year and conducted, after an insufficient number of rehearsals, the first pair of the Boston concerts, as Henri Rabaud had not yet arrived from France. He has had more time this autumn and his work with the orchestra shows it, not that he will ever set our musical Hudson afire with his baton. Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routiniere, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classics. Nevertheless, one feels sure with him, and it may be asserted without fear of denial that he has more fire in his beat than his predecessor, a gifted composer, yet always irresistibly suggesting an undertaker presiding over the obsequies of the various composi tions he so mournfully conducted. But Pierre Monteux has not a light touch. He is seldom Gallic.

Schumann's first symphony, with its springlike airs and romantic rustlings, as if in some dim Old World garden, went rather heavily. Naturally the joyous last movement sounded more Schumannesque than its companions. Even if the scoring is opaque, there is a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night. Strangely enough the conductor seemed more at ease in an "overture to a heroic and allegorical ballet. 'The Creatures of Prometheus,'" by, of all musicians in the world, Beethoven. Mr. Hale tells us in his notes that the composition was composed in 1800, the scenario arranged and written by Salvatore Vigano, a popular dancer and arranger of ballets, Stendhal's Vigano. If you are a Stendhalian it will be superfluous to tell you anything about this idol of the extraordinary Frenchman and writer, Henry Beyle, one of whose many pen names was Stendhalian. And for us that is the most significant thing about the resurrected work.

The overture is, as befits Beethoven, well-built, but not particularly novel old material has been utilized. Th Ballet No. 5 is an adagio and th listener wonders how it was dance to such serious, semi-sacred tones chaste must have been the terpsi Debussy's Faun again enjoyed a rutilant afternoon—metaphysically be it understood; the dream of a dream, the reverberations of which filled the chambers of his ardent brain. a marvellous evocation of a soul-state related in terms of musical mysticism. Unhappily it wasn't mystic, nor poetic. It sounds like the statement of a fact, not the evocation of a memory-image. But beautiful because of the sheer sensuous quality of the scoring. The first matinee of the series takes place to-morrow at Carnegie Hall.

SUN

s New York City

DAY OF HARMONY IN SOBER METROPOLIS

New York Symphony Society Holds First Concert of Its Season.

BOSTON PLAYERS HEARD

Walter Damrosch Begins Thirty-fifth Year as Conductor.

It was a day of harmony in this now most sober metropolis. Orchestral concords made glad the afternoon and the evening thereof. The New York Symphony Society gave the first concert of its season in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and in the evening the always welcome visitors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard also for the first time this autumn. Walter Damrosch began his thirty-fifth year as conductor of the local organization, Pierre Monteux his first as that of the Bostonians. True he did conduct some concerts a year ago, but only as a substitute for Henri Rabaud, who was delayed, who came later, discovered that directing concerts in this country was not what he had fondly fancied it to be, and sailed away.

The Symphony Society of New York is middle aged. Some of its present members are grandchildren of the founders. It has been at work for forty-two years. It has learned much, grown greatly. Since last season several of the playing members have left its ranks, but yesterday it sounded better than ever. Some have come back, notably George Barrere, the first flute; Roscoe Possell, the second flute, lately first flute of Pershing's own band, and Engelbert Roentgen, second solo cellist, lately of the Seventy-seventh Division. There are a new clarinet, a new oboe and a new bassoon, all of the first rank.

The programme yesterday comprised three numbers and was commendably short. Brahms's C minor symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto and the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" went well together, and the end was reached at 4:50. The orchestra was a delight to the ear. The quality of tone was uncommonly beautiful, rich and transparent. There was admirable balance, and such technical requirements as those of attack, precision and unanimity were completely satisfied. The mighty C minor symphony was played unaffectedly and smoothly. We have often heard it played with more virility. There was more passion in the delivery of the Wagner music.

The soloist was Albert Spalding, returned from worthy military service in Italy. The audience received him as coldly as if he had been a member of the German General Staff. After the first movement of the concerto, however, there was prolonged and enthusiastic applause. Mr. Spalding, who is a serious artist if there ever was one, played Mendelssohn's long honored composition in a most manly style. A big, sonorous, opulent tone, intonation of impeccable correctness and a style vivacious without frivolity and elegant without effeminacy, were the chief characteristics of an admirable performance.

The programme presented by the Boston musicians in the evening consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, the overture and adagio from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" music, Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and Enescos' suite, opus 9. The symphony that bloomed in the spring of Schumann's happiness appeared to have little to do with the case of last night when the hounds of winter were on its traces. But it served well to display the present quality of the famous orchestra, which seemed to have gained in cloudiness and to have lost something of its old starry depths. The symphony was played somewhat crudely, somewhat rudely, but with no little of the buoyant vigor for which its score calls.

Beethoven's Premethean fire could never have caused him to be chained to a rock. To "let the punishment fit the crime" he should have been tied to a rocking chair. It is difficult even to conjecture why conductors drag out the least significant compositions of great masters. Possibly Mr. Monteux desired to exhibit certain solo players, who stood up many times to acknowledge the generous applause of a kindly audience.

In the Debussy music Mr. Monteux was entirely at home. The orchestra played it very well, indeed, and it was good to hear. Debussy never created anything more opulent in imagination, more subtle in the witchery of color than this tonal picture of a faun's dalliance. To-morrow afternoon, at the first matinee of the orchestra, there will be more ballet music, this time by Stravinsky.

From Herald
New York City

MUSIC

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Pierre Monteux led his second concert here as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme was principally of little known works of well known composers. The symphony was one of Haydn, inscribed to "To the Queen of France," probably because it was a favorite of Marie Antoinette. In the symphony Mr. Monteux and his men were not so happy as in Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman." His beat was too aggressive for his lightly graceful music. Yet there were fine things in his reading and in the admirable playing of the men from Boston. There was a seldom heard overture by Beethoven, "King Stephen," played creditably, though not brilliantly.

In the Franck symphonic poem the orchestra played with fine effect. Mr. Monteux is skilful with French music. Many of the most famous Teutonic conductors—and nearly all symphonic conductors in America are of German origin—have made Franck's music sound far less effective. The final number was a suite based upon Stravinsky's "The Fire Bird," which Mr. Monteux directed here with the Ballet Russe. It is colorful, striking music, and it was well played, but it is better

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM

Famous Orchestra, With Pierre Monteux Conducting, Plays Opening Concert.

GREAT AUDIENCE IS PLEASED

Schumann's First Symphony and Beethoven's "Prometheus" Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its first concert of the season here at Carnegie Hall last evening before an audience that was almost as large as, and certainly more demonstrative than, the congregation which acclaimed the matinee premiere of the New York Symphony yesterday. The Boston organization offered a program which, orchestrally speaking, was vastly more eventful, more adventurous and more symbolical than the routine of Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, or than any of the preceding symphonic performances of this young season, for that matter. And the performance was, for the most part, eminently creditable to both Conductor Monteux and his men, although the captious with a penchant for comparison might have found something of the time-honored precision and cohesiveness of this orchestra missing from the evening's work.

In the Schumann Symphony the delectably imaguiative, youthful and buoyant "Spring Symphony," with its laughing choirs and abounding joy in melody, the Bostonians were probably at their best because the composition is essentially pastoral descriptive, almost amorously narrative and, for all its happy vagaries and ornate embroideries, almost academically coherent. Monteux read this symphony with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries. And his band played it cleanly and with a kind of literal "cleverness" and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present.

Beethoven and Debussy.

Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus," an interesting patchwork deriving from the ballet scenario and ballet score of Salvatore Vigano, adapted and rearranged by Beethoven with many interpellations and excisions before the overture became a recognized and highly diverting orchestral piece, furnished Conductor Monteux with a good (and opportune) vehicle to display the best points in his orchestra's present form. They played it wonderfully well and with capital mutuality, notably in the finale, in which the two somwhat irrelevant themes will test both the mental and mechanical proficiency of any orchestra.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," written as the musical vehicle for that "beautifully unintelligible" Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme, the notorious rhetorical symbollist and, maybe, the original vers librist of the nineteenth century was another interesting and not largely satisfying feature of Mr. Monteux's program. The work is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two harps, the antique cymbals and strings, and the strength of this performance of it lay in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading, or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux.

Full-Rounded Program Pleases.

Enesco's suite for orchestra in four movements, played with rather more fervor and finesse than its predecessors, brought the concert to a successful close. The audience then, as at the conclusion of each of the earlier numbers, was notably demonstrative and quite determined to show Conductor Monteux and his men that their efforts were highly esteemed and their performance greatly approved. As a matter of fact there were many wobbly moments during the early part of the program and throughout a vague and indefinable suggestion of indifference (perhaps it was ennui) on the part of these veteran orchstralities. At times the performance seemed to lack zest, buoyancy, oneness of understanding and, to use an old-fashionerd word, "desire." And there are times when even the best-trained and the finest symphony orchestras seem to lack "desire."

WEEK IN

By JOHN H.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its first concert of the season here at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening before an audience that was almost as large as, and certainly more demonstrative than, the congregation which acclaimed the matinee premiere of the New York Symphony yesterday. The Boston organization offered a program which, orchestrally speaking, was vastly more eventful, more adventurous and more symbolical than the routine of Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, or than any of the preceding symphonic performances of this young season, for that matter. And the performance was, for the most part, eminently creditable to both Conductor Monteux and his men, although the captious with a penchant for comparison might have found something of the time-honored precision and cohesiveness of this orchestra missing from the evening's work.

In the Schumann Symphony the delectably imaguiative, youthful and buoyant "Spring Symphony," with its laughing choirs and abounding joy in melody, the Bostonians were probably at their best because the composition is essentially pastoral descriptive, almost amorously narrative and, for all its happy vagaries and ornate embroideries, almost academically coherent. Monteux read this symphony with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries. And his band played it cleanly and with a kind of literal "cleverness" and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present.

Beethoven and Debussy.

Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus," an interesting patchwork deriving from the ballet scenario and ballet score of Salvatore Vigano, adapted and rearranged by Beethoven with many interpellations and excisions before the overture became a recognized and highly diverting orchestral piece, furnished Conductor Monteux with a good (and opportune) vehicle to display the best points in his orchestra's present form. They played it wonderfully well and with capital mutuality, notably in the finale, in which the two somwhat irrelevant themes will test both the mental and mechanical proficiency of any orchestra.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," written as the musical vehicle for that "beautifully unintelligible" Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme, the notorious rhetorical symbollist and, maybe, the original vers librist of the nineteenth century was another interesting and not largely satisfying feature of Mr. Monteux's program. The work is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two harps, the antique cymbals and strings, and the strength of this performance of it lay in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading, or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux.

Full-Rounded Program Pleases.

Enesco's suite for orchestra in four movements, played with rather more fervor and finesse than its predecessors, brought the concert to a successful close. The audience then, as at the conclusion of each of the earlier numbers, was notably demonstrative and quite determined to show Conductor Monteux and his men that their efforts were highly esteemed and their performance greatly approved. As a matter of fact there were many wobbly moments during the early part of the program and throughout a vague and indefinable suggestion of indifference (perhaps it was ennui) on the part of these veteran orchstralities. At times the performance seemed to lack zest, buoyancy, oneness of understanding and, to use an old-fashionerd word, "desire." And there are times when even the best-trained and the finest symphony orchestras seem to lack "desire."

NEW YORK AMERI

TWO FAMOUS BANDS HEARD AT CARNEGIE

Damrosch's Fine Orchestra, with Albert Spalding as Soloist, in the Afternoon, and the Boston Symphony Plays in the Evening

By MAX SMITH.

TWO excellent orchestras were heard for the first time this season yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

In the afternoon our own Symphony Society, with Walter Damrosch at the helm and Albert Spalding as soloist, gave pleasure to a very large audience. In the evening, Boston's famous band, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, offered delights to an equally large and brilliant gathering.

Mr. Damrosch has probably never had a finer body of musicians at his disposal than now; and the quality of the living instrument that responded so obediently to his baton was agreeably in evidence not only in Brahm's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, which opened the matinee, but also in the Prelude and Finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," which brought it to a close.

If the performance of the symphony was distinguished by beauty of tone in the various choirs, unmarred by the shrillness or squawking in the wood-wind, any blatant sounds in the brass, any bungling or see-sawing, it can hardly be said, however, that the reading it received stirred the blood.

There was too much sugar in the cantilena of the "Andante" to suit the taste of the writer—and why did Gustave Tinlot, the concert master, play his solo passage fortissimo and with so strong an infusion of the vibrato? The Allegretto was lacking in grace and elasticity. And the final allegro, strangely enough, did not cause a single thrill.

It has been said that many a musician, returning from duty at the front, finds that he has lost interest in his art. Evidently this is not true of Albert Spalding, who yesterday made his first public appearance here since his activities as an aviator ceased. While he played with gusto, however, and with a full vibrant tone, his nerves seemed to be somewhat on edge when he first applied himself to his task. At any rate, his intonation was far from impeccable in the opening Allegro, which he started at a pace somewhat faster, apparently, than Mr. Damrosch had expected.

In the Anrante Mr. Spalding quite properly sought to avoid excess of sweetness and sentimentality, though he was inclined to be somewhat too deliberate in his portamento. The last movement, played with verve and energy, brought him five recalls from an audience quick to appreciate the sterling value of his performance.

A great deal of interest at last night's concert was focussed on Pierre Monteux, who is now permanent conductor of the Boston Orchestra, a position he held temporarily a year ago previous to the coming of Henri Rabaux.

The French maestro, recently active in the Metropolitan Opera House, had chosen for his re-entry into New York a programme that embraced Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 38; the overture and the ballet No. 5, Adagio, from Beethoven's heroic and allegorical ballet, "Die Geschoepfe de Prometheus" ("The Creatures of Prometheus"); Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"), and Enesco's "Suite for Orchestra," opus 9.

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Orchestra Again.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its New York visit with its concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, fully attended by its admirers and friends. Mr. Monteux's offering was not altogether a success in the matter of program-making, nor yet in the matter of selection. Haydn's symphony in D, called "La Reine de France," was agreeable and not too familiar; a hearty expression of the composer's geniality. It was heard with pleasure, in a performance full of spirit and carefully wrought shadings, with amply vigorous contrasts in dynamics, and with a quality of tone that seemed rather more ingratiating than what was heard in Schumann's symphony the other evening. The orchestra was reduced by half the number of double basses in this symphony, but no other changes were made in the direction of dimensions supposedly Haydn's.

But why does Mr. Monteux busy himself with unearthing the inferior and half-forgotten overtures of Beethoven? He exhumed the "Prometheus" overture at the first concert, and now he performs the same operation for the overture to "King Stephen." If it were a case of buried treasure brought to light, there would be cause for gratitude; but neither "Prometheus" nor "King Stephen" is buried treasure. The music of "King Stephen" was written for an occasion, the opening of a theatre; and music thus originated is not always inspired. This overture is not, and the place of obscurity where it has been resting is the one that best becomes it; not even such an excellent performance as yesterday's can give it life.

WORLD: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1919.

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE

It was a model programme, as to length, that played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, although the musical menu was only of moderate interest. An unfamiliar symphony by Haydn—who is usually alluded to as sunny Papa Haydn, father, perhaps grandfather, of the symphonic form—was listened to with delight. It is nicknamed "The Queen of France," because, as Philip Hale says, Marie Antoinette liked it, probably after she advised the "common people" to eat cake if they couldn't afford baker's bread (history repeats itself). It is pretty, old-fashioned, formal music this, and you immediately forget it.

Another archaic composition was exhumed, a Beethoven overture to "King Stephen," formerly of Hungary, circa A. D. 977, and the music sounds that old. The Beethoven ballet music on Thursday evening last was almost more human, and that is not saying much. Let the dead bury the dead.

Give Conductor Pierre Monteux a picturesque musical situation and his pulse beat is swifter and his faculty of attention is less strained, for he is on familiar territory, and he looks happier. So does the audience.

After the archive music of Haydn and Beethoven, neither at his best, the symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," by the Belgian Cesar Franck was like a whiff of fresh air in a mortuary vault. And it is by no means the superior Franck, rather is it the exterior, not the interior Franck. In the delineation of the macabre, or the grotesque, he is not to be compared with Liszt, Berlioz, Saint-Saens. Nor are his narrative powers on a par with those of Joachim Raff, whose musical setting of another Ballad of Burger, "Denore," posseses the legendary tone missing in Franck. Theodore Thomas, of blessed musical memory, often played the "Lenore," and he was the first in America to conduct this "Wild Huntsman," who was punished by some Sabbatarian society in old Germany and incontinently driven to the devil, where we hope he was well roasted by the critical staff.

Stravinsky's pictorial suite, "The Fire-Bird," charming, piquant, diabolically clever, but not original in thematic material, closed an enjoyable afternoon. We recall Mr. Monteux conducting the ballet in Paris in 1913 And admirably he conducted, and still conducts it. It was first heard here in its concert form Dec. 31, 1916, and Mr. Hale notes that New York saw the work danced by the Russian Ballet at the Century Theatre early in January of the same year. So much for the date hounds. Ansermet conducted, but not like Monteux.

One of the original dancers from Petrograd sat in the audience with her husband yesterday. She is Mme. Fokine, and Michael Fokine, who might be styled the Bach of the modern ballet, so fertile in invention is he, was also in the original cast. "The Fire-Bird" too ends with an infernal chase, but we liked the Russian devil better than the Belgian version of Franck. Stravinsky's diabolical dance reminded one of Satan's children frantically running around their abode to keep warm during a coal strike. But we should not forget that in hell it is considered bad form to speak of the heat.

It must be said, also, that Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," which had been heard before in New York, but not often enough to be familiar, is not Franck at his best; yet it is an ingenious and effective treatment of a theme that has appealed to many musicians; and not all have treated it so successfully, with so much atmospheric suggestiveness and picturesqueness, in terms so purely musical. The performance of it was admirable, full and rich in color, without excess in dynamics, without undue striving for realistic effects, and yet with the dramatic meaning the composer was seeking.

It was in the selections from Igor Stravinsky's ballet music for "L'Oiseau de Feu" that the orchestra and Mr. Monteux achieved their greatest success yesterday. Five selections were played, the introduction depicting the enchanted garden and the dance of the Fire Bird; the supplication of the Fire Bird, the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, the lullaby, princesses' dance, the infernal dance. Selections from this music had already been played in concert in New York by Mr. Damrosch, in December, 1916, and the performances of the ballet by the Russian company are well remembered. It may be said that it is hardly fair to play Stravinsky's music as a concert piece, yet it doubtless lends itself to such treatment more readily than the music to "Petrouchka" would.

The music is exquisite in its fancifulness, boldly fantastic, capricious, ingenious, picturesque, pictorial; illustrating the changing phantasms of the ballet. Something of its fantasticality, its imaginative power, becomes meaningless when it is taken away from the fantasticality of the action. Yet the lullaby, the dance of the princesses, and, perhaps somewhat less, the scene of the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, have enough of their own to say, as music, to stand fairly well by themselves.

In all these Stravinsky's imaginative quality, his skill in fitting the music to the scene, and his extraordinary resourcefulness in writing for the orchestra, in the devising of strange, exotic, gleaming color, is beguiling.

Mr. Monteux conducted the music with complete knowledge and the fullest sympathy—he was the conductor of notable performances of the ballet in Paris and London, and knows its spirit as do few. The performance was brilliant.

MONTEUX VARIES THEMES IN MUSIC

Relevancy Set Aside in Matinee Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SWEDISH RECITAL GIVEN

Dorothy Berliner Presides at Piano Before Friendly Audience in Aeolian Hall.

Pierre Monteux continued his exposure of Beethoven yesterday afternoon at the first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The first number on the programme was Haydn's "Queen of France" symphony, and after it came Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." Cesar Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" and the suite arranged from the music of the Stravinsky ballet "L'Oiseau de Feu" were the other numbers. Altogether it was a disjointed programme, characterized chiefly by irrelevancy.

For the performance of the Haydn work Mr. Monteux reduced his double basses and his 'celli, but retained all the other strings. Considering the nature of Haydn's scoring in this particular composition, it was not a bad idea. However, it did not save the performance of the symphony from being such as would have put most queens of France, even Marie Antoinette, to sleep. The American queens who clapped their gloved palms softly after it were just fresh from sustaining and sober luncheons, and at all times they are amiable.

Beethoven's "King Stephen" overdeserves a long rest. It is too innocent to endure the stress of these riotous times, and the transition from it to Cesar Franck's work, even after the customary intermission of ten minutes was almost startling. The Stravinsky suite was played by the Symphony Society of this city on December 31, 1916, long after the Russians introduced the ballet. It suffered then and again yesterday from dissociation from the action of the stage.

For those who know the ballet it evokes happy remembrance. For others it must be a collection of mysteries. In this number the orchestra was heard at its best. Mr. Monteux seems to sigh after the fleshings of the Russian ballet But why these sardonic researches among the indiscretions of Beethoven?

Music

Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall That Needed Motion Pictures

By H. E. Krehbiel

We had a little music which was music for its own sake and a great deal of music, which was of the picture-book order at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. For the former Mr. Monteux went back almost to the kindergarten period of the symphony and brought forth Haydn's little work in B flat, which in the catalogues bears the title "La Reine de France," and to one of the dusty shelves of Beethoven, where he found Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen."

No doubt the Haydn Symphony has often been played in New York, though we can recall no performance in our day. It is one of the set written for Paris to which that which has been entled "The Bear" also belongs. It is a bright little piece which has washed its hands in innocency, so far as passion or dramatic emotion of any kind is concerned; but there was considerable more music (qua music) in it than in the composition by Haydn's great pupil and successor. The overture to "King Stephen" finds a place upon our programs occasionally. It is like a comet having a periodic[illegible] should calculate at about ten years, but it has no cemetary refulgence. It was written for an occasion (the opening of the National Theater in Pesth), and its history has been a mournful and even humiliating one ever since. It was part of the incidental music composed for a spectacular show, a sort of pageant concocted by Kotzebue, and had "The Ruins of Athens" as a companion piece.

Beethoven sold it twice a few years after he wrote it, but no publisher was found willing to print it until after Beethoven's death. It is in the double sale of the work and the incidents accompanying them that the humiliating part of the story lies—humiliating to the character and memory of Beethoven. On Charles Neate's first visit to Vienna he carried a commission to Beethoven from the London Philharmonic Society for three overtures. Beethoven sent his friend and admirer back with three scores, for which he took the money offered by the society. In his receipt he obligated himself not to publish either scores or instrumental parts anywhere and reserved publication rights for a pianoforte transcription only. Yet when he signed this document he had already sold the works to his Vienna publisher, Steiner. (The original contractual receipt, by the way, is one of the treasures in the library of Mr. Richard Aldrich, musical critic of "The New York Times.")

The Philharmonic Society's directors were so disappointed, not to say disgusted, with the music that they put it aside without performance, and when Neate next went to Vienna it was with the injunction from the Philharmonic Society's directors: "For God's sake, don't buy anything from Beethoven!"

Birchall, the English publisher, refused to print the overtures, with the remark that he would not take them as a gift. They were "King Stephen," "Zur Namensfeier" and "The Ruins of Athens," the second having been composed to take the place of the first, I believe, when Kotzebue's bit of flamboyant patriotic buncombe was performed in Vienna.

The inferiority of the music of these overtures to that which Beethoven was producing at the samé time accounts for the fact that it is so seldom heard, though Beethoven enthusiasts have always striven to find things worthy of the master in it. They might better be permitted to rest in oblivion so that their history might also be forgotten. It is fresh in this writer's mind only, because the correspondence on th subject passed through his hand while preparing the English version of Thayer's "Life of Beethoven." It is not set forth in the German edition.

The picture-book music in Mr. Monteux's scheme was Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur maudit," based on Bürger's ballad "Der Wilde Jäger," and a suite of pieces from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the ballet which the Russian dancers of Diaghileff performed at the New Theater in January, 1916, and at the Metropolitan Opera House in the spring of 1917. There was as great a difference between Franck and Stravinsky as between Beethoven and Franck. It is the habit of program annotators when expounding modern ballet suites to say that scenic accompaniment is not essential to the music, which is self-sufficient in its beauty. The cases in which this is true of modern ballets are rare indeed. The public of to-day has grown accustomed to being told what it must think or feel or imagine whenever a piece of music with a descriptive title is performed. Without the help of stage pictures or pantomime or verbal explanation the sophisticated minds of our grown-up musical children are at a loss.

There was an amusing illustration of the truth of this statement yesterday when the audience left Carnegie Hall in doubt as to whether it had just listened to the music of "The Round Dance of the Princesses" or "The Informal Dance of all the subjects of the Kastcher," who was a very wicked Russian magician. All was plain sailing till down and through the "Lullaby," though the movements of the princesses "at play with the golden apples" seemed like doleful, heavy-hearted pastime. But were they royal damsels or imps of darkness who capered through Mr. Monteux's last piece? Some of the isteners were for waiting for more; some, like Mr. Monteux, for going home. Surely if we could not have the dance we should have had a moving picture accompaniment for the music.

Herein lies a suggestion worth considering. It is not put forward irreverently (though reverence is the last mental attitude which this music demands), or even flippantly. et Mr Eastman, in Rochester, look to it. We have had dancing to symphonies which do not need it; why not have dancing pictures to music that does?

First

Concert-C

IN THE EAR OF NEW YORK

MR. MONTEUX AND HIS ORCHESTRA FRESHLY JUDGED

Two Concerts Before Audiences Renewing the Numbers and the Applause of Previous Years—The Reviewers, the New Leader and the Changed Band—Praise for the Conductor's Stravinsky — Questionings Over His Schumann

As established conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux has led it for the first times in New York and the discriminating public that its concerts assemble there has heard, likewise for the first times, the reorganized band as he is moulding it. The first of these concerts befell last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," the overture and a slow movement from Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Enesco's Suite to fill the programme—all pieces recently heard at home. Of the occasion as a whole, Mr. Spaeth writes to The Transcript:

That New York still reserves for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the place of honor in its musical affections was sufficiently proved last Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, when Pierre Monteux led his men through their first programme of the metropolitan season. The hall was crowded to the doors, as always on these occasions, by the true followers of orchestral music, and the welcome to Mr. Monteux and the players indicated an enthusiasm which was more than cordiality. At the close of the "Spring Symphony" of Schuman, the applause assumed proportions which demanded acknowledgment by the entire band, and throughout the evening the spirit of hearty approval was unmistakable. There was interest in the naively simple beauties of Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" elicited particular appreciation of the wood-wind choir of the Bostonians, although Mr. Monteux chose to give the elusive composition a surprisingly literal interpretation. The comparatively unfamiliar Suite, Opus 9, by Georges Enesco, was a pleasng and far from indigestible dessert to a generally unpretentious and wholesome feast.

The impression left by the opening concert is that the orchestra as a whole has recovered much of the technical finish which marked its performances before the disruption of the war-period, and that Mr. Monteux, free from the embarrassment of acting merely as a stop-gap, is already beginning to impress upon the players something of his own ideas and personality. Whether these factors are to prove of permanent value is still an open question.

Various are the impressions received and recorded by the reviewers in the New York newspapers. The Tribune, for example, heard the orchestra with no small pleasure; the conductor with less satisfaction. It says:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may change its backer, its manager and its conductor, but its New York public remains faithful. The famous orchestra, (alas! we can call it Major Higginson's no longer) found Carnegie Hall filled with an audience possessed of all its old-time brilliancy, while Mr. Monteux, appearing for the first time in New York as the orchestra's regular conductor, received a greeting as he entered the conductor's stand which was more than merely polite. Before the end of the first movement of the opening Schumann symphony had been played one thing was gratefully evident—that the personnel of the orchestra had recovered from the severe "shake-up" it had received by the expulsion of its German members. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old, homogeneous, resonant in tone, perfectly balanced throughout its choirs. And this fact alone speaks volumes for its conductor.

It cannot, however, be said that Mr. Monteux gave an inspired or an exciting reading of Schumann's "Spring Symphony"; indeed, it seemed at times as if the spirit of winter rather than spring were upon it. This same heaviness of hand was apparent in the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," but in the adagio Mr. Monteux at last came to his own and gave to it a performance of great charm. In Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" Mr. Monteux was, however, completely successful. Rarely had this oft-played composition received a more delicate or more sympathetic reading, and conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received.

Writing in The Times, Mr. Aldrich, who had not officially heard the orchestra since the days of change and reorganization, is coolly judicious:

Old friends and admirers of the orchestra had no doubt prepared themselves to hear in its playing something other than they had been accustomed to, different even from what they had heard last season. Nor was this expectation disappointed. The tone of the organization is a new one—brilliant, tending toward hardness, with more heard from the side of the brasses than formerly, and that less mellow; with fluency, and, on the whole, excellent quality from the wood-winds. Something else has taken the place of the golden and transparent beauty of former days.

Now Mr. Monteux is the permanent chief, and he has had the time and opportunity to make his intentions prevail in the orchestra's performances. His beat is very positive, his modelling of the phrase crisp and in high relief. His reading of the symphony was full of nervous tension, highly strung, in its contrasts of dynamics, wherein [illegible] tone was forced in strings [illegible]. Much was made of every [illegible] nothing was left unnoted; [illegible] consideration of detail some[illegible] of the engaging and [illegible] In the with an exuberance [illegible] but it does not verge upon the feverish.

The music from Beethoven's ballet pleased, especially the adagio, in which there were solo passages for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp well played. Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered explicitly rather than suggestively; the shimmering, vaporous atmosphere was clarified by an area of high barometric pressure that exposed all the orchestral mechanism. It was in its way interesting and informing; but it was not a poetical exposition of Debussys thought.

In The World, Mr. Huneker is disposed to agree with Mr. Aldrich, but en passant he cannot forbear an amusing fling at the sepulchral Rabaud from whom the orchestra and its audiences were timely and happily delivered. He writes:

Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinière, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classics. Nevertheless, one feels sure with him, and it may be asserted without fear of denial that he has more fire in his beat than his predecessor, a gifted composer, yet always irresistibly suggesting an undertaker presiding over the obsequies of the various compositions he so mournfully conducted. But Pierre Monteux has not a light touch. He is seldom Gallic.

Schumann's first symphony, with its springlike airs and romantic rustlings, as if in some dim Old World garden, went rather heavily. Naturally the joyous last movement sounded more Schumannesque than its companions. Even if the scoring is opaque, there is a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night. Strangely enough the conductor seemed more at ease in an "overture to a heroic and allegorical ballet, 'The Brood of Prometheus,'" by, of all musicians in the world, Beethoven.

Debussy's Faun again enjoyed a rutilant afternoon — metaphysically be it understood; the dream of a dream, the reverberations of which filled the chambers of his ardent brain, a marvellous evocation of a soul-mate related in terms of musical mysticism. Unhappily it wasn't mystic, nor poetic. It sounded like the statement of a fact, not the evocation of a memory-image. But beautiful because of the sheer sensuous quality of the scoring.

In turn, Mr. Henderson of The Sun cannot forget the dear departed, remarking that Mr. Rabaud "discovered that directing concerts in this country was not what he fondly fancied it to be and sailaw away." Like the rest the reviewer judged the performance of Schumann's symphony somewhat heavy. "It served well," he writes, "to display the present quality of the famous orchestra, which seemed to have gained in cloudiness and to have lost something of its old starry depths. The symphony was played somewhat crudely, somewhat rudely, but with no little of the buoyant vigor for which its score calls. . . . In Debussy's music Mr. Monteux was entirely at home. The orchestra played it very well, indeed, and it was good to hear."

For the second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux's programme traversed Haydn's little symphony, "The Queen of France," Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen," to be resurrected next Friday and Saturday in Boston; Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." With the outcome the reviewers were well pleased and in The Times, Mr. Aldrich writes not only for himself, but in measure for all of them, saying:

Haydn's Symphony in D, called "The Queen of France," was agreeable and not too familiar; a hearty expression of the composer's geniality. It was heard with pleasure, in a performance full of spirit and carefully wrought shadings, with amply vigorous contrasts in dynamics, and with a quality of tone that seemed rather more ingratiating than what was heard in Schumann's symphony the other evening. The orchestra was reduced by half the number of double basses in this symphony, but no other changes were made in the direction of dimensions supposedly Haydn's. . . .

Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," is not Franck at his best; yet it is an ingenious and effective treatment of a theme that has appealed to many musicians; and not all have treated it so successfully, with so much atmospheric suggestion and picturesqueness, in terms so purely musical. The performance of it was admirable, full and rich in color, without excess in dynamics, without undue striving for realistic effects, and yet with the dramatic meaning the composer was seeking.

In was in the selections from Stravinsky's ballet music "The Fire-Bird" that the orchestra and Mr. Monteux achieved their greatest success. The music is exquisite in its fancifulness, boldly fantastic, capricious, ingenious, picturesque, pictorial; illustrating the changing fantasy of the ballet. Something of its fantasticality, its imaginative power, becomes meaningless when it is taken away from the fantasticality of the action. Yet the lullaby, the dance of the princesses, and, perhaps somewhat less, the scene of the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, have enough of their own to say, as music, to stand fairly well by themselves. . . . Mr. Monteux conducted the music with complete knowledge and the fullest sympathy—he was the conductor of notable performances of the ballet in Paris and London, and knows its spirit as do few. The performance was brilliant.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Mme. Galli-Curci as Usual—Miss Brard Instead of Miss Garrison—Mr. Longy's [illegible]

Items and Announcements

Miss Garrison is unable to keep her engagement with the Symphony Orchestra for the concert to increase its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon next at Symphony Hall. In her stead, Miss Magdeleine Brard, the youthful French pianist, will be heard for the first time in Boston. A pupil of Mr. Cortot and still in her teens, she made no small stir when she played in New York last winter. This autumn she has renewed the impression of signal abilities, less as prodigy than as pianist regardless of her years. In Boston, she will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in G minor, music in which Mr. Cortot excels and in which, in all likelihood, he has schooled her.

CRITICS AS PARTISANS

Post — Nov 9

Fortunes of Monteux and Symphony in New York

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last season in Boston Mr. Monteux gave two very brilliant concerts prior to the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then proceeded on tour to New York, and was promptly ripped up the back by the music reviewers of that city.

It was hard to believe at this event, that the same man who had given concerts in a manner greatly to the satisfaction of audiences which should certainly know good performances from bad, could conduct so satisfactorily in Boston and so very unsatisfactorily in New York.

Of course, stranger things have happened in the history of music. Anyone who knows anything about the temperamental difficulties of musicians and the practical handicaps there are against a performer invariably doing himself justice in the presence of the public, knows how an untoward incident, or a very small emotional disturbance, may spoil an entire concert. Therefore, when Bostonians who had derived great satisfaction from the accomplishments of the new conductor read about the concert in New York, some of them took into account the possibility that Mr. Monteux, a musician of temperament, perhaps did play poorly in New York.

There were rumors which confirmed this supposition. It was said that on the night of the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918, which was the date of the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony season of 1918-19, there was not only great excitement within the Symphony orchestra, but also much din on the streets outside, that these things, and the unaccustomed acoustics of the hall, and so-forth, had influenced the conductor unfortunately in the performanc of his task.

Now, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave a New York concert last Thursday night. They played compositions which had already been heard here, including the Schumann "Spring" symphony, which by many people in Boston who are fairminded and whose knowledge is worthy of respect, was one of the finest performances of this symphony—perhaps the finest—given here by any orchestra in many years. But the New York Telegram found that while Monteux and his men read this symphony "with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries" (whatever that may mean), it still felt that it was played "with a kind of 'little' cleverness and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present." The virtue of the performance of Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" lay not, if you please, in any particular qualities of taste or imagination on the part of the conductor, but "in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux."

Perhaps the gentlemen preferred the dry and ponderous reading of this music which Dr. Muck was in the habit of giving.

But the gem of New York comment, to our mind, on the playing of the Boston Symphony, is the comment of Mr. James Huneker, "Jimmy," as he is known to his friends, who, in one article discovered that "Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classic" and that the Schumann symphony "went rather heavily . . . a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night." Following which, in a second article, Mr. Huneker discovers that Walter Damrosch, who conducted on the same day, a concert by the New York Symphony was "a veteran, though not a superfluous or lagging one" and the tone of the orchestra "a delight to the ear."

Now, we are not disposed to deny to the New York Symphony all of the fine qualities ascribed to it by Mr. Huneker, nor would we willingly comment at length on Damrosch's conducting. We once heard him conduct Beethoven's 5th symphony, and that day we listened no more. But when a reviewer so far forsakes all reasonable perspective in comparing orchestras like the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductors like Damrosch and Monteux, with an obvious leaning toward Damrosch—then it is time to throw up the hands and stop talking. You cannot argue with people who are determined in advance to see one side of a question. The puzzle of the New York fault-findings—or at least, some New York fault-findings—with Monteux is explained: provincialism and partisanship.

Post Mon. Nov 10

SOLOIST FOR PENSION FUND

French Girl Pianist to Play Saint-Saens' Concerto

Magdeleine Brard, the phenomenal little French pianist who has set New York marvelling and talking by the dazzling brilliance and the distinguished beauty of her playing, is at last to be heard in Boston, when she will appear as soloist at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. She will play the delightful but formidably difficult Concerto by Saint-Saens in G minor, by which she won the larger part of her fame in this country.

As a very small girl indeed, she carried away a first prize from the Paris Conservatory of Music—an honor which that venerable institution customarily bestows only on the maturist and foremost musicians of France. She will replace Miss Mabel Garrison, who was originally engaged as soloist at this concert, but was forced by illness to withdraw.

For the symphonic portion of the afternoon Mr. Monteux and the great orchestra will perform Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

Herald Tues. Nov 11

PENSION FUND

Madeleine Brard, the phenomen[al] little French pianist who has set Ne[w] York marveling by the brilliance a[nd] the beauty of her playing, will appe[ar] as soloist at the Pension Fund Concert [of] the Boston Symphony Orchestra [in] Symphony Hall next Sunday afterno[on] at 3 o'clock, when she will play Sain[t]-Saens' Concerto in G minor.

As a very small girl she carried aw[ay] a first prize from the Paris Conserv[a]tory of Music. Next Sunday she w[ill] replace Miss Mabel Garrison, who w[as] originally engaged as soloist at th[is] concert, but was forced by illness [to] withdraw. For the symphonic porti[on] of the afternoon, Mr. Monteux and t[he] great orchestra will perform Tsch[ai]kowsky's Pathetic Symphony, the P[re]lude and Love-Death from "Tristan a[nd] Isolde" and the Overture to "Willi[am] Tell."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING WORLD,

N. Y. Symphony And Boston Men Begin Concerts

By Sylvester Rawling.

SOMEWHAT belated, because of the early bird tactics of Artur Bodanzky and the New Symphony Orchestra with three concerts already to their credit, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra entered the local lists at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Both organizations stuck to familiar works and neither may be credited with new efficiency in presentation. Each drew large but not crowded audiences, and there was something of lethargy in the matter of applause.

Mr. Damrosch and his men made their bow in the afternoon, beginning with Brahms's First Symphony. Something of sonority and much of resilience in the pronouncement were missed, despite the manifestly earnest purpose of Mr. Damrosch and the players to do full justice to the noble work. The Prelude and Finale from "Tristan and Isolde," which came at the end, suffered in a like way. Mr. Damrosch usually unfolds the poignant tragedy with a more gripping appeal.

The middle number was Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Albert Spalding the soloist, his first appearance here since he got back from the war. A bit of nervousness at first was apparent in Mr. Spalding's playing; but he soon overcame that and revealed the well poised, modest, sincere artist that he is. He won, as he deserved to win, the long continued applause that both the audience and the players bestowed upon him.

Conductors may come and conductors may go, but the Boston Orchestra's hold upon its New York clientele remains unshaken, at least if one may judge by the size and quality of last night's audience in Carnegie Hall. One fact, however, could not escape notice: After a cordial greeting of Mr. Monteux, there was not much volume or warmth in the applause. Yet the quality of the band as a whole, and in the individual choirs, remains high and Mr. Monteux controls his men well. He is more familiar with his material now than he was at the beginning of last season when he took Mr. Rabaud's place for a few concerts, and the organization had not recovered from the disruption caused by the withdrawal of Dr. Karl Muck.

Schumann's first symphony was the work with which the concert began. The performance of it, while not brilliant, was worthy. Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," overture and ballet, which followed, is not of the master's best output. As the programme was too long it might have been spared. It was in Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" that Mr. Monteux was happiest. He gave it a fine exposition. That his taste inclines to the modern was shown again by his sympathetic presentation of Enesco's Suite, opus 9. The hopes raised by the fascinating prelude are not realized in the other movements. The work grows monotonous. Perhaps, it was that one's hearing capacity had become dulled by too long a bill of fare.

New York City
NOV 7 — 1919

DAMROSCH AND BOSTON BANDS IN CONCERTS

Both Orchestras Begin Long Carnegie Hall Season Before Large Audiences.

From now on until next May the concertgoer who fancies orchestral music chiefly or exclusively—there are that sort and any and every other among the species—may drop in upon some one of New York's multitude of symphonic bands almost any hour of the day or evening. There are more orchestras to be listened to this season than ever before, and they plan about all the concerts the traffic will bear. Moreover, there seems to be a quite definite and worth-while place for all of them, considering the size of their audiences and their advance subscriptions, nor is the competitive spirit by any means amiss in their several endeavors. It all makes for season and then returned to his post at the Metropolitan Opera. This year he has wholly given up the opera. Both conductors were greeted with great warmth of cordiality in Carnegie Hall upon their reappearance yesterday.

Mr. Damrosch sought out no new musical disclosures for this concert—he seems to have reserved most of his immediate garnering of novelties for next week—but the practise of presenting nothing out of the ordinary at a first concert is an old one with this conductor. Yesterday's opened with the Brahms C minor symphony and closed with the prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde." Between these occurred the Mendelssohn violin concerto, with Albert Spalding playing the solo portion. Mr. Damrosch and his men gave a generally good performance of the Brahms work, but the orchestra, which has a considerable number of new members, including several at first desks, needs much polishing before it will produce as smooth tone and adroit response to Mr. Damrosch's wishes as it did formerly. Mr. Spalding, returned from the war for his first appearance this season, did a pretty piece of work with the Mendelssohn music, although one has heard it in more gracious revelation.

Mr. Monteux was also not prodigal of novelty in the Boston Orchestra's program, although it held some very seldom heard music of Beethoven—the overture and the adagio from the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Schumann's "Spring" symphony opened the concert and Debussy's prelude, "L'apres-midi d'un faune" and a suite opus 9, by Georges Enesco, closed it.

The Boston Orchestra is still very far from being the virtuoso band it once was, nor do Mr. Monteaux's methods seem conducive toward restoring its quality. Considerable rudeness and crudeness thus go hand in hand. The band is especially unfortunate in its brass choir, with the trombones offending most in unmellow, not to say coarse and noisy, tone. This was so much the case that immediate improvement was noticeable in the Beethoven overture when the trombones were absent.

Mr. Monteaux as a symphonic conductor still leans to obvious effects with a dramatic tang. It was in this fashion that he treated Schumann. He attained a wide-awake vigor, the music was interesting at his hands, but the beauty of suavity and the significance of a welded mass of detail were not to be discovered. The "Prometheus" music is a simpler matter and was well done, especially the adagio, in which some of the first [illegible] themselves smoothly. The Debussy prelude is an old affair to Mr. Monteux, which he plays excellently, but without quite the niicety and subtlety within its poetic intent.

Concert-C

IN THE EAR OF NEW YORK

MR. MONTEUX AND HIS ORCHESTRA FRESHLY JUDGED

Two Concerts Before Audiences Renewing the Numbers and the Applause of Previous Years—The Reviewers, the New Leader and the Changed Band—Praise for the Conductor's Stravinsky — Questionings Over His Schumann

As established conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux has led it for the first times in New York and the discriminating public that its concerts assemble there has heard, likewise for the first times, the reorganized band as he is moulding it. The first of these concerts befell last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," the overture and a slow movement from Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Enesco's Suite to fill the programme—all pieces recently heard at home. Of the occasion as a whole, Mr. Spaeth writes to The Transcript:

That New York still reserves for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the place of honor in its musical affections was sufficiently proved last Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, when Pierre Monteux led his men through their first programme of the metropolitan season. The hall was crowded to the doors, as always on these occasions, by the true followers of orchestral music, and the welcome to Mr. Monteux and the players indicated an enthusiasm which was more than cordiality. At the close of the "Spring Symphony" of Schuman, the applause assumed proportions which demanded acknowledgment by the entire band, and throughout the evening the spirit of hearty approval was unmistakable. There was interest in the naively simple beauties of Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" elicited particular appreciation of the wood-wind choir of the Bostonians, although Mr. Monteux chose to give the elusive composition a surprisingly literal interpretation. The comparatively unfamiliar Suite, Opus 9, by Georges Enesco, was a pleasng and far from indigestible dessert to a generally unpretentious and wholesome feast.

The impression left by the opening concert is that the orchestra as a whole has recovered much of the technical finish which marked its performances before the disruption of the war-period, and that Mr. Monteux, free from the embarrassment of acting merely as a stop-gap, is already beginning to impress upon the players something of his own ideas and personality. Whether these factors are to prove of permanent value is still an open question.

Various are the impressions received and recorded by the reviewers in the New York newspapers. The Tribune, for example, heard the orchestra with no small pleasure; the conductor with less satisfaction. It says:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may change its backer, its manager and its conductor, but its New York public remains faithful. The famous orchestra (alas! we can call it Major Higginson's no longer) found Carnegie Hall filled with an audience possessed of all its old-time brilliancy, while Mr. Monteux, appearing for the first time in New York as the orchestra's regular conductor, received a greeting as he entered the conductor's stand which was more than merely polite. Before the end of the first movement of the opening Schumann symphony had been played one thing was gratefully evident—that the personnel of the orchestra had recovered from the severe "shake-up" it had received by the expulsion of its German members. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old, homogeneous, resonant in tone, perfectly balanced throughout its choirs. And this fact alone speaks volumes for its conductor.

It cannot, however, be said that Mr. Monteux gave an inspired or an exciting reading of Schumann's "Spring Symphony"; indeed, it seemed at times as if the spirit of winter rather than spring were upon it. This same heaviness of hand was apparent in the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," but in the adagio Mr. Monteux at last came to his own and gave to it a performance of great charm. In Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" Mr. Monteux was, however, completely successful. Rarely had this oft-played composition received a more delicate or more sympathetic reading, and conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received.

Writing in The Times, Mr. Aldrich, who had not officially heard the orchestra since the days of change and reorganization, is coolly judicious:

Old friends and admirers of the orchestra had no doubt prepared themselves to hear in its playing something other than they had been accustomed to, different even from what they had heard last season. Nor was this expectation disappointed. The tone of the organization is a new one—brilliant, tending toward hardness, with more heard from the side of the brasses than formerly, and that less mellow; with fluency, and, on the whole, excellent quality from the wood-winds. Something else has taken the place of the golden and transparent beauty of former days.

Now Mr. Monteux is the permanent chief, and he has had the time and opportunity to make his intentions prevail in the orchestra's performances. His beat is very positive, his modelling of the phrase crisp and in high relief. His reading of the symphony was full of nervous tension, highly strung, in sharp contrasts of dynamics, wherein sometimes tone was forced in strings and brass. Much was made of every [illegible]; nothing was left unnoted; the elaboration of detail sometimes lost of the engaging and [illegible] flow of the music. In the [illegible] something was Symphony" is filled with an exulting spirit, but it does not verge upon the feverish.

The music from Beethoven's ballet pleased, especially the adagio, in which there were solo passages for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp well played. Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered explicitly rather than suggestively; the shimmering, vaporous atmosphere was clarified by an area of high barometric pressure that exposed all the orchestral mechanism. It was in its way interesting and informing; but it was not a poetical exposition of Debussys thought.

In The World, Mr. Huneker is disposed to agree with Mr. Aldrich, but en passant he cannot forbear an amusing fling at the sepulchral Rabaud from whom the orchestra and its audiences were timely and happily delivered. He writes:

Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinière, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classics. Nevertheless, one feels sure with him, and it may be asserted without fear of denial that he has more fire in his beat than his predecessor, a gifted composer, yet always irresistibly suggesting an undertaker presiding over the obsequies of the various compositions he so mournfully conducted. But Pierre Monteux has not a light touch. He is seldom Gallic.

Schumann's first symphony, with its springlike airs and romantic rustlings, as if in some dim Old World garden, went rather heavily. Naturally the joyous last movement sounded more Schumannesque than its companions. Even if the scoring is opaque, there is a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night. Strangely enough the conductor seemed more at ease in an "overture to a heroic and allegorical ballet, 'The Brood of Prometheus,'" by, of all musicians in the world, Beethoven.

Debussy's Faun again enjoyed a rutilant afternoon — metaphysically be it understood; the dream of a dream, the reverberations of which filled the chambers of his ardent brain, a marvellous evocation of a soul-mate related in terms of musical mysticism. Unhappily it wasn't mystic, nor poetic. It sounded like the statement of a fact, not the evocation of a memory-image. But beautiful because of the sheer sensuous quality of the scoring.

In turn, Mr. Henderson of The Sun can[illegible]ot forget the dear departed, remarking that Mr. Rabaud "discovered that directing concerts in this country was not what he fondly fancied it to be and sailaw away." Like the rest the reviewer judged the performance of Schumann's symphony somewhat heavy. "It served well," he writes, "to display the present quality of the famous orchestra, which seemed to have gained in cloudiness and to have lost something of its old starry depths. The symphony was played somewhat crudely, somewhat rudely, but with no little of the buoyant vigor for which its score calls. . . . In Debussy's music Mr. Monteux was entirely at home. The orchestra played it very well, indeed, and it was good to hear."

For the second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux's programme traversed Haydn's little symphony, "The Queen of France," Beethoven's overture "King Stephen," to be resurrected next Friday and Saturday in Boston; Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." With the outcome the reviewers were well pleased and in The Times, Mr. Aldrich writes not only for himself, but in measure for all of them, saying:

Haydn's Symphony in D, called "The Queen of France," was agreeable and not too familiar; a hearty expression of the composer's geniality. It was heard with pleasure, in a performance full of spirit and carefully wrought shadings, with amply vigorous contrasts in dynamics, and with a quality of tone that seemed rather more ingratiating than what was heard in Schumann's symphony the other evening. The orchestra was reduced by half the number of double basses in this symphony, but no other changes were made in the direction of dimensions supposedly Haydn's.

Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," is not Franck at his best; yet it is an ingenious and effective treatment of a theme that has appealed to many musicians; and not all have treated it so successfully, with so much atmospheric suggestion and picturesqueness, in terms so purely musical. The performance of it was admirable, full and rich in color, without excess in dynamics, without undue striving for realistic effects, and yet with the dramatic meaning the composer was seeking.

In was in the selections from Stravinsky's ballet music "The Fire-Bird" that the orchestra and Mr. Monteux achieved their greatest success. The music is exquisite in its fancifulness, boldly fantastic, capricious, ingenious, picturesque, pictorial; illustrating the changing fantasy of the ballet. Something of its fantasticality, its imaginative power, becomes meaningless when it is taken away from the fantasticality of the action. Yet the lullaby, the dance of the princesses, and, perhaps somewhat less, the scene of the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, have enough of their own to say, as music, to stand fairly well by themselves. . . . Mr. Monteux conducted the music with complete knowledge and the fullest sympathy—he was the conductor of notable performances of the ballet in Paris and London, and knows its spirit as do few. The performance was brilliant.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Mme. Galli-Curci as Usual—Miss Brard Instead of Miss Garrison—Mr. Longy's [illegible]

Items and Announcements

Miss Garrison is unable to keep her engagement with the Symphony Orchestra for the concert to increase its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon next at Symphony Hall. In her stead, Miss Magdeleine Brard, the youthful French pianist, will be heard for the first time in Boston. A pupil of Mr. Cortot and still in her teens, she made no small stir when she played in New York last winter. This autumn she has renewed the impression of signal abilities, less as prodigy than as pianist regardless of her years. In Boston, she will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in G minor, music in which Mr. Cortot excels and in which, in all likelihood, he has schooled her.

CRITICS AS PARTISANS

Post Nov 9

Fortunes of Monteux and Symphony in New York

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last season in Boston Mr. Monteux gave two very brilliant concerts prior to the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then proceeded on tour to New York, and was promptly ripped up the back by the music reviewers of that city.

It was hard to believe at this event, that the same man who had given concerts in a manner greatly to the satisfaction of audiences which should certainly know good performances from bad, could conduct so satisfactorily in Boston and so very unsatisfactorily in New York.

Of course, stranger things have happened in the history of music. Anyone who knows anything about the temperamental difficulties of musicians and the practical handicaps there are against a performer invariably doing himself justice in the presence of the public, knows how an untoward incident, or a very small emotional disturbance, may spoil an entire concert. Therefore, when Bostonians who had derived great satisfaction from the accomplishments of the new conductor read about the concert in New York, some of them took into account the possibility that Mr. Monteux, a musician of temperament, perhaps did play poorly in New York.

There were rumors which confirmed this supposition. It was said that on the night of the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918, which was the date of the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony season of 1918-19, there was not only great excitement within the Symphony orchestra, but also much din on the streets outside, that these things, and the unaccustomed acoustics of the hall, and so-forth, had influenced the conductor unfortunately in the performanc of his task.

Now, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave a New York concert last Thursday night. They played compositions which had already been heard here, including the Schumann "Spring" symphony, which by many people in Boston who are fairminded and whose knowledge is worthy of respect, was one of the finest performances of this symphony—perhaps the finest—given here by any orchestra in many years. But the New York Telegram found that while Monteux and his men read this symphony "with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries" (whatever that may mean) it still felt that it was played "with a kind of 'little' cleverness and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present." The virtue of the performance of Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" lay not, if you please, in any particular qualities of taste or imagination on the part of the conductor, but "in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux."

Perhaps the gentlemen preferred the dry and ponderous reading of this music which Dr. Muck was in the habit of giving.

But the gem of New York comment, to our mind, on the playing of the Boston Symphony, is the comment of Mr. James Huneker, "Jimmy," as he is known to his friends, who, in one article discovered that "Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classic" and that the Schumann symphony "went rather heavily . . . a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night." Following which, in a second article, Mr. Huneker discovers that Walter Damrosch, who conducted on the same day a concert by the New York Symphony was "a veteran, though not a superfluous or lagging one" and the tone of the orchestra "a delight to the ear."

Now, we are not disposed to deny to the New York Symphony all of the fine qualities ascribed to it by Mr. Huneker, nor would we willingly comment at length on Damrosch's conducting. We once heard him conduct Beethoven's 5th symphony, and that day we listened no more. But when a reviewer so far forsakes all reasonable perspective in comparing orchestras like the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductors like Damrosch and Monteux, with an obvious leaning toward Damrosch—then it is time to throw up the hands and stop talking. You cannot argue with people who are determined in advance to see one side of a question. The puzzle of the New York fault-findings—or at least, some New York fault-findings—with Monteux is explained: provincialism and partisanship.

Post Mon. Nov 10

SOLOIST FOR PENSION FUND

French Girl Pianist to Play Saint-Saens' Concerto

Magdeleine Brard, the phenomenal little French pianist who has set New York marvelling and talking by the dazzling brilliance and the distinguished beauty of her playing, is at last to be heard in Boston, when she will appear as soloist at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. She will play the delightful but formidably difficult Concerto by Saint-Saens in G minor, by which she won the larger part of her fame in this country.

As a very small girl indeed, she carried away a first prize from the Paris Conservatory of Music—an honor which that venerable institution customarily bestows only on the maturist and foremost musicians of France. She will replace Miss Mabel Garrison, who was originally engaged as soloist at this concert, but was forced by illness to withdraw.

For the symphonic portion of the afternoon Mr. Monteux and the great orchestra will perform Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Rossini's' overture to "William Tell."

Herald Tues. Nov 11

PENSION FUND

Madeleine Brard, the phenomen[illegible] little French pianist who has set Ne[illegible] York marveling by the brilliance a[illegible] the beauty of her playing, will appe[illegible] as soloist at the Pension Fund Concert [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Symphony Hall next Sunday afterno[illegible] at 3 o'clock, when she will play Sain[illegible] Saens' Concerto in G minor.

As a very small girl she carried aw[illegible] a first prize from the Paris Conserv[illegible] tory of Music. Next Sunday she w[illegible] replace Miss Mabel Garrison, who w[illegible] originally engaged as soloist at th[illegible] concert, but was forced by illness [illegible] withdraw. For the symphonic porti[illegible] of the afternoon, Mr. Monteux and t[illegible] great orchestra will perform Tsch[illegible] kowsky's Pathetic Symphony, the Pr[illegible] lude and Love-Death from "Tristan a[illegible] Isolde" and the Overture to "Willi[illegible] Tell."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING WORLD,
[illegible]

N. Y. Symphony And Boston Men Begin Concerts

By Sylvester Rawling.

SOMEWHAT belated, because of the early bird tactics of Artur Bodanzky and the New Symphony Orchestra with three concerts already to their credit, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra entered the local lists at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Both organizations stuck to familiar works and neither may be credited with new efficiency in presentation. Each drew large but not crowded audiences, and there was something of lethargy in the matter of applause.

Mr. Damrosch and his men made their bow in the afternoon, beginning with Brahms's First Symphony. Something of sonority and much of resilience in the pronouncement were missed, despite the manifestly earnest purpose of Mr. Damrosch and the players to do full justice to the noble work. The Prelude and Finale from "Tristan and Isolde," which came at the end, suffered in a like way. Mr. Damrosch usually unfolds the poignant tragedy with a more gripping appeal.

The middle number was Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Albert Spalding the soloist, his first appearance here since he got back from the war. A bit of nervousness at first was apparent in M. Spalding's playing; but he soon overcame that and revealed the well poised, modest, sincere artist that he is. He won, as he deserved to win, the long continued applause that both the audience and the players bestowed upon him.

Conductors may come and conductors may go, but the Boston Orchestra's hold upon its New York clientele remains unshaken, at least if one may judge by the size and quality of last night's audience in Carnegie Hall. One fact, however, could not escape notice: After a cordial greeting of Mr. Monteux, there was not much volume or warmth in the applause. Yet the quality of the band as a whole, and in the individual choirs, remains high and Mr. Monteux controls his men well. He is more familiar with his material now than he was at the beginning of last season when he took Mr. Rabaud's place for a few concerts, and the organization had not recovered from the disruption caused by the withdrawal of Dr. Karl Muck.

Schumann's first symphony was the work with which the concert began. The performance of it, while not brilliant, was worthy. Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," overture and ballet, which followed, is not of the master's best output. As the programme was too long it might have been spared. It was in Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" that Mr. Monteux was happiest. He gave it a fine exposition. That his taste inclines to the modern was shown again by his sympathetic presentation of Enesco's Suite, opus 9. The hopes raised by the fascinating prelude are not realized in the other movements. The work grows monotonous. Perhaps it was that one's hearing capacity had [illegible]ome dulled by too long a bill of fare.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 7 - 1919

DAMROSCH AND BOSTON BANDS IN CONCERTS

Both Orchestras Begin Long Carnegie Hall Season Before Large Audiences.

From now on until next May the concertgoer who fancies orchestral music chiefly or exclusively—there are that sort and any and every other among the species—may drop in upon some one of New York's multitude of symphonic bands almost any hour of the day or evening. There are more orchestras to be listened to this season than ever before, and they plan about all the concerts the traffic will bear. Moreover, there seems to be a quite definite and worth-while place for all of them, considering the size of their audiences and their advance subscriptions, nor is the competitive spirit by any means amiss in their several endeavors. It all makes for season and then returned to his post at the Metropolitan Opera. This year he has wholly given up the opera. Both conductors were greeted with great warmth of cordiality in Carnegie Hall upon their reappearance yesterday.

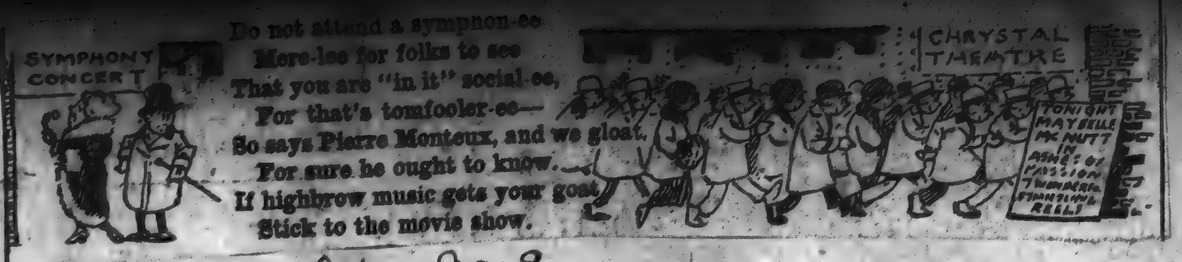
Mr. Damrosch sought out no new musical disclosures for this concert—he seems to have reserved most of his immediate garnering of novelties for next week—but the practise of presenting nothing out of the ordinary at a first concert is an old one with this conductor. Yesterday's opened with the Brahms C minor symphony and closed with the prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde." Between these occurred the Mendelssohn violin concerto, with Albert Spalding playing the solo portion. Mr. Damrosch and his men gave a generally good performance of the Brahms work, but the orchestra, which has a considerable number of new members, including several at first desks, needs much polishing before it will produce as smooth tone and adroit response to Mr. Damrosch's wishes as it did formerly. Mr. Spalding, returned from the war for his first appearance this season, did a pretty piece of work with the Mendelssohn music, although one has heard it in more gracious revelation.

Mr. Monteux was also not prodigal of novelty in the Boston Orchestra's program, although it held some very seldom heard music of Beethoven—the overture and the adagio from the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Schumann's "Spring" symphony opened the concert and Debussy's prelude, "L'apres-midi d'un faune" and a suite opus 9, by Georges Enesco, closed it.

The Boston Orchestra is still very far from being the virtuoso band it once was, nor do Mr. Monteaux's methods seem conducive toward restoring its quality. Considerable rudeness and crudeness thus go hand in hand. The band is especially unfortunate in its brass choir, with the trombones offending most in unmellow, not to say coarse and noisy, tone. This was so much the case that immediate improvement was noticeable in the Beethoven overture when the trombones were absent.

Mr. Monteaux as a symphonic conductor still leans to obvious effects with a dramatic tang. It was in this fashion that he treated Schumann. He attained a wide-awake vigor, the music was interesting at his hands, but the beauty of suavity and the significance of a welded mass of detail were not to be discovered. The "Prometheus" music is a simpler matter [illegible] was well done, especially the adagio, in which some of the first in[illegible] themselves smoothly. The Debussy prelude is an old affair to Mr. Monteux, which he plays excellently, but without quite the nicety and subtlety within its poetic intent.



Prov. Journal. Nov 9

Herald Nov 9

APPEARING THIS WEEK

MME. POULA FRIJSH, SOPRANO, WHO WILL SING AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povia Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation au Voyage," Moussorgsky's "Hopak," and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's Symphonic Poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston), and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen."

Advertiser Nov 9

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will be a feature of the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. The other orchestral numbers will be the prelude and love-death music from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Mabel Garrison will be unable to sing, but another soloist may be engaged in her place.

Herald Nov 13

CONCERTS AND LECTURES

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place tonight. Orchestral pieces by Berlioz, Chadwick and Beethoven. Vera Janacopulos, soprano, will sing songs by Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will include these orchestral pieces: Berlioz, "Childe Harold" Symphony; Chadwick, "Angel of Death" (first time in Boston); Beethoven overture to "King Stephen." Poula Frijch will sing the Archangel's air from Franck's "Redemption" and songs by Duparc, Moussorgsky and Block with orchestra.

Mr. Newman will give the first of his illustrated travel talks in Symphony Hall tomorow night and Saturday afternoon. Subject "Alsace-Lorraine."

The Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" Symphony; Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death "Triston and Isolde;" Rossini, overture to "William Tell," Magdeline Brard, the remarkable young French pianist, who made a sensation in New York, last season, will play Saint-Saens's concerto in C. minor.

L. W. Rogers, national [illegible]

From Journal NOV - 9 1919
Providence, R. I.

The first concert of the series that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in this city will open with Beethoven's light and graceful Second Symphony in D-major, which composition was chosen by Pierre Monteux to open the orchestral season in Boston. He will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun," with which he is probably more familiar than any other conductor. He received a number of changes in the scoring from Debussy himself in a personal interview before the great composer's death. He has conducted it often, especially with the Russian ballet when that organization startled Paris and Boston.

Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes," which met with such success when played by the New York Philharmonic earlier in the season, will close the concert. The Spanish-American baritone, Emilio de Gogorza, will contribute two numbers—Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

The New York concerts of the orchestra last week met with their usual success and Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically received. The programme included Debussy's "Faun" and a number which had not met with the expected amount of favor in Boston. At the concert in Boston Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" failed to interest the audience, which was engrossed with the brilliant playing and personality of Rakhmaninov, who was the soloist for the afternoon.

Continued on Page Nine.

Continued from Page Nine.

Whether it was the romance of having the composer in person or simply that Rakhmaninov's composition was enhanced by his revealing hand, can't be definitely stated. However, it was very definitely demonstrated that Stravinsky meant nothing in the lives of the audience who were wrapt in Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto for piano in D-minor.

...VIDENCE SUNDAY JOUR...

...NAL, NOVEMBER 9, 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in this city will open with Beethoven's light and graceful Second Symphony in D-major, which composition was chosen by Pierre Monteux to open the orchestral season in Boston. He will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun," with which he is probably more familiar than any other conductor. He received a number of changes in the scoring from Debussy himself in a personal interview before the great composer's death. He has conducted it often, especially with the Russian ballet when that organization startled Paris and Boston.

Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes," which met with such success when played by the New York Philharmonic earlier in the season, will close the concert. The Spanish-American baritone, Emilio de Gogorza, will contribute two numbers—Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

The New York concerts of the orchestra last week met with their usual success and Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically received. The programme included Debussy's "Faun" and a number which had not met with the expected amount of favor in Boston. At the concert in Boston Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" failed to interest the audience, which was engrossed with the brilliant playing and personality of Rakhmaninov, who was the soloist for the afternoon.

Whether it was the romance of having the composer in person or simply that Rakhmaninov's composition was enhanced by his revealing hand, can't be definitely stated. However, it was very definitely demonstrated that Stravinsky meant nothing in the lives of the audience who were wrapt in Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto for piano in D-minor.

...R. I., NOVEMBER 9,

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Of the five Boston Symphony concerts which are to be given in Infantry Ha... this year and for which the sale of sub... scription seats will close next Wedne...

...IBUNE, PROVIDENCE,

...day, the opening concert will take place a week from Tuesday, on Nov. 18. The same symphony which Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor, chose to open the season in Boston, will head this concert: Beethoven's graceful and melodious Second Symphony in D Major. Mr. Monteux will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," with which sensuous music he became famous as conductor of the Russian Ballet, scandalizing many. The concert will close with Liszt's most popular Symphonic Poem, "The Prelude," a brilliant and splendidly scored work. As first soloist of the year at the same concert, Emilio de Gogorza, the foremost concert baritone of the day, will sing Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Percy Grainger, the celebrated pianist, ... heard at Shubert Majestic ...

Trav. Nov 8

POVLA FRIJSH FOR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Povia Frijsh, Danish soprano, will be the soloist at next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. She will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. The orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Frederick Denayer, viola, playing the solo; Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," the first performance in Boston, and the Beethoven "King Stephen" overture.

Globe Nov 8

Frijsh Symphony Soloist

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povia Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston) and Beethoven's "Overture to King Stephen."

Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its two annual concerts for the benefit of its pension fund next Sunday at Symphony Hall. This concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual 3:30. The program, which should insure a capacity audience, includes Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." The "Love-Death" will be given in the arrangement for orchestra alone.

Boston Musical Association

Transcript Nov 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Piece by Mr. Chadwick on Mr. Monteux's Programme — Mme. Frijsh and Miss Janacopulos to Sing with the Symphony Orchestra—The Elshuco Trio Comes

A SINGER new to the Symphony Concerts will come to them next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Mme. Frijsh; while one new piece stands on Mr. Monteux's list—Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death." Mme. Frijsh will be heard in an air from Franck's quasi-oratorio, "The Redemption"; in songs by Dupare and Musorgsky and in settings of two Psalms by the Jewish composer, Bloch, whose astringent music is as yet too little known in Boston. To all these pieces Mme. Frijsh bids fair to bring the intensity of imagination and projection distinguishing her as a singer. Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem is a brief music originally played by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York last February. It was suggested by the relief, "Death Staying the Sculptor's Hand," upon a monument to Martin Milmore at Forest Hills. The music would summon the creative zest of the sculptor, the hateful intrusion of death and the glory of work surviving and overcoming it. Mr. Monteux's symphony is Berlioz's familiar "Harold in Italy," ageing romantic music born of the wanderings and sensations of Byron's hero. A sola viola speaks for him and Mr. Denayer, the new leader of that choir will play it. The remaining orchestral number is Beethoven's overture to a forgotten play, "King Stephen," long overlooked at these concerts.

At Cambridge in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will also play the symphonic pieces above specified. The singer, however, will be Miss Janacopulos, the young woman, Greek by race and Brazilian by birth, whose warmth of voice, feeling and aspect all herald and applaud her. Her most unusual piece is "The Commander," one of Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death," vivid and bitter music rarely heard in concerts or, for that matter, anywhere else.

Post Nov 9

FRIJSH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povia Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston), and Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Miss Mabel Garrison, who will sing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, is a young Baltimore girl. Graduating with something more than the usual honors from the Peabody Institute in that city in 1912, she began her career with the Aborn Opera Company the following April. Her next step was the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, two years later, where her light and limpid coloratura voice and her charming presence quickly won her the distinction of being set up as the rival of the Chicago Opera Company's Galli-Curci. Perhaps her most successful part is that of the Princess in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or," from which opera she will sing in Boston the "Hymn to the Sun," as well as the famous florid aria from David's "The Pearl of Brazil."

Pierre Monteux will conduct, as the symphonic portion of this concert, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell."

Herald Nov 13

L. L. AIKEN ELECTED SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

E. B. Dane Succeeds F. E. Lowell as Treasurer

The nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have elected Alfred L. Aiken, president of the National Shawmut Bank, a member of the board, thus filling it with the regular number of ten. Frederick E. Lowell has found it necessary, by the pressure of other duties, to resign from his official post as treasurer of the orchestra, although still a trustee. Ernest B. Dane, also a trustee, who is president of the Brookline Trust Company, has become treasurer in his stead. The other officers stand: Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, and Galen L. Stone, vice-president. The remaining trustees are M. A. DeWolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

Post Nov. 13

Aiken Made Trustee of Symphony Orchestra

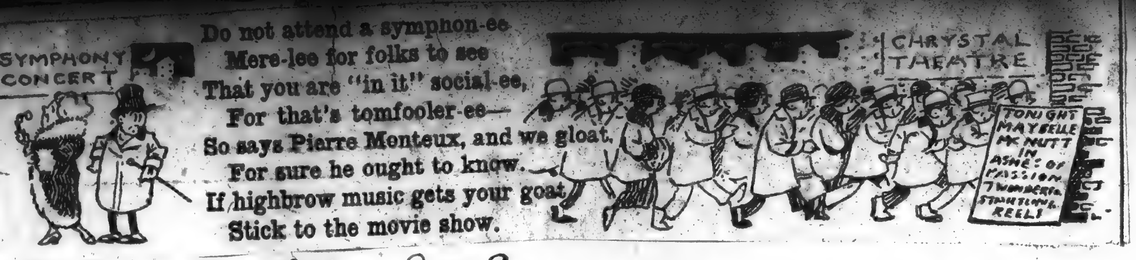
At a recent meeting of the nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., another trustee was elected—Alfred L. Aiken, president of the National Shawmut Bank, thus making the full board of 10. Also, Frederick E. Lowell has found it necessary by the pressure of other duties to resign from his official post as treasurer of the orchestra, although still a trustee. Ernest B. Dane, also a trustee, who is president of the Brookline Trust Company, has become treasurer in his stead. The other officers stand: Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, and Galen L. Stone, vice-president. The remaining trustees are M. A. DeWolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

Herald Nov 13

Concert Rudeness

Advertisements give the hour of a recital by Mr. Boanergos, the merciless pianist; Miss Polyglotti, the distinguished interpreter of lyric and dramatic songs, and Mr. Pogrom Stringgutavitch, the Ukranian violinist, as 3 P. M. The hardened concert-goer, resigned, prepared for the best or the worst, is punctual in his seat. The recital begins anywhere from 3:15 to 3:20. A hearer that runs his daily course on schedule time is thereby debarred from the pleasure of hearing the final "group." The excuse for the delay is that there are many, chiefly deadheads, outside, in line for the payment of the war tax; that at Jordan Hall the settlement of this tax at the box office is exasperatingly slow. But before the war too many concert-goers were unpunctual. The singer's first group of songs was punctuated by the boot heels of late comers tramping down the aisles and by the slamming down of seats by ushers.

Late comers are a nuisance at the Symphony concerts this season as in the past. It is true that by reason of the wholly inadequate street car service on Huntington avenue tardiness in ... times unavoidable; but it is ... courteous to conductor and those s... to be too early than late. Mr. Mon... is in the habit of putting the sympl... first on the program. Nothing is m... disturbing than the entrance of ... after the first movement of the sy... phony. The enforced long pause lesse... the effect of what has been played a... dampens expectation of what is to com... And some of the tardy saunter down... the aisles, nodding amicably to friend... on the right and the left, and finally seat... themselves with the air of ... ing: "I am here; now let the ... on." If the rule the ... admitted until the ... were made and enfor... a greater degree of ...



VIDENCE SUNDAY JOUR

ENAL, NOVEMBER 9, 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in this city will open with Beethoven's light and graceful Second Symphony in D-major, which composition was chose by Pierre Monteux to open the orches tral season in Boston. He will also pla Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's "After noon of a Faun," with which he is pro ably more familiar than any other co ductor. He received a number of changes in the scoring from Debussy himself in a personal interview before the great composer's death. He has conducted it often, especially with the Russian ballet when that organization startled Paris and Boston.

Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes," which met with such success when played by the New York Philharmonic earlier in the season, will close the concert. The Spanish-American baritone, Emilio de Gogorza, will contribute two numbers—Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

The New York concerts of the orchestra last week met with their usual success and Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically received. The programme included Debussy's "Faun" and a number which had not met with the expected amount of favor in Boston. At the concert in Boston Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" failed to interest the audience, which was engrossed with the brilliant playing and personality of Rakhmaninov, who was the soloist for the afternoon.

Whether it was the romance of having the composer in person or simply that Rakhmaninov's composition was enhanced by his revealing hand, can't be definitely stated. However, it was very definitely demonstrated that Stravinsky meant nothing in the lives of the audience who were wrapt in Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto for piano in D-minor.

* * *

R. I., NOVEMBER 9,

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Of the five Boston Symphony concer which are to be given in Infantry Ha this year, and for which the sale of sul scription seats will close next Wedne

IBUNE, PROVIDENCE,

day, the opening concert will take place a week from Tuesday, on Nov. 18. The same symphony which Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor, chose to open the season in Boston, will head this concert: Beethoven's graceful and melodious Second Symphony in D Major. Mr. Monteux will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," with which sensuous music he became famous as conductor of the Russian Ballet, scandalizing many. The concert will close with Liszt's most popular Symphonic Poem, "The Prelude," a brilliant and splendidly scored work. As first soloist of the year at the same concert, Emilio de Gogorza, the foremost concert baritone of the day, will sing Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Percy Grainger, the celebrated pianist, ... heard at Schubert Majestic

Trans. Nov 8

POVLA FRIJSH FOR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Povla Frijsh, Danish soprano, will be the soloist at next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. She will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. The orchestral numbers will be Berloiz's "Harold in Italy" sympnony, Frederick Denayer, viola, playing the solo; Chadwick's sympnonic poem, "The Angel of Death," the first performance in Boston, and the Beethoven "King Stephen" overture.

QUDER HIS

Globe Nov 9

...ssue.

Frijsh Symphony Soloist

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povla Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston) and Beethoven's "Overture to King Stephen."

Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its two annual concerts for the benefit of its pension fund next Sunday at Symphony Hall. This concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual 3:30. The program, which should insure a capacity audience, includes Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." The "Love-Death" will be given in the arrangement for orchestra alone.

Boston Musical Association

Prov. Journal Nov 9

Herald Nov 9

APPEARING THIS WEEK

MME. POULA FRIJSH, SOPRANO, WHO WILL SING AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Transcript Nov 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Piece by Mr. Chadwick on Mr. Monteux's Programme — Mme. Frijsh and Miss Janacopulos to Sing with the Symphony Orchestra—The Elshuco Trio Comes

A SINGER new to the Symphony Concerts will come to them next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Mme. Frijsh; while one new piece stands on Mr. Monteux's list—Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death." Mme. Frijsh will be heard in an air from Franck's quasi- oratorio, "The Redemption"; in songs by Duparc and Musorgsky and in settings of two Psalms by the Jewish composer, Bloch, whose astringent music is as yet too little known in Boston. To all these pieces Mme. Frijsh bids fair to bring the intensity of imagination and projection distinguishing her as a singer. Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem is a brief music originally played by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York last February. It was suggested by the relief, "Death Staying the Sculptor's Hand," upon a monument to Martin Milmore at Forest Hills. The music would summon the creative zest of the sculptor, the hateful intrusion of death and the glory of work surviving and overcoming it. Mr. Monteux's symphony is Berlioz's familiar "Harold in Italy," ageing romantic music born of the wanderings and sensations of Byron's hero. A solo viola speaks for him and Mr. Denayer, the new leader of that choir will play it. The remaining orchestral number is Beethoven's overture to a forgotten play, "King Stephen," long overlooked at these concerts.

At Cambridge in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will also play the symphonic pieces above specified. The singer, however, will be Miss Janacopulos, the young woman, Greek by race and Brazilian by birth, whose warmth of voice, feeling and aspect all herald and applaud her. Her most unusual piece is "The Commander," one of Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death," vivid and bitter music rarely heard in concerts or, for that matter, anywhere else.

Post Nov 9

FRIJSH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povia Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation to the Journey," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston), and Beethoven's Overture to 'King Stephen."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Miss Mabel Garrison, who will sing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, is a young Baltimore girl. Graduating with something more than the usual honors from the Peabody Institute in that city in 1912, she began her career with the Aborn Opera Company the following April. Her next step was the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, two years later, where her light and limpid coloratura voice and her charming presence quickly won her the distinction of being set up as the rival of the Chicago Opera Company's Galli-Curci. Perhaps her most successful part is that of the Princess in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or," from which opera she will sing in Boston the "Hymn to the Sun," as well as the famous florid aria from David's "The Pearl of Brazil."

Pierre Monteux will conduct, as the symphonic portion of this concert, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell."

Herald Nov 9

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

As soloist at the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, Povia Frijsh, the noted Danish dramatic soprano, will sing an aria from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "Invitation au Voyage," Moussorgsky's "Hopak," and Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114. Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, in which Frederic Denayer, the new first viola of the orchestra, will play the important solo part. The other numbers will be Chadwick's Symphonic Poem, "The Angel of Death" (first performance in Boston), and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen."

Advertiser Nov 9

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will be a feature of the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. The other orchestral numbers will be the prelude and love-death music from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Mabel Garrison will be unable to sing, but another soloist may be engaged in her place.

Herald Nov 13

CONCERTS AND LECTURES

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place tonight. Orchestral pieces by Berlioz, Chadwick and Beethoven. Vera Janacopulos, soprano, will sing songs by Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will include these orchestral pieces: Berlioz, "Childe Harold" Symphony; Chadwick, "Angel of Death" (first time in Boston): Beethoven overture to "King Stephen." Poula Frijeh will sing the Archangel's air from Franck's "Redemption" and songs by Duparc, Moussorgsky and Block with orchestra.

Mr. Newman will give the first of his illustrated travel talks in Symphony Hall tomorow night and Saturday afternoon. Subject "Alsace-Lorraine."

The Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" Symphony; Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death "Triston and Isolde;" Rossini, overture to "William Tell," Magdeline Brard, the remarkable young French pianist, who made a sensation in New York, last season, will play Saint-Saens's concerto in G. minor.

L. W. Rogers, national ...

Herald Nov 13

P. L. AIKEN ELECTED SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

E. B. Dane Succeeds F. E. Lowell as Treasurer

The nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have elected Alfred L. Aiken, president of the National Shawmut Bank, a member of the board, thus filling it with the regular number of ten. Frederick E. Lowell has found it necessary, by the pressure of other duties, to resign from his official post as treasurer of the orchestra, although still a trustee. Ernest B. Dane, also a trustee, who is president of the Brookline Trust Company, has become treasurer in his stead. The other officers stand: Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, and Galen L. Stone, vice-president. The remaining trustees are M. A. DeWolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

Post Nov. 13

Aiken Made Trustee of Symphony Orchestra

At a recent meeting of the nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., another trustee was elected—Alfred L. Aiken, president of the National Shawmut Bank, thus making the full board of 10. Also, Frederick E. Lowell has found it necessary by the pressure of other duties to resign from his official post as treasurer of the orchestra, although still a trustee. Ernest B. Dane, also a trustee, who is president of the Brookline Trust Company, has become treasurer in his stead. The other officers stand: Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, and Galen L. Stone, vice-president. The remaining trustees are M. A. DeWolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

From Journal Providence, R. I.

The first concert of the series that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in this city will open with Beethoven's light and graceful Second Symphony in D-major, which composition was chosen by Pierre Monteux to open the orchestral season in Boston. He will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun," with which he is probably more familiar than any other conductor. He received a number of changes in the scoring from Debussy himself in a personal interview before the great composer's death. He has conducted it often, especially with the Russian ballet when that organization startled Paris and Boston.

Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes," which met with such success when played by the New York Philharmonic earlier in the season, will close the concert. The Spanish-American baritone, Emilio de Gogorza, will contribute two numbers—Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

The New York concerts of the orchestra last week met with their usual success and Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically received. The programme included Debussy's "Faun" and a number which had not met with the expected amount of favor in Boston. At the concert in Boston Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" failed to interest the audience, which was engrossed with the brilliant playing and personality of Rakhmaninov, who was the soloist for the afternoon.

Continued on Page Ten

Continued from Page Nine.

Whether it was the romance of having the composer in person or simply that Rakhmaninov's composition was enhanced by his revealing hand, can't be definitely stated. However, it was very definitely demonstrated that Stravinsky meant nothing in the lives of the audience who were wrapt in Mr. Rakhmaninov's concerto for piano in D-minor.

Herald Nov 13

Concert Rudeness

Advertisements give the hour of a recital by Mr. Boanerges, the merciless pianist; Miss Pollyglotti, the distinguished interpreter of lyric and dramatic songs, and Mr. Pogrom Stringgutavitch, the Ukranian violinist, as 3 P. M. The hardened concert-goer, reigned, prepared for the best or the worst, is punctual in his seat. The recital begins anywhere from 3:15 to 3:30. A hearer that runs his daily course on schedule time is thereby debarred from the pleasure of hearing the final "group." The excuse for the delay is that there are many, chiefly deadheads, outside, in line for the payment of the war tax; that at Jordan Hall the settlement of this tax at the box office is exasperatingly slow. But before the war too many concert-goers were unpunctual. The singer's first group of songs was punctuated by the boot heels of late comers tramping down the aisles and by the slamming down of seats by ushers.

Late comers are a nuisance at the Symphony concerts this season as in the past. It is true that by reason of the wholly inadequate street car service on Huntington avenue tardiness in ... times unavoidable; but it is ... courteous to conductor and those s... to be too early than late. Mr. Mon... is in the habit of putting the sympl... first on the program. Nothing is m... disturbing than the entrance of m... after the first movement of the Sy... phony. The enforced long pause lesse... the effect of what has been played an... dampens expectation of what is to com... And some of the tardy saunter down... the aisles, nodding amicably to friends on the right and the left, and finally seat themselves with the air of ... ing: "I am here; now let the ... ce go on." If the rule the ... ld be admitted until the ... rts of ... were made and enfor... a greater degree of ...

BERLIOZ FIRST ON PROGRAM

"Harold in Italy" Played Romantically by Symphony Orchestra

DENAYER, NEW FIRST VIOLA, TAKES SOLOS

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Franck, the archangel's air from "The Redemption;" Chadwick, Symphonic poem "The Angel of Death" (first time in Boston); songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Block, Psalms 137 and 114; Beethoven, overtrue to "King Stephen." Mme. Povla Frijsh was the singer.

The symphony of Berlioz goes back to 1834. It is not easy for us to understand those romantic years. Even pianists today, as a rule, go to the barber once a month. They no longer wear a sombrero; their cravats are not flowing; but as formal as those seen in the street car and magazine advertisements of collars encircling the necks of orthodox young men. Only a little while ago a London critic wondered at a composer for setting music to an early poem of William Morris and wondered still more at the courage of a Mr. Mullings in singing it. But romanticism, Byronic romanticism, was in the Parisian air when Berlioz wrote this symphony. "Anthony" and "The Tower of Nesle" had only recently been played. Honest citizens, as well as artists, tried to resemble Bocage, the actor; sombre, melancholy, mysterious, amorous, ferocious in passion, a man with the "air fatal." to wonder that Bertioz, wildly romantic throughout his life, was romantic in his music until he dreamed of Virgilian classicism, writing his "Trojans."

"Harold in Italy" was a remarkable work in 1834; it is remarkable in certain ways in 1919. It is true that some in London, Oxford and New York can see Berlioz only as a poorly equipped musical poseur. They say the same of Liszt); but no man was more terribly in earnest. The "March of Pilgrims" is not the only movement of this symphany that has preserved its strange and haunting beauty, with the still famous constant interruption in the rhythmic flow. The introduction is still poetic; the Serenade is still piquant. For the first time at these concerts one heard the "Orgy of Brigands" played with the fitting wildness and recklessness, and Berlioz's reference to "brazen throats belching forth blasphemies" did not seem mere hifalutin. The whole symphony, in fact, was played romantically, as Berlioz understood that word, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

Mr. Denayer, the new first viola played the solo measures in a thoroughly artistic manner. That was expected, for his reputation had preceded him. His tonal purity, his technical skill, his phrasing—all these were to be highly praised. Yet his performance could hardly be called romantic; it was rather academic. There was a lack of abandon. The player of this music should be a man, "a panache," to borrow a term from the French actor's slang.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was first played in New York at a concert in the memory of Theodore Roosevelt by the Symphony Society, led by Walter Damrosch to whom the work is dedicated. It was suggested by Mr. French's bas-relief "Death and the Sculptor." The music expresses what the musician saw and felt in the sculpture. The opening, in fiery Straussian vein reminds one of the sculptor's towering ambition. Even in the height of his power, there are orchestral hints at the staying hand of relentless death. The hand is stayed. "Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight." After the lamentation comes the apotheosis, or as Mr. Chadwick himself says: "It may be that the last part suggests eventually the artist's ascent to the Parnassus of which he dreamed. But it might also be a meorial for evry artist who has given his life during the war—although not so originally intended." The work is firmly knit, soundly constructed, sonorous, and as such it was warmly received by the audience.

After Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture we have already had this season the overture to "King Stephen." Let us hope that Mr. Monteux will not think it his duty to exhume other long buried overtures of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke, by nature a kindly soul, had a fatal passion for the "Dedication of the House." This "King Stephen" overture is frankly theatre music for an occasion. The King Stephen is not as some might think the thrifty English monarch sung by Iago, whose breeches, according to the old song, "cost him but a crown. He held them sixpence all too dear. With that he call'd the tailor, lown." No this Stephen was of Hungary, the Apostolic King, who for his pious work was canonized. The overture is part of the stage music for Kotzebue's play "Hungary's First Benefactor," produced at the opening of a new theatre at Budapest over 100 years ago. It is said that a little joyous theme in the overture is of a Hungarian gypsy nature; but this gypsy was corseted and most discreet; she never danced for [illegible] wandering Englishmen.

MME FRIJSH SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Adequate Performance in an Exacting Field

Berlioz, Beethoven and Chadwick Rendered by the Orchestra

Povla Frijsh, soprano, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the fifth of the series. She sang the aria of the archangel from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "L'Invitation au Voyage," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and two psalms by Ernest Bloch. Those in the audience who had heard her in recital must have felt that she did not quite do herself justice, except in Duparc's song.

Her performance was always adequate and she proved from the opening notes of the Franck aria that her voice can fill the great hall with a clear resonant tone. Her diction and phrasing were correct and her interpretation was intelligent throughout. But there are many singers capable of giving a workmanlike performance of oratorio numbers and only two or three in this generation who can give as delicate and finished versions of lyrics like "L'Invitation au Voyage" as hers.

It is a tour de force for her to sing big, magniloquent arias. Nor is she unsurpassed as an intense and dramatic interpreter, such as her numbers from Bloch and Moussorgsky demand. The two Psalms are meant by their composer to be cries from the soul of the Jewish people. They are profoundly tragic in their eloquence and nobility, but somewhat incoherent.

Mme Frijsh can convey the impressionistic incoherence of Beaudelaire and Duparc, but she is less successful with the prophetic vagueness of the Old Testament and Bloch. The crude vigor of the Russian peasants in "Hopak" is equally beyond any cultivated, modern interpreter, whose gift is pre-eminently lyric, as hers is.

She lacks the dramatic power to recreate in her singing moods hopelessly alien to our modern civilization, as are those of Russian peasants and Jewish psalmists. By compensation she can polish and quicken those indeterminate desires most of us suffer from for the "Voyage" to a world where we may find nothing but "order, beauty, luxury, calm and delight," the world of the exquisite refrain of Duparc's song, as few singers can.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Symphony, with its superbly economical orchestration, its vividness that sometimes lapses into sentimentality or bombast, and its absence of cumulative effect is too familiar to require much comment. Mr Denayer gave a good performance of the viola solo and Mr Monteux did full justice to Berlioz in his reading.

The "King Stephen" overture of Beethoven, which is seldom payed nowadays, is not a masterpiece partly because its several themes do not seem to belong together, since they neither blend well nor contrast well. Yet nothing by Beethoven can ever be without interest to listeners critically minded toward music. His methods are more readily seen in his minor works than in his masterpieces.

Mr Chadwick deserved the applause which compelled him to rise in his place and bow after the performance of his new Symphonic Poem inspired by Mr French's bas relief at Forest Hills Cemetery, "The Angel of Death." The piece is one of the best of recent American compositions. This program will be repeated tonight at 8.

The exquisite art of Mme. Frijsh, who last season was Mme. Frisch, has often been applauded in this city. In a hall of reasonable size, she is a most interesting singer, by virtue of her interpretative skill. In Symphony Hall, intimacy is not easily established. We have yet to hear any music from Franck's "Redemption" that is fully worthy of that great master. Perhaps a woman with a clarion voice might make the Archangel's air impressive. One of the chief features of the concert was Mme. Frijsh's singing of Duparc's beautiful "Invitation au Voyage," music that outvies even the beauty of Baudelaire's verse. The enchanting orchestral accompaniment was heard here for the first time, according to our recollection. The delivery of "Hopak" was roguish rather than rowdy, and this song should be sung with a touch of vulgarity. The woman of the song was not conspicuous for archness or refinement. And what shall be said of the strongly individual "Psalms" of Ernest Bloch? His music is his own; there is no music like it. "By the Rivers of Babylon" is a mighty wail. "When Israel Went Out of Egypt" is changed with the spirit of fanatical exultation. Strange and overpowering music! We know of no more original composer. Mr. Bloch has been quoted as saying that, superficially, his music is not Jewish at all; yet these "Psalms" are the full expression of characteristics that have long been associated with the race that worshipped the one God in the desert and in the Temple; the warlike, fiery, persecuted, oppressed, yet hopeful, race from which sprang the poets of the Psalms and the prophecies. Only a woman imbued with the artistic spirit would have dared to sing this extraordinary music before a miscellaneous audience. She sang it as though she were the voice of the race. To hear these songs is worth a pilgrimage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto for strings, No. 5 in D major; Balakireff, "Thamar," Symphonic Poem; Dukas, overture, "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Schmitt, Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome."

POLVA FRIJSH NEW SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Danish Soprano Makes Debut With Orchestra

By J. J. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Plova Frijsh, soprano, soloist. Fifth concert of the year at Symphony Hall yesterday to be repeated this evening. The program:—

Berlioz—"Harold in Italy" symphony.
Franck—Aria, "Redemption."
Chadwick—"The Angel of Death."
Songs with orchestra.
Beethoven—Overture to "King Stephen."

Miss Frijsh had new worlds to conquer. She is much admired here, as elsewhere, by connoisseurs of singing. Her clientele is small but "select." Previous appearances for the most part have been in small halls. There her insight, her penetration into the composer's subtlest moods, her ability to project the very essence of a song and her quiet authority have been much admired. She is not possessed of a remarkable natural voice. Her voice has neither great sensuous beauty nor great volume.

In Symphony Hall these vocal limitations were apparent. The singer, notably in the Franck aria, did not weave the spell. One admired what she did in view of natural limitations, but there was no feeling of great satisfaction in a task perfectly accomplished. In subsequent songs by Duparck, Moussorgsky and Bloch, Miss Frijsh was on firmer ground. The wonderful "Hopak" of Moussorgsky, we believe, she has sung here before. The two psalms by Bloch seemed to puzle the audience. Fascinating music they are not for the audience that seek a pretty tune to be easily comprehended, easily forgotten. The second, "When Israel Went Out of Egypt," was superbly played under Mr. Monteux's baton.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was given here for the first time. This work was suggested by Daniel Chester French's bas-relief, entitled "Death and the Sculptor." The young sculptor is represented as just raising his chisel to attack his work when the Angel of Death, a shadowy figure, puts out an arresting hand. Mr. Krehbiel in reviewing the first performance took the beginning of the new song toward the close of the work as indicating that the composer did not find the arresting of the artist by death the end, but that there remained apotheosis achieved despite uncompleted work.

The work is marked by extremely clear writing. It is the work of a hand well trained in expressing the composer's emotion. Just how deep these emotions are and how profoundly beautiful their melodic vesture each auditor can determine for himself. Either emotional satisfaction or friendship for the composer prompted prolonged applause.

The Berlioz symphony gave Mr. Frederic Denayer, the first viola player, his great opportunity. In elegance of tone and mastery of technical difficulties Mr. Denayer proved that he deserved the fine reputation which preceded him from Europe. Much of this symphony is still interesting. Much is tiresome.

At the concerts of next week the program will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, Balakireff's "Thamar," Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Dukas' overture, "Polyeucte." The orchestra will give a special concert tomorrow for its Pension Fund at which Magdelaine Brard, the youthful French pianist, will make her Boston debut. This special concert will offer an excellent opportunity for persons not having regular subscription seats for these concerts to hear the great orchestra.

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Hector Berlioz wrote the "Harold in Italy" Symphony in 1824. Had he written it in this year of grace he would doubtless have called it a Symphonic Poem in Four Parts. It is doubtful, though, whether he would have made any other changes. The symphony is strikingly, disturbingly modern, both in its freedom from convention in writing and in its coloring. Every once in a while some conductor takes this work off the shelves and plays it to the delight and interest of his audience and no matter how good a conductor he may be, the chief glory on the occasion goes to the composer. In the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 14, Mr. Monteux gave a reading of the second and third movements that was both stimulating and satisfying. It is doubtful if any conductor could hold the interest of an audience throughout the first movement, although Mr. Monteux had done some judicious arranging and had made a few cuts in it. The last movement, "The Orgy of the Brigands," doubtless was meant by Berlioz to portray a merry, capering crowd, but the brigands of Mr. Monteux were rather tamed and subdued. Mr. Denayer, the new leader of the viola section of the orchestra, had his chance to show what he could do in this symphony and the impression he made was distinctly favorable. He too took liberties with the score and did not attempt certain difficult octaves in the third movement, but his tone was smooth and flexible and his phrasing most artistic.

Two men who are writing music at the present day were in the audience to hear their works performed, George W. Chadwick of Boston and Ernest Bloch of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," and Mr. Bloch's songs, "Psalm 137" and "Psalm 114," were heard for the first time in Boston. Between the two styles of writing affected by these men lies a great gulf. Mr. Chadwick's model quite palpably was Strauss, with occasional side glances at Wagner. Mr. Bloch's music followed only the pattern outlined by the inner necessity from which he wrote, but its exceeding richness of color and invention betokened the genius of the writer. His songs were interpreted by Mme. Povla Frijsh, whose artistry in song cannot be questioned, but whose voice unfortunately lacked the volume necessary for this concert room.

Mr. Monteux in putting on the program Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen" instead of one of the overtures too familiar through repetition by past conductors did his audience a service, if only to show them that Jove sometimes nods.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the evening of Thursday, November 13, brought forth a new singer for the approval of local audiences, an approval which, be it said, was gladly and fittingly given. Miss Vera Janacopoulos, of Greek ancestry and Brazilian birth, sang four Russian songs, Moussorgsky's "The Commander" and "Gathering Mushrooms," Borodin's "The Sleeping Princess" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Eastern Romance." This young woman knows how to sing a song, for that ability to re-create which distinguishes the true artist is hers. Her voice is warm and obedient to her will. The rest of the program was that given next day in Boston.

BIG AFTERNOON AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

With the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Povla Frisjh as soloist, and the first hearing in this city of Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," as a foundation, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the patrons of the concert yesterday afternoon pleasure rarely equalled. It was one of the "big afternoons" of the season.

Never before in the history of the orchestra has the Berlioz Symphony been so eloquently presented. There was, of course, the viola part beautifully played by Mr. Denayer, but there was also exceptionally fine oboe playing by Mr. Longy and flute playing by Mr. Laurent, not to mention the notable work of the orchestra as a whole.

Povla Frisjh, while not in the best of voice for her songs, more than made amends by her artistic interpretations. Her singing of Moussorgsky's "Hopak" brought forth such a storm of applause as made it seem as though it would have to be repeated before the applause would stop.

The Chadwick work afforded such pleasure that the composer had to rise several times from his place in the audience to acknowledge the applause. First hearing gives one the impression the real merit of the number lies in the afterthought, as it were, of the composer. The composition was suggested by Daniel Chester French's bas-relief, "Death and the Sculptor." Dr. Chadwick in the afterthought, where he proclaims what might be termed the ultimate triumph, is at his best.

GILLETTE FIRM GIVES

The program included: Berlioz, symphony with viola solo, "Harold in Italy." Frederick Denayer, soloist; Cesar, Franck, aria from "The Redemption;" George W. Chadwick, symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death"; songs with orchestra—Duparc, "Invitaion au Voyage;" Moussorgsky, "Hopak;" Block, Psalms 137 and 114; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen."

PROGRAM WELL ARRANGED.

An unusually interesting program, in which the personal element was a distinct feature, for besides the solos by Mme. Frijsh and Mr. Denayer there was Mr. Chadwick in the audience, listening to a brilliant performance of his stirring symphonic poem, at the close of which he was repeatedly called upon to rise from his chair in the parquet and bow his response to applause. The work, inspired, according to Mr. Chadwick, by French's bas-relief, "Death and the Sculptor," is a brilliant piece of orchestration and was given a performance which must have gratified the composer.

Mme. Frijsh, although she followed the conventional order, had chosen a group of pieces unfamiliar to most of her hearer and widely varied. Undoubtedly the song that pleased the audience most was Duparc's lovely melody, in which her voice showed to advantage. She was warmly greeted and several times recalled at the end of each appearance.

MR. DENAYER DELIGHTS.

The "Harold" symphony, old as it is, is ever new. Structurally, to the musical academician, it doubtless shows its age; but to the merely emotional listener, it is as modern in spirit as though composed this season. It was hard to realize that the symphony was written eighty-five years ago. The solo performance of Mr. Denayer was admirable. He succeeded in doing what Berlioz testified that Paganini could do—made the viola, with its delicate tone, dominant throughout all the solo passages. The consideration shown by Mr. Monteux for the solo instrument was to a great degree responsible for this.

POVLA FRIJSH IN FINE VOICE AT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Gives Delightful Performance of Chadwick's "Angel of Death"

Povla Frijsh, soprano, appeared as soloist at the fifth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. The concerts of yesterday afternoon and his evening mark the return of the orchestra after its first tour of the season.

BERLIOZ FIRST ON PROGRAM

"Harold in Italy" Played Romantically by Symphony Orchestra

DENAYER, NEW FIRST VIOLA, TAKES SOLOS

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Franck, the archangel's air from "The Redemption;" Chadwick, Symphonic poem "The Angel of Death" (first time in Boston); songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Block, Psalms 137 and 114; Beethoven, overtrue to "King Stephen." Mme. Povla Frijsh was the singer.

The symphony of Berlioz goes back to 1834. It is not easy for us to understand those romantic years. Even pianists today, as a rule, go to the barber once a month. They no longer wear a sombrero; their cravats are not flowing, but as formal as those seen in the street car and magazine advertisements of collars encircling the necks of orthodox young men. Only a little while ago a London critic wondered at a composer for setting music to an early poem of William Morris and wondered still more at the courage of a Mr. Mullings in singing it. But romanticism, Byronic romanticism, was in the Parisian air when Berlioz wrote this symphony. "Anthony" and "The Tower of Nesle" had only recently been played. Honest citizens, as well as artists, tried to resemble Bocage, the actor; sombre, melancholy, mysterious, amorous, ferocious in passion, a man with the "air fatal." to wonder that Bertioz, wildly romantic throughout his life, was romantic in his music until he dreamed of Virgilian classicism, writing his "Trojans."

"Harold in Italy" was a remarkable work in 1834; it is remarkable in certain ways in 1919. It is true that some in London, Oxford and New York can see Berlioz only as a poorly equipped musical poseur. They say the same of Liszt); but no man was more terribly in earnest. The "March of Pilgrims" is not the only movement of this symphany that has preserved its strange and haunting beauty, with the still famous constant interruption in the rhythmic flow. The introduction is still poetic; the Serenade is still piquant. For the first time at these concerts one heard the "Orgy of Brigands" played with the fitting wildness and recklessness, and Berlioz's reference to "brazen throats belching forth blasphemies" did not seem mere hifalutin. The whole symphony, in fact, was played romantically, as Berlioz understood that word, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

Mr. Denayer, the now first viola played the solo measures in a thoroughly artistic manner. That was expected, for his reputation had preceded him. His tonal purity, his technical skill, his phrasing—all these were to be highly praised. Yet his performance could hardly be called romantic; it was rather academic. There was a lack of abandon. The player of this music should be a man, "a panache," to borrow a term from the French actor's slang.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was first played in New York at a concert in the memory of Theodore Roosevelt by the Symphony Society, led by Walter Damrosch to whom the work is dedicated. It was suggested by Mr. French's bas-relief "Death and the Sculptor." The music expresses what the musician saw and felt in the sculpture. The opening, in fiery Straussian vein reminds one of the sculptor's towering ambition. Even in the height of his power, there are orchestral hints at the staying hand of relentless death. The hand is stayed. "Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight." After the lamentation comes the apotheosis, or as Mr. Chadwick himself says: "It may be that the last part suggests eventually the artist's ascent to the Parnassus of which he dreamed. But it might also be a meorial for evry artist who has given his life during the war—although not so originally intended." The work is firmly knit, soundly constructed, sonorous, and as such it was warmly received by the audience.

After Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture we have already had this season the overture to "King Stephen." Let us hope that Mr. Monteux will not think it his duty to exhume other long buried overtures of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke, by nature a kindly soul, had a fatal passion for the "Dedication of the House." This "King Stephen" overture is frankly theatre music for an occasion. The King Stephen is not as some might think the thrifty English monarch sung by Iago, whose breeches, according to the old song, "cost him but a crown. He held them sixpence all too dear. With that he call'd the tailor, lown." No this Stephen was of Hungary, the Apostolic King, who for his pious work was canonized. The overture is part of the stage music for Kotzebue's play "Hungary's First Benefactor," produced at the opening of a new theatre at Budapest over 100 years ago. It is said that a little joyous theme in the overture is of a Hungarian gypsy nature; but this gypsy was corseted and most discreet; she never danced for [illegible] and wandering Englishmen.

MME FRIJSH SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Adequate Performance in an Exacting Field

Berlioz, Beethoven and Chadwick Rendered by the Orchestra

Povla Frijsh, soprano, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the fifth of the series. She sang the aria of the archangel from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "L'Invitation au Voyage," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and two psalms by Ernest Bloch. Those in the audience who had heard her in recital must have felt that she did not quite do herself justice, except in Duparc's song.

Her performance was always adequate and she proved from the opening notes of the Franck aria that her voice can fill the great hall with a clear resonant tone. Her diction and phrasing were correct and her interpretation was intelligent throughout. But there are many singers capable of giving a workmanlike performance of oratorio numbers and only two or three in this generation who can give as delicate and finished versions of lyrics like "L'Invitation au Voyage" as hers.

It is a tour de force for her to sing big, magniloquent arias. Nor is she unsurpassed as an intense and dramatic interpreter, such as her numbers from Bloch and Moussorgsky demand. The two Psalms are meant by their composer to be cries from the soul of the Jewish people. They are profoundly tragic in their eloquence and nobility, but somewhat incoherent.

Mme Frijsh can convey the impressionistic incoherence of Beaudelaire and Duparc, but she is less successful with the prophetic vagueness of the Old Testament and Bloch. The crude vigor of the Russian peasants in "Hopak" is equally beyond any cultivated, modern interpreter, whose gift is pre-eminently lyric, as hers is.

She lacks the dramatic power to recreate in her singing moods hopelessly alien to our modern civilization, as are those of Russian peasants and Jewish psalmists. By compensation she can polish and quicken those indeterminate desires most of us suffer from for the "Voyage" to a world where we may find nothing but "order, beauty, luxury, calm and delight," the world of the exquisite refrain of Duparc's song, as few singers can.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Symphony, with its superbly economical orchestration, its vividness that sometimes lapses into sentimentality or bombast, and its absence of cumulative effect is too familiar to require much comment. Mr Denayer gave a good performance of the viola solo and Mr Monteux did full justice to Berlioz in his reading.

The "King Stephen" overture of Beethoven, which is seldom payed nowadays, is not a masterpiece partly because its several themes do not seem to belong together, since they neither blend well nor contrast well. Yet nothing by Beethoven can ever be without interest to listeners critically minded toward music. His methods are more readily seen in his minor works than in his masterpieces.

Mr Chadwick deserved the applause which compelled him to rise in his place and bow after the performance of his new Symphonic Poem inspired by Mr French's bas relief at Forest Hills Cemetery, "The Angel of Death." The piece is one of the best of recent American compositions. This program will be repeated tonight at 8.

The exquisite art of Mme. Frijsh, who last season was Mme. Frisch, has often been applauded in this city. In a hall of reasonable size, she is a most interesting singer, by virtue of her interpretative skill. In Symphony Hall, intimacy is not easily established. We have yet to hear any music from Franck's "Redemption" that is fully worthy of that great master. Perhaps a woman with a clarion voice might make the Archangel's air impressive. One of the chief features of the concert was Mme. Frijsh's singing of Duparc's beautiful "Invitation au Voyage," music that outvies even the beauty of Baudelaire's verse. The enchanting orchestral accompaniment was heard here for the first time, according to our recollection. The delivery of "Hopak" was roguish rather than rowdy, and this song should be sung with a touch of vulgarity. The woman of the song was not conspicuous for archness or refinement. And what shall be said of the strongly individual "Psalms" of Ernest Bloch? His music is his own; there is no music like it. "By the Rivers of Babylon" is a mighty wail. "When Israel Went Out of Egypt" is changed with the spirit of fanatical exultation. Strange and overpowering music! We know of no more original composer. Mr. Bloch has been quoted as saying that, superficially, his music is not Jewish at all; yet these "Psalms" are the full expression of characteristics that have long been associated with the race that worshipped the one God in the desert and in the Temple; the warlike, fiery, persecuted, oppressed, yet hopeful, race from which sprang the poets of the Psalms and the prophecies. Only a woman imbued with the artistic spirit would have dared to sing this extraordinary music before a miscellaneous audience. She sang it as though she were the voice of the race. To hear these songs is worth a pilgrimage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto for strings, No. 5 in D major; Balakireff, "Thamar," Symphonic Poem; Dukas, overture, "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Schmitt, Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome."

POLVA FRIJSH NEW SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Danish Soprano Makes Debut With Orchestra

By J. J. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Plova Frijsh, soprano, soloist. Fifth concert of the year at Symphony Hall yesterday to be repeated this evening. The program:—

Berlioz—"Harold in Italy" symphony.
Franck—Aria, "Redemption."
Chadwick—"The Angel of Death."
Songs with orchestra.
Beethoven—Overture to "King Stephen."

Miss Frijsh had new worlds to conquer. She is much admired here, as elsewhere, by connoisseurs of singing. Her clientele is small but "select." Previous appearances for the most part have been in small halls. There her insight, her penetration into the composer's subtlest moods, her ability to project the very essence of a song and her quiet authority have been much admired. She is not possessed of a remarkable natural voice. Her voice has neither great sensuous beauty nor great volume.

In Symphony Hall these vocal limitations were apparent. The singer notably in the Franck aria, did not weave the spell. One admired what she did in view of natural limitations, but there was no feeling of great satisfaction in a task perfectly accomplished. In subsequent songs by Duparck, Moussorgsky and Bloch, Miss Frijsh was on firmer ground. The wonderful "Hopak" of Moussorgsky, we believe, she has sung here before. The two psalms by Bloch seemed to puzle the audience. Fascinating music they are not for the audience that seek a pretty tune to be easily comprehended, easily forgotten. The second, "When Israel Went Out of Egypt," was superbly played under Mr. Monteux's baton.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was given here for the first time. This work was suggested by Daniel Chester French's bas-relief, entitled "Death and the Sculptor." The young sculptor is represented as just raising his chisel to attack his work when the Angel of Death, a shadowy figure, puts out an arresting hand. Mr. Krehbiel in reviewing the first performance took the beginning of the new song toward the close of the work as indicating that the composer did not find the arresting of the artist by death the end, but that there remained apotheosis achieved despite uncompleted work.

The work is marked by extremely clear writing. It is the work of a hand well trained in expressing the composer's emotion. Just how deep these emotions are and how profoundly beautiful their melodic vesture each auditor can determine for himself. Either emotional satisfaction or friendship for the composer prompted prolonged applause.

The Berlioz symphony gave Mr. Frederic Denayer, the first viola player, his great opportunity. In elegance of tone and mastery of technical difficulties Mr. Denayer proved that he deserved the fine reputation which preceded him from Europe. Much of this symphony is still interesting. Much is tiresome.

At the concerts of next week the program will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, Balakireff's "Thamar," Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Dukas' overture, "Polyeucte." The orchestra will give a special concert tomorrow for its Pension Fund at which Magdelaine Brard, the youthful French pianist, will make her Boston debut. This special concert will offer an excellent opportunity for persons not having regular subscription seats for these concerts to hear the great orchestra.

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Hector Berlioz wrote the "Harold in Italy" Symphony in 1824. Had he written it in this year of grace he would doubtless have called it a Symphonic Poem in Four Parts. It is doubtful, though, whether he would have made any other changes. The symphony is strikingly, stirringly modern, both in its freedom from convention in writing and in its coloring. Every once in a while some conductor takes this work off the shelves and plays it to the delight and interest of his audience and no matter how good a conductor he may be, the chief glory on the occasion goes to the composer. In the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 14, Mr. Monteux gave a reading of the second and third movements that was both stimulating and satisfying. It is doubtful if any conductor could hold the interest of an audience throughout the first movement, although Mr. Monteux had done some judicious arranging and had made a few cuts in it. The last movement, "The Orgy of the Brigands," doubtless was meant by Berlioz to portray a merry, capering crowd, but the brigands of Mr. Monteux were rather tamed and subdued. Mr. Denayer, the new leader of the viola section of the orchestra, had his chance to show what he could do in this symphony and the impression he made was distinctly favorable. He too took liberties with the score and did not attempt certain difficult octaves in the third movement, but his tone was smooth and flexible and his phrasing most artistic.

Two men who are writing music at the present day were in the audience to hear their works performed, George W. Chadwick of Boston and Ernest Bloch of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," and Mr. Bloch's songs, "Psalm 137" and "Psalm 114," were heard for the first time in Boston. Between the two styles of writing affected by these men lies a great gulf. Mr. Chadwick's model quite palpably was Strauss, with occasional side glances at Wagner. Mr. Bloch's music followed only the pattern outlined by the inner necessity from which he wrote, but its exceeding richness of color and invention betokened the genius of the writer. His songs were interpreted by Mme. Povla Frijsh, whose artistry in song cannot be questioned, but whose voice unfortunately lacked the volume necessary for this concert room.

Mr. Monteux in putting on the program Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen" instead of one of the overtures too familiar through repetition by past conductors did his audience a service, if only to show them that Jove sometimes nods.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the evening of Thursday, November 13, brought forth a new singer for the approval of local audiences, an approval which, be it said, was gladly and fittingly given. Miss Vera Janacopoulos, of Greek ancestry and Brazilian birth, sang four Russian songs, Moussorgsky's "The Commander" and "Gathering Mushrooms," Borodin's "The Sleeping Princess" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Eastern Romance." This young woman knows how to sing a song, for that ability to re-create which distinguishes the true artist is hers. Her voice is warm and obedient to her will. The rest of the program was that given next day in Boston.

BIG AFTERNOON AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

With the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Povla Frisjh, as soloist, and the first hearing in this city of Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," as a foundation, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the patrons of the concert yesterday afternoon pleasure rarely equalled. It was one of the "big afternoons" of the season.

Never before in the history of the orchestra has the Berlioz Symphony been so eloquently presented. There was, of course, the viola part beautifully played by Mr. Denayer, but there was also exceptionally fine oboe playing by Mr. Longy a,nd flute playing by Mr. Laurent, not to mention the notable work of the orchestra as a whole.

Povla Frisjh, while not in the best of voice for her songs, more than made amends by her artistic interpretations. Her singing of Moussorgsky's "Hopak" brought forth such a storm of applause as made it seem as though it would have to be repeated before the applause would stop.

The Chadwick work afforded such pleasure that the composer had to rise several times from his place in the audience to acknowledge the applause. First hearing gives one the impression the real merit of the number lies in the afterthought, as it were, of the composer. The composition was suggested by Daniel Chester French's bas-relief, "Death and the Sculptor." Dr. Chadwick in the afterthought, where he proclaims what might be termed the ultimate triumph, is at his best.

The program included: Berlioz, symphony with viola solo, "Harold in Italy," Frederick Denayer, soloist; Cesar Franck, aria from "The Redemption;" George W. Chadwick, symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death"; songs with orchestra—Duparc, "Invitaion au Voyage;" Moussorgsky, "Hopak;" Block, Psalms 137 and 114; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen."

PROGRAM WELL ARRANGED.

An unusually interesting program, in which the personal element was a distinct feature, for besides the solos by Mme. Frijsh and Mr. Denayer there was Mr. Chadwick in the audience, listening to a brilliant performance of his stirring symphonic poem, at the close of which he was repeatedly called upon to rise from his chair in the parquet and bow his response to applause. The work, inspired, according to Mr. Chadwick, by French's bas-relief, "Death and the Sculptor," is a brilliant piece of orchestration and was given a performance which must have gratified the composer.

Mme. Frijsh, although she followed the conventional order, had chosen a group of pieces unfamiliar to most of her hearer and widely varied. Undoubtedly the song that pleased the audience most was Duparc's lovely melody, in which her voice showed to advantage. She was warmly greeted and several times recalled at the end of each appearance.

MR. DENAYER DELIGHTS.

The "Harold" symphony, old as it is, is ever new. Structurally, to the musical academician, it doubtless shows its age; but to the merely emotional listener, it is as modern in spirit as though composed this season. It was hard to realize that the symphony was written eighty-five years ago. The solo performance of Mr. Denayer was admirable. He succeeded in doing what Berlioz testified that Paganini could do—made the viola, with its delicate tone, dominant throughout all the solo passages. The consideration shown by Mr. Monteux for the solo instrument was to a great degree responsible for this.

GILLETTE FIRM GIVES

[illegible] SATURDAY

POVLA FRIJSH IN FINE VOICE AT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Gives Delightful Performance of Chadwick's "Angel of Death"

Povla Frijsh, soprano, appeared as soloist at the fifth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. The concerts of yesterday afternoon and his evening mark the return of the orchestra after its first tour of the season.

Symphony and Other Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SONGS AND A SINGER EXCEL ALL THE REST

Mme. Frijsh for the First Time with the Orchestra—Two Psalms in Music Like the Speech of Hebrew Prophets — The Subtle Beauties of Duparc—Franck and Musorgsky Besides — Beethoven Trifles and Berlioz Fades

With one exception the songs of the singer were the most interesting items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday—more interesting than the singer herself, though she was Mme. Frijsh, far more interesting than the three purely orchestral numbers. The exception was her first piece, the air of the archangel from Franck's hybrid symphony inbred upon oratorio, "The Redemption." Whether the air is more commonplace and tedious than the "symphonic piece" drawn from the same source and played to surfeit in Boston last season is for casuists in dulness to decide. At the beginning, when the archangel proclaims the descent of Jesus to earth, stand two or three score measures bright with Franckian luminosity; in the progress of the music are occasional periods of Franckian spiritual ecstasy. The rest is inarticulate rapture or rapture articulate in the precious operatic manner of Meyerbeer and Halévy. Ah ces messieurs! whom Franck, curiously purblind on some sides, "venerated" when he set to oratorio. Moreover, is it not possible that the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts have heard quite enough for a while of the music of Franck, exalted, characteristic or merely routine? Early report affirmed a salutary resolution of Mr. Monteux to banish the Rabaudian excess of Franck and Saint-Saëns from his programmes. May he hold firmly to it.

One more of Mme. Frijsh's numbers might also pass in the routine of the day—Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestral version of Musorgsky's "Hopak," thrice and four times familiar "with piano" in the concerts of "favorite" singers. Even Mme. Frijsh there essays it, makes it "captivating." To captivate, however, was probably the least of the composer's purposes when the verse stirred him, when he set music above it. Once more he would characterize and in the rhythmic beat of Russian folk-tune—characterize a blowsy, full-fed wench, lusty for liquor, a rude dance and two-fisted companions, screaming out her scorns and jollities. Musorgsky whips his through a becomingly larruping music and is appropriately done. She is too hackneyed for the Symphony Concerts. Better leave her, prettyfied, for an uneasy seat in Mme. Gluck's parlor. Moreover, Mme. Frijsh is not altogether the singer in spite of her many distinctions, for either Franck's air or Musorgsky's song. Rather, because of those very distinctions she falls short of both. Her voice is not large, her vocal method and manner are not sweeping, least of all is she declamatory; whereas Franck's music, if it is to come to life at all, seeks amplitude, even bombast. Mme. Frijsh is a singer of fine sensibilities, of adroit refinements. Musorgsky's woman is loud-mouthed and leering; his music characterizes her.

Two more of Mme. Frijsh's pieces, and the more novel among them, suffered likewise from the limitations of her singing—Mr. Bloch's settings of the Psalm of David in which captive Israel laments in bitterness "by the waters of Babylon" and of the other Psalm in which Israel released goes "out of Egypt," elate upon an earth sharing its joy. In both the singer altogether comprehended the substance and the symbols, the imagery and the passion of text and music. At every turn she enriched both with the keen, fine play of her penetrating mind and assimilating spirit. Yet Mr. Bloch exacts a vocal power, an unabating eloquence of transmission that Mme. Frijsh's tones may hardly compass and by no means maintain. He has written the orchestral parts accordingly. In sum, he is as one who would mould direct, yet hardly unsophisticated, musical means to barbaric force of utterance. Mme. Frijsh apprehends and plies the means, seeks the force, but by inexorable limitations of tone may not sweep into it. She sings the Psalms as a single penetrating voice in the multitude of wailing or rejoicing Israel. Though Mr. Bloch chose to write for one such voice, yet did he hear the host.

A truly remarkable, a highly individual, a piercing yet tumultuous music are these settings. Israel wails in what at first perception seem monotonous rhythms, but they beat, beat, beat the listening imagination into responsive emotion. Israel wails in stark reiterated phrases—until in all the world there is no solace for it except proud passion for its own Jerusalem and as proud hate for Babylon, captor—and doomed. Bitter and wild and fierce is this lamenting; acrid, savage through the tones stalk pride and hate. These are the elemental passions for which Mr. Bloch, whether his means be simple or intricate, finds as elemental utterance. No wonder placid suburbia, perhaps recalling Mr. Rabaud's easy entertainments for the elderly, wondered what this fuss was all about, recoiled, resented it.

For background rose Mr. Bloch's orchestral voices, plangent, puissant, penetrating, like to the bare, bold imagery of the Hebrew prophets. Now and then they set sharp edge upon the singer's phrases; once and again out of them flashed the swarthy faces, the gleaming eyes of the lamenting or the rejoicing tribe; always they were the work of a composer in whom an individual technique, darting through many a detail, is the servant of an individual and dauntless imagination. As Jeremiah lamented, so laments Mr. Bloch into music—a whole race even, in its fierce barbaric day.

Franck trite and theatrical, Musorgsky a-slumming, Bloch tribal and tumultuous, plangent and piercing—Mme. Frijsh ranged widely when she added to them the Duparc and Baudelaire of "L' Invitation au Voyage." The verse swims in sensuous haze, conjures misty image of scent, color, light, trappings, vistas; pulses with wistful languors, faintly tingles with amorous excitements. Akin is the jewelled music, whether the singing voice bears it, whether the orchestral voices melt together within it—music of murmurous flow and soft lustre, of the sights and sounds of dream, of the subtleties of erotic sensation. Bloch's acridly sensual song bites and cries aloud; Duparc's supersensuous song quivers, gleams, pales and is still. Here at last was music for Mme. Frijsh's present voice and familiar imagination, for the new brightness and suavity of her song, for the old finesse of moulded phrase and colored tone, for her sensibilities, her subtleties, her skill in veiled suggestion. With Duparc and Baudelaire, she also wrought beauty.

Big as they relatively were, the symphonic pieces of the day seemed but paltry things beside these Psalms of Bloch, this song of Duparc. True, Beethoven signed one of them, the overture, "King Stephen," and Berlioz another, the symphony, "Harold in Italy." Yet that particular Beethoven is no more than a composer faithfully fulfilling a commission to prelude a play, picking up a neat little, nice little gypsy motiv, scattering a few trumpet-calls where they will do the most good, piling up the inevitable chords at the end, contriving to be both ceremonial and amusing, not so easy a task as it seems as many a maker of music, similarly charged and laboring for festal occasion, will cheerfully or reluctantly confess. Only the prigs would feed in the arts upon an everlasting diet of masterpieces; every real artist has made his trifles, his "pieces of occasion" happy and unashamed. Better decennial entertainment from "King Stephen" than annual repetition of "Leonora," "Corolianus" and "Egmont." No conductor long overlooks those classics; Mr. Monteux was wise and pleasurable when he condescended—once with "Prometheus" and again with "King Stephen" to Beethoven off pedestal.

Moreover, the overture is still a bright music whereas Berlioz's symphony sounds as faded in general as did yesterday the particular voice of Harold in the thin light tone, the impassive progress, the colorless performance of Mr. Denayer at the first viola. Mr. Férir's peer hardly sits as yet in his place. "The March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn" still tinkles upon the ear; pungently Italian is the mountaineer's serenade; in the finale is a deal of romantic rodomontade, in which Mr. Monteux properly laid on and spared not; out of the first movement still drips romantic fulfulness of mood. Little streams of music, these down a symphonic watercourse long since run dry under the changing suns of new times and new fashions in the arts of expression. The museum—in the cabinet of Romanticism A. D. 1830—is the place for "Harold in Italy, Symphony in Four Movements with Viola Solo." Not often need conductors bear it hence for performance. The Berlioz of the Fantastic Symphony, of Romeo and Juliet, of the overtures, of "The Damnation of Faust" needs no successes of curiosity. . . . And also there was Mr. Chadwick's new tone-poem, "The Angel of Death." If it did not exactly provoke admiration, it did summon reflections. Let them wait, bye and large, until Monday.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux Jumps from Haendel to Dukas and Schmitt—Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony," the Wagner of "Tristan" and Miss Brard for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra—Sundry Pianists and Sundry Singers

A promising miscellany fills the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next week at Symphony Hall. At the beginning Mr. Monteux sets an ancient piece, one of Händel's "concerti grossi" for string orchestra, keyed in D major, numbered five, edited by the German routinier, Kogel, and giving Mr. Fradkin, Mr. Theodorowicz, Mr. Denayer and Mr. Bedetti, as leaders of the several choirs opportunity to play solo passages. The concerto is a "standard piece" in the repertory of the orchestra and under Mr. Monteux it played it in New York last autumn. Next follows Balakirev's tone-poem "Thamar," tale in music of the Caucasian princess who for a night lured and feasted men to sate her lusts and her cruelty. If only a Frenchman might lead in this music, the doubters have said, when a German conductor exercised himself upon it. Now we shall so hear it. Third comes a piece new to Symphony Hall, out of the slender orchestral baggage of Dukas—his overture to Corneille's grave tragedy of Christian martyrs and Roman persecutors, "Polyeucte." More music of the theatre ends the programme—the suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—presumably the same piece that Dr. Muck produced "at these concerts" in the autumn of 1913. Needless, almost, to say, it is one more recounting and picturing in tones of the passion and the fate of the daughter of Herodias who loved John the Baptist.

Tomorrow afternoon, likewise, the Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Symphony Hall in its first concert since the spring of 1918 for the increase of its Pension Fund. For it Mr. Monteux has framed one of the programmes prescribed by precedent for such occasions. It begins with the Overture to Rossini's "William Tell," a sure-fire piece for the concert-room, and ends with the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser," a piece that has been heard in Symphony Hall more times than any other piece of music. Between these two pieces, as conductor and orchestra played them, went in rather routine fashion; but in themselves they are bound to please the audience that a concert for the Pension Fund assembles—or indeed any other gathered in Symphony Hall. The conductor, like most chefs d'orchestre in his generation and of his training and temperament—quite independently, moreover, of French or German blood—seems not to kindle to the music of Chaikowsky. If Dr. Muck loved the Russian little, Mr. Rabaud, who chose not so much as one of his pieces, or Mr. Monteux seems hardly to love him more. Literally, dutifully, painstakingly, he made his way—and with a like-minded orchestra—through the Pathetic Symphony. Here and there, he took an individual course of his own as when he declined to drench in sentimentality that celebrated melody in the first movement or when he took the syncopated waltz of the second at a pace that stripped it of as sentimental languors. Even so, however, the listeners heard that which their ears and hearts most desired—the artful preparation for the first entrance of the melody aforesaid, its passage up and down and through and through the orchestra; the succeeding tonal tumults in which the brass choir was sufficiently orgiastic; the mounting and remounting march—the much-applauded "Petrograd Quickstep"—and the doleful dumps, which, poetized, might be something more and finer, of the finale. Nobody debates nowadays, as everyone did twenty years ago, whether that melody is depressed memory of debauch or wistful longing for ideal happiness—to recall the two extremes of interpretation. As little does anyone care now whether the march symbolizes the nervous activity in which the Slav temperament would stifle despair. Enough that the tune—for it soon becomes that—falls juicy upon the average ear; that the march sets aural nerves a-tingling. By the worst and not the best in it, like the phantom-like waltz with haunting drum-beat or the black brooding, the blank annihilation of the end, does the "Fathetic Symphony" keep place.

The prelude to "Tristan" and the death song of Isolde transfigured in the sunset above her dead lover are music of another facture, another eloquence. The more the pity then that Mr. Monteux did not strike in them a larger, deeper, more penetrating note of passion. Surely he can when he is in the vein—he who has heretofore excelled in the music-house. Faithful was the orchestral formation of Isolde's soliloquy of fate at the beginning, but somehow the conductor missed the thrill of the transition when love, the stronger, twists the music to its will. Not quite as nervous of the desire renewed so soon as it is sated, was Mr. Monteux's progress toward the first climax; while somehow, the second, at the full mounting of the death-song, lacked the sonorous underbody of tone that swells it mightily upward. Yet Mr. Monteux—and Wagner—melted listening ears and hearts into the longing, finally fulfilled, of the end. And the audience listened intent to this "enemy music," applauded it long and loudly. When, except to perverted imaginations, did music partake of the hates of warfare? After all, not only the French the English, but we also—or most of us—are civilized when the music of Wagner sounds again—and as no other—within our ears.

Upon the stage, to play the piano part in Saint-Saëns's concerto in G minor, came gravely a young girl who hardly looked her sixteen years, whose curling brown hair was not "up," whose white skirt was not "down," who could still wear a broad white "bertha" becomingly about her shoulders. Off the stage, at the end of the concerto, she went as gravely—a bundle of carnations and chrysanthemums in her hands from a grateful orchestra—to be kissed paternally and with Mme. Monteux looking down from her usual place in the balcony, by the conductor himself. Forward and back, time and again she went from the "artists'-room" to the edge of the platform while stage and auditorium rang with the heartiest and the sincerest applause. Between this coming and this going she had played her part in the concerto, now and then with perceptible bodily effort, since short arms must speed up and down a long keyboard, but to the ear with outcome that suggested young years and gentle sex only when the music bade her match chord against chord with the orchestra.

The concerto, writen in a day when the composer was high in admiration for Liszt, spares not in elaboration and intricacy of ornament, in decorative virtuosity. The pianist achieved both with equal security and felicity—with the essential suggestion of fanciful, playful brilliance. The music is written in elegant contours and progress, it abounds in delicate and graphic modulations, in expert shadings of rhythm and accent. At every turn the taste, the finesse of the young girl conveyed them. Through measure after measure the concerto glitters and gleams, smiles suavely, snaps brightly—an impeccably polished, a contentedly soulless music. In the pianist's crisp touch, in the light shaping of her phrases, in the limpel body and the varying tints of her tone, in her distribution of ornament and contrast, went clear response, transparent, understanding. Once and again, in the Andante, Saint-Saëns sings in graceful melancholy; again in the Allegretto he is dryly fanciful. The girl at the keyboard caught his very mood and voice. So much for Magdeleine Brard, not prodigy, but beyond peradventure virtuosa pianist; artist of the concert-hall by unmistakeable instinct, interpretive musician as well—so far as her music yielded opportunity.

H. T. PARKER

In tones of like power for the new passion, as savage and acrid of voice, out of kindred barbaric background, in similar boldness of musical image and starkness of musical progress, Israel exults, vaunts its God of Jacob, domineers over an earth possessed, as it fondly believes, of its joy. A tribe mouths defiant through the proud might that bids the earth, the mountains upon it, the waters within it, do the Jewish will. Had the major prophets of Israel written music, they might have held Mr. Bloch's pen. Individual beyond most composers of our time, he can yet set tribes into music—a whole race even, in its fierce barbaric day.

phony," withdrawn these six years from the regular course of the Symphony Concerts so that its persistent popularity may swell the Pension Fund. Once more, then, the alternate tumult and sickish sweetness of the first movement, the waltz that never waltzes, the march that thunders, the finale of black despair. After Chaikovsky, Wagner—of the prelude to Tristan and Isolde's final soliloquy; and after Wagner, Rossini of the Alpine storm and song in the overture to "William Tell." Between whiles, an ornate and fanciful concerto of Saint-Saëns for piano and orchestra—in G minor—with the youthful Miss Brard to play the solo part—a technician in her teens, a musician as well, a cause for admiration from Paris even to New York.

Music

WEEK-END CONCERTS

SIMPLE MEMORIAL RITES FOR MR. HIGGINSON

Music and a Wreath Recall Him at Symphony Hall—Mr. Chadwick's New Tone-Poem Provokes to Candid Reflections—Again a Matinee for the Pension Fund—Routine Chaikovsky, Wagner That Might Have Been Higher Pitched and, for Dis-Magdeleine Brard, Pianist

A thin card, ruled in black and slipped into the programme-books of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening, announced that "The Funeral March from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, 'Eroica,' would be played in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." As preface to the appointed pieces, it was so played—not too securely or eloquently, since Mr. Monteux and the band were necessarily strangers to each other with the music and there had been little time for rehearsal. In the corridor along Huntington avenue, commonly used as a smoking room, against the pedestal on which rests a bust of Mr. Higginson, stood a heart-shaped wreath. Presumably many minds reflected upon the death of the man who made possible the finest glories of the orchestra and who strove as best he might with the misfortune pursuing it in the hysteria of war. Certainly, many tongues, between whiles, speculated upon the endowment he had often purposed to bequeath to it. Had changed conditions in the control, the policy and the personnel of the orchestra, had, possibly, a mournful chagrin over the events of recent years, altered his intention? No one, as it seemed, might say with authority and speculation went varied way.

Otherwise there was no departure from the routine of the concert. As though indeed to assure it, for the third time Mr. Monteux's inquiring eye sought Mr. Chadwick when the audience applauded his tone-poem, "The Angel of Death," until Thursday and Friday unplayed hereabouts. Quickly the conductor descried the composer; as preparedly as on the two previous occasions, Mr. Chadwick rose and made acknowledgment. Few, doubtless, are the rewards a composer may receive in his own person, coram publico, and it were churlish to begrudge Mr. Chadwick or any other resident maker of music these amusing little rites. Yet obscurely in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon sat Ernest Bloch composer of the settings of two Psalms sung by Mme. Frijsh. They were music of inspiration in comparison with Mr. Chadwick's well-made piece; beside those tonal frenzies of Jewish lament and Jewish elation, "The Angel of Death" could seem only colorless, unindividual, routine. Yet Mr. Bloch sought no recognition, received none, was as unknown in his own person to the audience as though he had been sitting at his work-table in New York. So fall the meeds of the concert-hall. Possibly with a note on its tablets, the Divine Justice makes resolve somehow, somewhere to revise and correct them.

Possibly also the correction was already made—at Sanders Theatre on Thursday, in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. For "The Angel of Death" is not music upon which the composer of the "Symphonic Sketches," of "Adonais," of sundry movements in his symphonies, of other pieces of his most fertile and fullest days, may advisedly preen himself. Kind for kind, it does not even match the more recent "Tam O'Shanter." Rather, it falls into the category of "Antony and Cleopatra" and "Aphrodite," as willed and manufactured music of Mr. Chadwick's later, more sterile years. Like the bust of Venus that ostensibly moved him to the composition of "Aphrodite," so sculpture again suggested "The Angel of Death"—the relief whereon Death stays the artist's hand, set by Mr. French above the grave of Martin Milmore at Forest Hills. The scheme of the tone-poem however, is already an ancient and honorable convention of programme-music, officially stamped, as it were, with the Straussian label. Hear the artist at his work; hear him, first, as a man of flesh and blood; hear him, also, as a man of the full test of self-expressing creation; hear him, also, as a man of power; hear, furthermore, Death, rustling, muttering, in the wainscot; hear, finally, Death closing upon him, stifling him. For a moment the rhetorical pause of contrast: then the slowly expanding tonal transfiguration, the climacteric tonal glorification of the artist who has lived in his work and wrought well and truly. Hear, then, his ideals embodied, fulfilled. Hear, also, what St. Paul says: "Neither count I my life dear unto myself, so long as I finish my course with joy."

A conventional, a pseudo-Straussian design, yet a design that invites and stimulates to music. Unfortunately, however, there is scanty sign of such stimulation and as rare token of individual emotion and expression in Mr. Chadwick's actual music-making. Out of a well-stocked mind, he readily summons approved procedures, with such tonal matter, of Strauss, of Wagner, of Chaikovsky; out of long practice, he sets down appropriate melodic ideas of his own; out of a like facility of method and resource, he develops, modulates, diversifies and colors them. The outcome is a well-made, a discreet, a becoming music, as bare of imaginative impulse in the composer as it is bare of imaginative reaction in the listener—the prose, not the poetry of tones, safe, sane—and sterile. The rays of Mr. Chadwick's study-lamp, not the heat of creative passion within, warm it. Has he, rich in the laurels of his prime, with a voice on occasion more American than that of any other symphonic composer, need to set down so many pages of barren measures that in his sixties he may still "keep on"? Writing such music does he need to emphasize, especially to his younger hearers, the great gulf fixed between the elder generation of American composers that he typifies and the younger that Mr. Carpenter, for example, represents? The youngsters, in the comments of the lobby were not kind to "The Angel of Death." They used bad words, slangful words. They called the music "old hat"; they styled the sculptor, after the manner of the musical plays, "a fast little worker." It is not pleasant to hear Mr. Chadwick's music so mocked in these, his latter days. There are counsels of prudence as well as of ambition.

Composers—and Miss Brard

It was pleasure to hear the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon resuming its semi-annual concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund—not the least of the good works interrupted and harassed by the war, but happily one easy to repair and restore. It was as pleasant also to see every seat in Symphony Hall and much standing-room filled—clear token of the interest and the good will a casual but admiring public now bears to conductor and band. Precedent is a safe guide in programme-making for these concerts since other purposes order them than the quality, minutely tested, of the music in hand. Once more, accordingly, Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was the longest item of the day; Wagner returned yet again in the prelude and the orchestral arrangement of the final scene from "Tristan," while a solo for violoncello, warmly and largely played by Mr Bedetti, a solo for English horn as well sustained and colored by Mr. Speyer, a storm in the basses and a "grand crescendo" for full orchestra—in sum the overture to Rossini's opera "William Tell"—sufficed to end the concert roundly.

BARRIE'S PHILANDERERS

Youth Knocks at the Door

Magdeleine Brard

Parisian Pianist, Still in Her Teens, to Play with the Symphony Orchestra at the Impending Concert for Its Pension Fund

MLLE. MAGDELEINE BRAR...

proves the point the more incontestably. They could keep people who had actually suffered deep wrongs quiet by means of plentiful musical entertainment. That is a time-honored maxim of all foreign governments.

"We can learn from them in this. We ought to give our citizen body every facility to make music and enjoy it. Our big business men are seeing it, and that is having a powerful effect on the people in general. A lecturer on music might shout his lungs out impressing this fact on a corner crowd, but when the men and women of the United States, in love with efficient, clean-dealing with personal initiative and energy, which eventually spells success, see a man like Charles Schwab advocating mus... culture and confessing to the ... has given him in his ... ey begin to think of ... a new viewpoint and ... moved from dried-up

Tschaikowsky: the 'Pathetic Symphony'

In Russia it has been the custom to bomb those unhappy potentates whom the people do not love. Peter Iljitch Tschaikowsky employed subtler methods. He concealed his ammunition in his music.

Like a bombshell, indeed, was the explosion of this music, thrown over the fence from the land of the Czar into the concert halls and opera houses of America and Europe. Its melancholy beauty, its gorgeous colors, its volcanic passion, shocked the conservative and fascinated the public. No need to explain this music. Useless to condemn it. It was too human, too original, too utterly sincere for that. It winged its way from heart to heart.

Tschaikowsky was a temperament essentially typical of his country and his times. The unrest, the fatalism, the vague aspirations toward a brighter and freer day, which possessed Russia, were echoed in his art. He was born on the 17th day of May, 1840. One day, when he was having a geography lesson with his brothers and sisters, he shocked his governess by kissing the map of Russia and spitting on the rest of the world. Only one other country was accepted, a country always dear to Tschaikowsky's heart. When reproved for his action he answered: "But didn't you see? All the time I kept my hand over France."

Tschaikowsky's first musical impulse was given him when his father brought home from Petrograd a mechanical player, an orchestrion, which played airs by Mozart and by Italian composers—Bellini, Donizetti and Rossini—whom Peter thus came to know and love. The music of these men profoundly influenced his own style as a composer in later days.

Early Tragedy

Peter loved his mother with passionate intensity, and when she died of cholera in 1854 retired into himself, morose, cynical and somewhat self-centred. It was some time before he recovered. He followed the example of other men of his own rank in life by fitting himself for an official sinecure in Petrograd, where the pay was good and the service light. By day he was a rather absent-minded and unsatisfactory official, and by night the darling of Petrograd drawing rooms, for he was a good-looking young man who had a charming talent for the improvisation of waltzes at the piano. This was Tschaikowsky in his 20th year.

Then came a change. Disgust with his idle life grew on the composer. He decided that his only talent was for music; that, therefore, it was his duty to develop it at whatever cost, if his life were to mean anything and he escape the fate of the fop and the idler. Gone was the dandy of former days. Gone also the comfortable salary which had been his. Tschaikowsky became a pupil of Anton Rubinstein at the Conservatory. Rubinstein helped him over those poverty-stricken days by securing him pupils, giving him shelter and even clothes on occasion. Tschaikowsky writes home to his father that he is working hard and is happy in his art—only it is a little uncomfortable in the evenings, since the scratching of his pen disturbs Rubinstein when he tries to sleep! . . .

Heart-Beat of Russia

Tschaikowsky's fame commenced to spread, but his pocketbook was still very thin. In order to replenish it he decided to give a concert. For this occasion he composed a new work, in which the whole world realized the heartbeat of Russia. One day while Tschaikowsky was composing he heard a plasterer singing beneath the window a sad and beautiful song which the musician could not dismiss from his thoughts. This song mournful and tender, became the substance of the celebrated slow movement, or "Andante Cantabile" of his quartet (Op. 11.)

As usual, the composer, a painfully shy and sensitive man, passed his hour of torment before the performance of this work took place wondering whether he had created a work of art or made a plain fool of himself. His doubts were relieved in a manner he never forgot. Count Leo Tolstoi paid him a visit and sat by him while his quartet was being played. Listening to the slow movement Tolstoi was so profoundly moved that he wept. "I have heard," he said, "the soul of my patient and long-suffering people."

Mme. Von Meck, the widow of a rich engineer, loved music, and had been profoundly affected by the compositions of Tschaikowsky. She asked Tschaikowsky to allow her to pension him for the remainder of his days, saying that it would make her infinitely happy to know him secure and able to compose as his inspiration directed. After some hesitation he accepted this offer. It was Madame Von Meck who stipulated, with the rarest tact and generosity, that they should never meet. They never did meet, save once, by accident, when the composer encountered her in the woods. They gazed at each other for a moment without a word. Then Tschaikowsky, with a frightened exclamation, raised his hat and fled through the trees. They continued to correspond until—bitterest of all the composer's trials—there arose between them a misunderstanding which remained unexplained to the day of his death. Surely, beside the eternities of true friendship, the accidents of this life weigh small. Surely, on the other side of the grave the needful word was spoken! . . .

The "Symphonie Pathetique"

At the last of his life Tschaikowsky completed his most eloquent and tragic composition, the "Symphonie Pathetique." What were the circumstances which inspired this work? And had the composer a premonition of his approaching end? Certainly its composition was attended by sorrowful events. Tschaikowsky's health was poor, he was melancholy and despondent. It seemed to him that his friends were dropping away. Anton Rubinstein has passed in the street without speaking to him.

Worst of all, the hardest trial of his life to bear, Madame von Meck had abruptly stopped corresponding with him. We now know that her mind had been affected and that this had changed her relations with everyone. But to Tschaikowsky, the estrangement was a crushing blow to the fairest ideal of his life. Many believed, in view of his conduct at this time, that he contemplated suicide. He proceeded to put his affairs in order, gave the finishing touches to a number of scores which had not yet been published, and worked with feverish energy on his last symphony. He admitted that this work had a programme, a story, but what it was he would never tell. Had he not burned his diary we might know, but now the secret is sealed forever. The "Symphonie Pathetique" stands today the monument of Tschaikowsky's art, the epitome of his career.

The End

Constantine von Sternberg, a personal friend of Tschaikowsky, told the writer this story of his end: Tschaikowsky, at a banquet, insisted, despite the warning of his friends, on drinking from a pitcher of unboiled water. Cholera was rife in Petrograd. Soon after he was seized with pain. A doctor was summoned, every restorative applied, and it seemed that the composer was recovering. He was put to bed, after which the doctor recommended the usual treatment—a hot bath. Singularly enough, Tschaikowsky had had all his life a superstition that he would die in his bath, and was very averse to following the physician's advice. He was, nevertheless, immersed, and all promised well when, on the morning of Oct. 25, 1893, the doctor turned from a consultation with his assistant, and found that life was gone.

This was the end of a noble and unfortunate man, the composer who had done more than any other to make Russia known musically to the outside world. Latin, Slav, Anglo-Saxon—all have been stirred by his voice, by the human documents which he wrote with his heart's blood in little black characters on music paper.

(From "The Lore of Music," by Olin Downes. Copyright by Harper Bros., New York city.)

PENSION FUND

As soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock, Magdeleine Brard, the brilliant young French pianist, who has astonished and delighted New York and other cities, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize at the Paris Conservatory. Her fame in her own country was immediately echoed in this when she played with several orchestras and in recitals of her own. She has chosen Saint-Saens's G Minor Concerto No. 2 to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux has chosen, instead of a symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major), written for a string orchestra in five short movements. It has some beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first violoncello. One number will be new at these concerts—Dukas's overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the symphonic poem, "Thamar," by Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome"—which requires a small chorus of female voices behind the stage.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

For the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday next, Pierre Monteux has chosen a programme of considerable interest. Instead of a symphony he will open the concerts with Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major), written for a string orchestra in five short movements. There are some exceptionally beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first 'cello. One number will be new to these concerts, Paul Dukas's Overture to Corneille's tragedy "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," by the early Russian composer, Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome"—music of daring harmonies which requires a chorus of women's voices behind the stage.

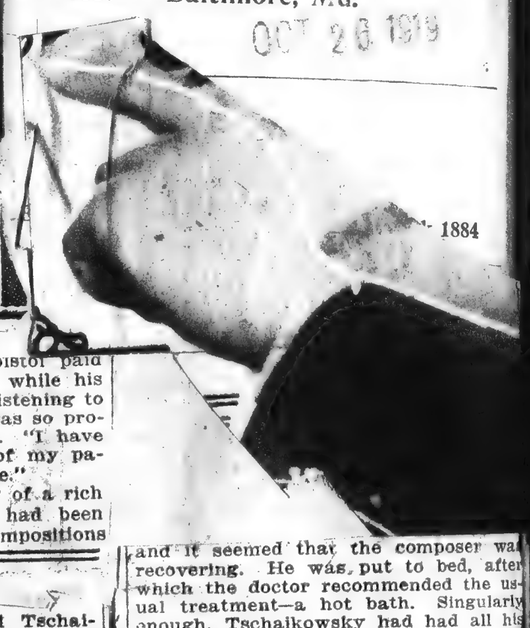
PENSION FUND CONCERT

As soloist at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall, Magdeleine Brard, the brilliant young French pianist, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize from the Paris conservatory. She has chosen Saint Saens' G minor Concerto, No. 2, to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the prelude and love-death music from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for a string orchestra, Dukas' "Polyeucto" overture, the symphonic poem "Thamar," by Balakireff and Florent Schmitt's "Salome" music have been chosen.

bm SUN
dress: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 26 1919



1884

PENSION FUND CONCERT

As soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock, Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist, who has played New York and other cities, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize from the Paris Conservatory which customarily bestows its honors upon mature men of eminent talents rather than upon small girls. She has chosen Saint Saens' G minor Concerto No. 2, perhaps her most striking achievement, to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

George W. Murray of Lawrence.

PENSION FUND CONCERT SUNDAY

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock comes the first of the season's Pension Fund concerts for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra' pension fund. Just the announcement assures a crowded house house for these concerts afford those rare opportunities of hearing this unexcelled orchestra by the thousands who for one reason or another cannot take in the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Magdeleine Brard, French pianist, who has been such a success in New York, will be the soloists. She will play Saint Saen's G minor concerto No. 4. Mr. Monteux has chosen "Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell" [illegible]

Youth Knocks at the Door

Magdeleine Brard

Parisian Pianist, Still in Her Teens, to Play with the Symphony Orchestra at the Impending Concert for Its Pension Fund

MLLE. MAGDELEINE BRAR

proves the point the more incontestably. They could keep people who had actually suffered deep wrongs quiet by means of plentiful musical entertainment. That is a time-honored maxim of all foreign governments.

We can learn from them in this. We ought to give our citizen body every facility to make music and enjoy it. Our big business men are seeing it, and that is having a powerful effect on the people in general. A lecturer on music might shout his lungs out impressing this fact on a corner crowd, but when the men and women of the United States, in love with efficient, clean-dealing with personal initiative and energy, which eventually spells success, see a man like Charles Schwab advocating music culture and confessing to the [illegible] has given him in his [illegible] they begin to think of [illegible] a new viewpoint and [illegible] moved from dried-up

Tschaikowsky: the 'Pathetic Symphony'

In Russia it has been the custom to bomb those unhappy potentates whom the people do not love. Peter Iljitch Tschaikowsky employed subtler methods. He concealed his ammunition in his music.

Like a bombshell, indeed, was the explosion of this music, thrown over the fence from the land of the Czar into the concert halls and opera houses of America and Europe. Its melancholy beauty, its gorgeous colors, its volcanic passion, shocked the conservative and fascinated the public. No need to explain this music. Useless to condemn it. It was too human, too original, too utterly sincere for that. It winged its way from heart to heart.

Tschaikowsky was a temperament essentially typical of his country and his times. The unrest, the fatalism, the vague aspirations toward a brighter and freer day, which possessed Russia, were echoed in his art. He was born on the 17th day of May, 1840. One day, when he was having a geography lesson with his brothers and sisters, he shocked his governess by kissing the map of Russia and spitting on the rest of the world. Only one other country was accepted, a country always dear to Tschaikowsky's heart. When reproved for his action he answered: "But didn't you see? All the time I kept my hand over France."

Tschaikowsky's first musical impulse was given him when his father brought home from Petrograd a mechanical player, an orchestrion, which played airs by Mozart and by Italian composers—Bellini, Donizetti and Rossini—whom Peter thus came to know and love. The music of these men profoundly influenced his own style as a composer in later days.

Early Tragedy

Peter loved his mother with passionate intensity, and when she died of cholera in 1854 retired into himself, morose, cynical and somewhat self-centred. It was some time before he recovered. He followed the example of other men of his own rank in life by fitting himself for an official sinecure in Petrograd, where the pay was good and the service light. By day he was a rather absent-minded and unsatisfactory official, and by night the darling of Petrograd drawing rooms, for he was a good-looking young man who had a charming talent for the improvisation of waltzes at the piano. This was Tschaikowsky in his 20th year.

Then came a change. Disgust with his idle life grew on the composer. He decided that his only talent was for music; that, therefore, it was his duty to develop it at whatever cost, if his life were to mean anything and he escape the fate of the fop and the idler. Gone was the dandy of former days. Gone also the comfortable salary which had been his. Tschaikowsky became a pupil of Anton Rubinstein at the Conservatory. Rubinstein helped him over those poverty-stricken days by securing him pupils, giving him shelter and even clothes on occasion. Tschaikowsky writes home to his father that he is working hard and is happy in his art—only it is a little uncomfortable in the evenings, since the scratching of his pen disturbs Rubinstein when he tries to sleep! . . .

Heart-Beat of Russia

Tschaikowsky's fame commenced to spread, but his pocketbook was still very thin. In order to replenish it he decided to give a concert. For this occasion he composed a new work, in which the whole world realized the heartbeat of Russia. One day while Tschaikowsky was composing he heard a plasterer singing beneath the window a sad and beautiful song which the musician could not dismiss from his thoughts. This song mournful and tender, became the substance of the celebrated slow movement, or "Andante Cantabile" of his quartet (Op. 11.)

As usual, the composer, a painfully shy and sensitive man, passed his hour of torment before the performance of this work took place wondering whether he had created a work of art or made a plain fool of himself. His doubts were relieved in a manner he never forgot. Count Leo Tolstoi paid him a visit and sat by him while his quartet was being played. Listening to the slow movement Tolstoi was so profoundly moved that he wept. "I have heard," he said, "the soul of my patient and long-suffering people."

Mme. Von Meck, the widow of a rich engineer, loved music, and had been profoundly affected by the compositions of Tschaikowsky. She asked Tschaikowsky to allow her to pension him for the remainder of his days, saying that it would make her infinitely happy to know him secure and able to compose as his inspiration directed. After some hesitation he accepted this offer. It was Madame Von Meck who stipulated, with the rarest tact and generosity, that they should never meet. They never did meet, save once, by accident, when the composer encountered her in the woods. They gazed at each other for a moment without a word. Then Tschaikowsky, with a frightened exclamation, raised his hat and fled through the trees. They continued to correspond until—bitterest of all the composer's trials—there arose between them a misunderstanding which remained unexplained to the day of his death. Surely, beside the eternities of true friendship, the accidents of this life weigh small. Surely, on the other side of the grave the needful word was spoken! . . .

The "Symphonie Pathetique"

At the last of his life Tschaikowsky completed his most eloquent and tragic composition, the "Symphonie Pathetique." What were the circumstances which inspired this work? And had the composer a premonition of his approaching end? Certainly its composition was attended by sorrowful events. Tschaikowsky's health was poor, he was melancholy and despondent. It seemed to him that his friends were dropping away. Anton Rubinstein has passed in the street without speaking to him.

Worst of all, the hardest trial of his life to bear, Madame von Meck had abruptly stopped corresponding with him. We now know that her mind had been affected and that this had changed her relations with everyone. But to Tschaikowsky, the estrangement was a crushing blow to the fairest ideal of his life. Many believed, in view of his conduct at this time, that he contemplated suicide. He proceeded to put his affairs in order, gave the finishing touches to a number of scores which had not yet been published, and worked with feverish energy on his last symphony. He admitted that this work had a programme, a story, but what it was he would never tell. Had he not burned his diary we might know, but now the secret is sealed forever. The "Symphonie Pathetique" stands today the monument of Tschaikowsky's art, the epitome of his career.

The End

Constantine von Sternberg, a personal friend of Tschaikowsky, told the writer this story of his end: Tschaikowsky, at a banquet, insisted, despite the warning of his friends, on drinking from a pitcher of unboiled water. Cholera was rife in Petrograd. Soon after he was seized with pain. A doctor was summoned, every restorative applied, and it seemed that the composer was recovering. He was put to bed, after which the doctor recommended the usual treatment—a hot bath. Singularly enough, Tschaikowsky had had all his life a superstition that he would die in his bath, and was very averse to following the physician's advice. He was, nevertheless, immersed, and all promised well when, on the morning of Oct. 25, 1893, the doctor turned from a consultation with his assistant, and found that life was gone.

This was the end of a noble and unfortunate man, the composer who had done more than any other to make Russia known musically to the outside world. Latin, Slav, Anglo-Saxon—all have been stirred by his voice, by the human documents which he wrote with his heart's blood in little black characters on music paper.

(From "The Lore of Music," by Olin Downes. Copyright by Harper Bros., New York city.)

PENSION FUND

As soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock, Magdeleine Brard, the brilliant young French pianist, who has astonished and delighted New York and other cities, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize at the Paris Conservatory. Her fame in her own country was immediately echoed in this when she played with several orchestras and in recitals of her own. She has chosen Saint-Saens's G Minor Concerto No. 2 to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux has chosen, instead of a symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major), written for a string orchestra in five short movements. It has some beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first violoncello. One number will be new at these concerts—Dukas's overture to Cornelle's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the symphonic poem, "Thamar," by Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome"—which requires a small chorus of female voices behind the stage.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

For the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday next, Pierre Monteux has chosen a programme of considerable interest. Instead of a symphony he will open the concerts with Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major), written for a string orchestra in five short movements. There are some exceptionally beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first 'cello. One number will be new to these concerts, Paul Dukas's Overture to Cornelle's tragedy "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," by the early Russian composer, Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome"—music of daring harmonies which requires a chorus of women's voices behind the stage.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

As soloist at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall, Magdeleine Brard, the brilliant young French pianist, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize from the Paris conservatory. She has chosen Saint Saens' G minor Concerto, No. 2, to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the prelude and love-death music from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for a string orchestra, Dukas' "Polyeucto" overture, the symphonic poem "Thamar," by Balakireff and Florent Schmitt's "Salome" music have been chosen.

om SUN

dress: Baltimore, Md.

1884

PENSION FUND CONCERT

As soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock, Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist, who has played New York and other cities, will at last come to Boston. She came to this country last year, having taken a first prize from the Paris Conservatory which customarily bestows its honors upon mature men of eminent talents rather than upon small girls. She has chosen Saint Saens' G minor Concerto No. 2, perhaps her most striking achievement, to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell."

George W. Murray of Lawrence.

PENSION FUND CONCERT SUNDAY

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock comes the first of the season's Pension Fund concerts for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra' pension fund. Just the announcement assures a crowded house house for these concerts afford those rare opportunities of hearing this unexcelled orchestra by the thousands who for one reason or another cannot take in the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Magdeliene Brard, French pianist, who has been such a success in New York, will be the soloists. She will play Saint Saen's G-minor concerto No. 2. Mr. Monteux has chosen "Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell" for

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Concert Manners Good and Bad

THERE is no place where bad manners are more conspicuous than at a concert. A "faux pas" at most social affairs is more or less covered up by the bustle of conversation and movement of the rest of the company, but in the concert hall the audience is seated and supposedly silent, and attention is instantly attracted by any inconsiderate act on the part of either performer or listener.

Unnecessary noise is the most offensive manifestation of ill-breeding met with in concert halls on the part of the audience.

Probably every one who goes to the Symphony concerts has been annoyed by the people who make a leisurely progress down the long aisles during what ought to be the very brief pause after the first movement of the Symphony and brush past half a row of listeners to get to their places in the middle of a block of seats, often without any attempt at apology.

Shrugs from Mr Monteux are no more effective than sarcastic looks from Dr Muck used to be in making the offenders feel guilty. The same thing happens at the Sunday concerts, often to the obvious discomfort of the soloist. If the poor car service is responsible every one ought to make an early start. Better arrive 20 minutes too soon than two minutes late.

Then there are the people with chronic coughs, who seem to time their explosions for the finest pianissimo passages. One sometimes wishes the ushers would distribute cough drops as a gentle hint. The connoisseurs who educate their friends and neighbors gratis by a running commentary on what is being played or sung should not be forgotten. Their supplements to the program book, if reserved for the intermission, often are more entertaining than they realize to the involuntary eavesdropper.

Most intolerable of all are the individuals with a primitive sense of rhythm which results in a relentless tattoo of tapping on floor or chair backs. This can often be circumvented by beating a totally different rhythm from that of the music being played, a subtlety which usually soon reduces the offender to a puzzled silence.

The automatic applauders also deserve mention. They not merely clap anything and anybody, good, bad or indifferent, with the same empty fervor. They are sure to break in upon any long rest or into a pause between movements which are too closely connected to make interruption desirable to the performers or the intelligent portion of the listeners.

Applause between movements of a symphony or sonata breaks the continuity of the work, and might better be reserved for the conclusion in all cases. But that is a Utopian ideal. All one could expect would be silence until the player or singer or conductor turned to the audience politely expectant.

Mr Monteux, for example, to judge by his demeanor, does not care for applause between the sections of suites played by the Symphony. Yet he almost invariably gets it from the automatic applauders if there is any perceptible pause. He never acknowledges it, however, unless the rest of the audience joins in, despite his meticulous courtesy in such matters.

The encore fiends, of course, were long since banished by a strict rule from the Symphony concerts. They find their elysium at the Sunday concerts, however, except when some established artist of the first rank, like Kreisler, Hofmann or Rachmaninoff has the courage and good sense to refuse to give extra numbers before the end of the concert.

Most programs are planned in a way which makes "The Rosary" and "Annie Laurie," for example, inappropriate interpolations. Yet the applause which greets encores proves that "popular favorites" is what the encore fiend, weary of Bach and Debussy, really wants.

If the performer adds more Debussy to his Debussy group when an encore becomes inevitable it is politely, but coolly received. If he condescends to spoil the congruity of his program by playing, let us say the "Scarf Dance," by Mme Chaminade, between his Mozart and his Debussy groups, he brings down the house every time.

John McCormack never escapes without singing "I Hear You Calling Me," or something on that order, when the audience encores his singing of Handel; however he may try to palm off Schubert's "Ave Maria" or some other good but popular number on his admirers as more appropriate to that part of his program. That is all very well; but not what they came for.

The trouble is that they are supposed to have come to hear an announced program planned to observe some sort of artistic unity.

They deserve a few sugar plums at the close of the concert, perhaps, when the listeners who prefer music to sugar plums have gone home. But encore numbers of the usual sort are out of place in the middle of a program of serious music.

Of course there are performers who have no scruples about artistic unity in their programs and who require surprisingly little encouragement to make them give encores of any sort they think likely to please. But people who care for good music for its own sake usually avoid their concerts.

Good manners at concerts then demand of the audience complete silence during the performance of any number, even one with slight pauses in the middle of it, and avoidance of all unnecessary bustle and commotion. Of the performers quiet self-possession and attention to the business in hand, which is the performance of good music in the best possible manner, is all that is required. A little thought and pains on the part of individual concert goers and concert givers would prevent much needless offense.

Magdeleine Brard, Pension Fund Concert Soloist

Magdeleine Brard, the French girl whose piano playing has won extraordinary praise from critics in New York and Paris, will replace Mabel Garrison as soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto in G minor. Miss Garrison is ill and unable to appear, but Miss Brard should prove a very acceptable substitute.

The orchestra will play two familiar and well-liked numbers not heard of late at the subscription concerts, Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." For many in the audience, however, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan" will be the number most eagerly awaited.

This concert, it should be noticed, begins at 3 o'clock, half an hour earlier than usual.

Boston Symphony Program

For the Boston Symphony concerts this week, Pierre Monteux has chosen a program of considerable interest. Instead of a symphony he will open the concerts with Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D major, written for a string orchestra in five short movements. There are some exceptionally beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first 'cello.

One number will be new to these concerts—Paul Dukas' Overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," by the early Russian composer Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," music of daring harmonies which requires a chorus of women's voices behind the stage.

A PIANISSIMO PASSAGE GIVING A GLIMPSE OF PIERRE MONTEUX, NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, IN ACTION AT A REHEARSAL OF THAT FAMOUS ORGANIZATION
© Underwood & Underwood

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be performed next Friday and Saturday, will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major) written in five short movements for string orchestra with solo parts for two violins, viola, and 'cello. Pierre Monteux has also chosen for these concerts Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar," noted for its sensuous oriental coloring, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," music of considerable interest which calls for a chorus of women's voices behind the stage. A piece new to these concerts will be Paul Duka's overture to Corneille's tragedy "Polyeucte."

BRARD PENSION FUND SOLOIST

Magdeline Brard, the extraordinarily talented young French pianist who has made a profound and striking impression in New York during the last two seasons, has at last come to Boston to play as soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock this afternoon. A first prize pupil of the Paris Conservatory, her fame in her own country has been amply echoed in this.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Concert Manners Good and Bad

THERE is no place where bad manners are more conspicuous than at a concert. A "faux pas" at most social affairs is more or less covered up by the bustle of conversation and movement of the rest of the company, but in the concert hall the audience is seated and supposedly silent, and attention is instantly attracted by any inconsiderate act on the part of either performer or listener.

Unnecessary noise is the most offensive manifestation of ill-breeding met with in concert halls on the part of the audience.

Probably every one who goes to the Symphony concerts has been annoyed by the people who make a leisurely progress down the long aisles during what ought to be the very brief pause after the first movement of the Symphony and brush past half a row of listeners to get to their places in the middle of a block of seats, often without any attempt at apology.

Shrugs from Mr Monteux are no more effective than sarcastic looks from Dr Muck used to be in making the offenders feel guilty. The same thing happens at the Sunday concerts, often to the obvious discomfort of the soloist. If the poor car service is responsible every one ought to make an early start. Better arrive 20 minutes too soon than two minutes late.

Then there are the people with chronic coughs, who seem to time their explosions for the finest pianissimo passages. One sometimes wishes the ushers would distribute cough drops as a gentle hint. The connoisseurs who edicate their friends and neighbors gratis by a running commentary on what is being played or sung should not be forgotten. Their supplements to the program book, if reserved for the intermission, often are more entertaining than they realize to the involuntary eavesdropper.

Most intolerable of all are the individuals with a primitive sense of rhythm which results in a relentless tattoo o tapping on floor or chair backs. Thi can often be circumvented by beating totally different rhythm from that o the music being played, a subtlety whic usually soon reduces the offender to puzzled silence.

The automatic applauders also deserve mention. They not merely cla anything and anybody, good, bad or in different, with the same empty fervor They are sure to break in upon any long rest or into a pause between movements which are too closely connected to make interruption desirable to the performers or the intelligent portion of the listeners.

Applause between movements of a symphony or sonata breaks the continuity of the work, and might better be reserved for the conclusion in all cases. But that is a Utopian ideal. All one could expect would be silence until the player or singer or conductor turned to the audience politely expectant.

Mr Monteux, for example, to judge by his demeanor, does not care for applause between the sections of suites played by the Symphony. Yet he almost invariably gets it from the automatic applauders if there is any perceptible pause. He never acknowledges it, however, unless the rest of the audience joins in, despite his meticulous courtesy in such matters.

The encore fiends, of course, were long since banished by a strict rule from the Symphony concerts. They find their elysium at the Sunday concerts, however, except when some established artist of the first rank, like Kreisler, Hofmann or Rachmaninoff has the courage and good sense to refuse to give extra numbers before the end of the concert.

Most programs are planned in a way which makes "The Rosary" and "Annie Laurie," for example, inappropriate interpolations. Yet the applause which greets encores proves that "popular favorites" is what the encore fiend, weary of Bach and Debussy, really wants.

If the performer adds more Debussy to his Debussy group when an encore becomes inevitable it is politely, but coolly received. If he condescends to spoil the congruity of his program by playing, let us say the "Scarf Dance," by Mme Chaminade, between his Mozart and his Debussy groups, he brings down the house every time.

John McCormack never escapes without singing "I Hear You Calling Me," or something on that order, when the audience encores his singing of Handel, however he may try to palm off Schubert's "Ave Maria" or some other good but popular number on his admirers as more appropriate to that part of his program. That is all very well; but not what they came for.

The trouble is that they are supposed to have come to hear an announced program planned to observe some sort of artistic unity.

They deserve a few sugar plums at the close of the concert, perhaps, when the listeners who prefer music to sugar plums have gone home. But encore numbers of the usual sort are out of place in the middle of a program of serious music.

Of course there are performers who have no scruples about artistic unity in their programs and who require surprisingly little encouragement to make them give encores of any sort they think likely to please. But people who care for good music for its own sake usually avoid their concerts.

Good manners at concerts then demand of the audience complete silence during the performance of any number, even one with slight pauses in the middle of it, and avoidance of all unnecessary bustle and commotion. Of the performers quiet self-possession and attention to the business in hand, which is the performance of good music in the best possible manner, is all that is required. A little thought and pains on the part of individual concert goers and concert givers would prevent much needless offense.

Magdeleine Brard, Pension Fund Concert Soloist

Magdeleine Brard, the French girl whose piano playing has won extraordinary praise from critics in New York and Paris, will replace Mabel Garrison as soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto in G minor. Miss Garrison is ill and unable to appear, but Miss Brard should prove a very acceptable substitute.

The orchestra will play two familiar and well-liked numbers not heard of late at the subscription concerts, Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." For many in the audience, however, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan" will be the number most eagerly awaited.

This concert, it should be noticed, begins at 3 o'clock, half an hour earlier than usual.

Boston Symphony Program

For the Boston Symphony concerts this week, Pierre Monteux has chosen a program of considerable interest. Instead of a symphony he will open the concerts with Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D major, written for a string orchestra in five short movements. There are some exceptionally beautiful solo passages for the two leading violins, the first viola and the first 'cello.

One number will be new to these concerts—Paul Dukas' Overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The remaining two works were heard here and well liked several years ago—the sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," by the early Russian composer Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," music of daring harmonies which requires a chorus of women's voices behind the stage.

A PIANISSIMO PASSAGE GIVING A GLIMPSE OF PIERRE MONTEUX, NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, IN ACTION AT A REHEARSAL OF THAT FAMOUS ORGANIZATION
© Underwood & Underwood

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be performed next Friday and Saturday, will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 5 in D major) written in five short movements for string orchestra with solo parts for two violins, viola, and 'cello. Pierre Monteux has also chosen for these concerts Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar," noted for its sensuous oriental coloring, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," music of considerable interest which calls for a chorus of women's voices behind the stage. A third new to these concerts will be Paul Duka's overture to Corneille's tragedy "Polyeucte."

BRARD PENSION FUND SOLOIST

Magdeleine Brard, the extraordinarily talented young French pianist who has made a profound and striking impression in New York during the last two seasons, has at last come to Boston to play as soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock this afternoon. A first prize pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, her fame in her own country has been amply crowned in this.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MISS JANACOPULOS AND SUNDRY RUSSIANS

"The New Singing" as Exhibited by a Much-Heralded Singer at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge—Two Vivid Pieces from Musorgsky—Programmes at Hand —Other Impending Joys

TO the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge last evening came as "assisting artist" for the first time hereabouts Miss Vera Janacopulos, thrice heralded—for comeliness, for abilities as a "dramatic" singer, for play of personality. The first of her virtues was independent of the pieces that she sang, but as with the other two, the proof did not altogether sustain it. Her dark, deep-set eyes, her fair white face, the ebon and lustrous hair that frame it are good to see; they suggest an emotional, a communicative temperament; but forthwith a somewhat squatty figure clouds this pleasure of the eye. Like Miss Novaes, the pianist, Miss Janacopulos is of South-American origin; and characteristically in both, while the features charm, the form disillusions. Both, however, are primarily to be heard, not seen, and to that end the singer chose four Russian songs—from Musorgsky, "Death the Commander," and "Gathering Mushrooms"; from Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Rose Has Charmed the Nightingale"; from Porodin, "The Sleeping Princess." Three of these songs Miss Janacopulos sang in the original text—a sore handicap to her hearers, since to most of them, even had her diction been clearer, Russian is a strange and seemingly ugly tongue. Only in the French verse to Borodin's music did listening ear meet imparting voice. Miss Janacopulos sang all four pieces also to orchestral accompaniment—whether by the composer or by some other hand, even the learned and inquiring "programmist" did not deign, except in one instance, to say. That instance was the song of Rimsky-Korsakov for which the supposedly raucous and thunderous Mr. Prokofiev had made an orchestral setting lovely in grace of long-drawn, undulating line, quick with harmonic and instrumental imagination, subtle and penetrating in oriental savor. So does "a terrible infant" (as he is represented) coo from the cradle of Rimsky's song. The other settings were serviceable and sympathetic, but as they came and went in the swift commerce of the concert-hall they made little individual impression.

Rimsky's song, relatively familiar, is one more instance of the extended, exfoliating, scroll-like melody that he drew from the East, charged with sensuous voice, inflected with the very quiver of the flesh and led into the music of the West—strange, new, pungent, irresistible. Borodin's song—of the spell-bound princess awaiting in the forest the touch of the releasing lover—illudes likewise by sensuous quality, atmospheric suggestion and adroit detail set lightly upon soft and flowing line. In contrast, Musorgsky's pieces are of another substance and texture, voice and implication. As always he writes with his eye upon the object in the directest of imagery, in the nakedest of utterance. The picture he would summon, the emotion he would evoke impinge sharply, unsparingly upon the hearer. Both Miss Janacopulos's songs, as it happened, also exemplify his ironic vein, his sardonic innuendo.

In one, "Gathering Mushrooms," Musorgsky seems ostensibly to be utilizing a folk-tune—such a ditty as a hawker might sing as she wandered the town selling her wares, sprightly, keenly rhythmic, abounding in the short, "snappy" phrase and figure of not a little of his music. But she who has gathered the mushrooms is wed to a hateful old man. Would that a rotten mushroom might poison him! Would that she might then spread her couch for a lover! And through the chirping ditty of the street leers this vindictive or sensual innuendo. The other piece is one of Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death," his uncompleted "cycle" to set Mortality in array in tones as mediæval artists limned it in series of etchings or wood-cuts—Death trapping the peasant in wintry storm with feint of summer; Death closing icy fingers upon the child to whom the mother croons; Death stifling the maiden with his serenade and, finally, "Death the Commander" —"Chef d'Armée" is the truer French title—stalking the field of battle when the combat of the day is done, reviewing the fallen, dooming them to eternal oblivion. "Soon will be gone remembrance of you." In Musorgsky's sharp sequences of reiterated, clashing, propulsive figures, is the din of the conflict. Ghastly, almost, falls the quiet of night. Then through the tones strides the baleful figure, then speaks the mordant tongue. Sardonic, Death marshals his review. The music streams with a stripped, graphic, bitter imagery. Power distributes, directs the flood.

Essaying these pieces—for the most part rare comers and rare pleasure in the concert-hall—Miss Janacopulos followed the ways of what the admiring Mr. van Vechten likes to call the "new singing." That is to say, she seemed to have but one end in view—so to color her tones, so to produce and project them that they would work and enhance the illusion of music and verse. The quality of the tone in itself little concerned her so long as it made the impression sought, designed and emphasized. No more did she heed the means by which it was produced so long as it was the tone desired. Full tilt should her projecting, her characterising power play through the music to drive that music home. At need, she would deliver the tonal blow straight from the shoulder," at will she could summon the polished, the artful tonal singing, Miss Janacopulos gained the ... beauty, the languorous prog... Rimsky-Korsakov's melody and ... envisioning, set it as in a magical haze of tonal coloring. Then was her "new singing" nearest to the finesse, the vocal virtue of the old. Yet even so, her intensities, controlled though they were, seemed sometimes to squeeze too hard intrinsically light musics. Again with Musorgsky's song of Death, Miss Janacopulos gained such graphic power as dwells in vehemence, but it is possible to conceive the music (which is keen-edged as well as direct) sung with more sardonic subtlety. Musorgsky's Death is not merely truculent and triumphant; he is also crafty and ironic. So urgent a composer as he yet leaves something to the imagination. The singer less trusted her hearers. She was nearer to Musorgsky when she sustained the rhythm, interlocked the phrase, held to the folk-song note of "Gathering Mushrooms," yet flashed through this vocal nonchalance the sinister innuendo within. The wise in the art of song say that the "new singing" has vocal consequences. Probably, since human throats are human throats, it does. Along the way it has also an intensifying power. Miss Janacopulos exhibited it.

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux has set no symphony upon his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a pleasing departure from routine. The listed pieces also include two in which he led in his years with the Russian Ballet—Balakirev's tone-poem of sensual and sardonic Russian legend, "Thamar" and the suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," first played here under Dr. Muck. A Concerto Grosso for strings by Händel with solo parts for the leaders of the several choirs will preface these numbers; while between them for novelty stands Dukas's overture to "Polyeucte," Corneille's tragedy of Christian martyrs and Roman persecutors.

The concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next, at which the Symphony Orchestra will play for its own Pension Fund is not one of the usual entertainments on that day in that place. Contrary to custom on those occasions, 3 and not 3.30 will be the hour for beginning; no extra numbers will be played, and there will be no supplementary concert. Music, not personalities, is actually to have an inning on a Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Malkin, long the first violoncellist of the Boston Orchestra and now in like place in Mr. Stock's band in Chicago, was well received when as "soloist" he played Lalo's concerto at its concerts last week. "His interpretation was poetic," writes Mr. Hackett in The Evening Post, "his tone was rich and he gave the delicate embroidery a surety of touch that made it most graceful. . . . In fine he established himself an artist worthy of his important position in the orchestra." Bostonian plaudits were not always so warm. H. T. PARKER

Post 2017

AS NEW YORK HEARD IT

D'Indy's War-Time Symphony Played by Mr. Damrosch's Orchestra—Music Received and Judged Much as It Was in Boston

HAD Mr. Monteux chosen so to do, he could have included d'Indy's war-time symphony in one of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in New York last week. Instead, he resigned the first performances of the piece in the American capital of music to Mr. Damrosch. They befell last week, prefaced, according to the conductor's custom, with explanations purporting to come from conversations with the composer himself. In New York as in Boston the audience heard the music with interest but gave no sign that it made deep or warm impression. In turn, the reviewers, so far as their articles are available this morning, seem to judge it much as did the commentators here at home. Mr. Aldrich, for example, writes in The Times:

> Themes in the first movement suggest the call to arms; there are march rhythms, a military character. Harsh bugle-calls interrupt the course of the scherzo. In the slow movement a theme of "brutal ugliness," as Mr. Damrosch's analysis calls it, appears to typify the Germans. There is a triumphant march movement in the last with piercing fanfares of high trumpet tones and the sounds of tumultuous rejoicing. There is an attempt to portray in music the anguish, the heroism of the French.
>
> It would be hardly necessary to say of music by d'Indy that there is an evident intention to get beneath the more obvious and extraneous representations of war as they have conventionally appeared in music. He does not deal in "Battles of Prague" or "Wellington's Victories." Yet this symphony, as a product of the great convulsion which was expected to move creative artists to new flights, is disappointing. There are beauties in it, as in the introduction, in which Mr. Damrosch sees the happiness of peace brooding over France; pages of the slow movement are deeply felt and emotionally expressive; the scherzo, with its folk-song character—but it does not seem always French—is enlivening. The last movement, notwithstanding its elaboration and its orchestral brilliancy, seems more commonplace; and, indeed, the composer has not avoided commonplace in more than one extended passage in even his more successful movements. There is much of the skilful and convincing craftsmanship that is to be expected in d'Indy's work. But there is also evidence that less of mature reflection, less of purely artistic concentration, have gone into the making of this symphony than into other works of the composer's maturity. There are joints, dislocations in the musical thought. The music in places does not 'hang together' unerringly in d'Indy's manner. The stress of emotion under which this symphony was composed can be appreciated, but it has not brought forth music that will enhance the composer's reputation or that is worthy to rank with his best artistic production.

In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel plies a heavy humor upon d'Indy's music, but in the main it disappoints him:

> We confess our inability to recognize either French or German characteristics in the themes. We are speaking hurriedly, of course, and after an insufficient acquaintance with the piece, but to us it seemed that either the French or the Germans, we don't know which, had passed through both Ireland and Africa and cultivated a taste for rattlety-bang percusison instruments and syncopations quite as violent as that of Percy Grainger. In the slow movement there is a section which Mr. Damrosch describes as brutally ugly and which, he said, d'Indy admitted, characterizes the invaders.
>
> The French critic, Fernand le Borne, says that the theme is "close kin to the motive of the Jew in d'Indy's 'St. Christopher.'" We never heard or saw this saintly music and therefore do not know what the French writer meant. We are equally in the dark as to why any kind of a Jew should be dragged, even by suggestion, into a war between modern Teuton and modern Gaul. Le Borne also calls the melody which soars triumphantly over the tumult in the final movement the victorious theme of St. Michael. This theme is permitted to lacerate sensitive ears when sung by a "little trumpet in D" at the end. We had no idea that St. Michael blew a horn (euphemism for trumpet) so brutally. He was commander-in-chief of the angels which drove the rebellious angels out of heaven, but Longfellow tells us that prudence was one of his gifts to man, and prudence implies moderation.
>
> But we fear we are inquiring too curiously when we inquire so. The obvious things about the symphony are that it is short; that it is full of excellent craftsmanship, which would, perhaps, be considered deplorably conservative if it came from a professor of the Conservatory, but is quite the proper thing from the head of the Schola Cantorum. We are also inclined to think that when he was younger d'Indy made better musical pictures of German soldiery in his "Wallenstein" than he did of French soldiery in this symphony. But the new music is interesting, and one ought to hear it several times before presuming to pass any kind of judgment upon it.

Post Nov. 18

NEXT CONCERT IN MEMORIAM

Higginson's Favorite Pieces to Be Played

A special programme has been arranged for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening to be devoted to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, to whose wisdom and beneficence not only the existence of the orchestra is due. That this pair of concerts may recall to the patrons and to Major Higginson's friends and relatives the closest associations of seasons past, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has consulted Mrs. Higginson as to her husband's favorite pieces, and in co-operation with Mr. Monteux compiled the following programme of them:

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor.

Brahm's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and at 8 on Saturday evening the doors will be closed until the end of Schubert's Symphony.

Globe 18

SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN MEMORY OF BENEFACTOR

A special program has been arranged for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night to be devoted to the memory of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, to whose wisdom and beneficence not only the eminence, but the existence of the orchestra is due.

That this pair of concerts may recall to the patrons, and to Maj Higginson's friends and relatives, the closest associations of seasons past, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, consulted Mrs Higginson as to her husband's favorite pieces, and, in cooperation with Mr Monteux, compiled the following program of them: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Brahms' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in B flat, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At 2:30 Friday afternoon and at 8 Saturday night the doors will be closed until the end of Schubert's Symphony.

Herald 18

CONCERT NOTES

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week will be in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. The program will consist of three of his favorite compositions: Beethoven, Symphony No. 5; Schubert, unfinished symphony; Brahms, piano concerto No. 2.

Aurelio Giorni, pianist, has changed

Herald Nov. 20

CONCERTS AND LECTURES

Symphony concert in memory of Maj. Higginson tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Brahms, Piano Concerto, No. 2; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5. Felix Fox will be the pianist.

Post Nov. 18

MAJ. HIGGINSON'S FEAR IN HIS YOUTH

Said He Had It in Him to Be a Miser—His One Interest in Founding the Orchestra

BY OLIN DOWNES

"As every one has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better," wrote Henry L. Higginson, in his 23d year, from Vienna, to his father, George Higginson, in America.

The younger Higginson was then a student, and a very serious one, of music. He had taken leave of Harvard, had entered business, and had then gone to Europe in 1856, where he stayed for four years, spending most of his time in assiduous study of the art he loved.

REFUSED TO BECOME MISER

He had even at that time an unusually full realization of the need of music in the daily life and of its invaluable educational influence. He realized that he would be a good business man, but "trade," as he said in another letter, "was not satisfying to the inner man as a life occupation." And again: "What is money good for if not to spend for one's friends and to help them? You've done so all your life—let me do so, too, while I can, for it is in me (I have always known it) to be a close man, a miser. I know about this." These letters are quoted from M. A. DeWolfe Howe's history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The day came when Henry Lee Higginson and the world discovered that his ability in business was in no way incompatible with his public spirit and his love of art. It was, as a matter of fact, the combination of practical energy and the ability to dream a great thing which brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra into existence and developed it into one of the famous organizations in the world.

Famed Throughout Europe

Those who have travelled in Europe can almost, without exception, relate a meeting with some European who might labor under the impression that Indians took scalps in the streets of Chicago or that Mr. Carnegie used a gold toothpick, but who knew of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and the city whose name it bore, as they knew of Niagara Falls and one or two other wonders of this continent.

In Vienna the young Higginson, with but a slender reserve of money at his disposal, economized severely, gave lessons in English ("but it is very hard to compete with the Germans, who will work for 25 to 50 cents an hour, which I cannot do") and slaved at his music. Not everyone knows that the financier, soldier and patriot, whose name is connected with all kinds of practical public labors, worked so hard at the piano that he lamed an arm and shoulder which lost him five months of practice. Such was the fact. Suffering from a severe headache for days, he was bled, eight ounces of blood taken from his left arm, and this, combined with the muscular strain to which he had been subjected, resulted in a long period of discouragement and disability.

Did His Part for Flag

When he returned to America in 1860 Henry Higginson put aside his music, became a cavalryman in the Civil war, advancing to a majority, and carried to his grave a sabre-scar won in battle. This is a fact which might have been more generally remembered when the unfortunate misunderstanding regarding the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra arose. Major Higginson did not at that time or any other rush into print with protestations of patriotism, but he followed the flag he loved in his youth as our young men of today have followed it in theirs, and he should not have been made the butt of those eager for self-advertisement and of fals friends who added to his distress in sorrowful time.

Years after the war and following various successful business ventures Mr. Higginson decided to establish in Boston a Symphony Orchestra. Writing of his intention to one he held dear, he said, "I can drop business now, retire, and lead a life of comparative leisure; or I can continue to work and by my earnings establish an orchestra. This has been the dream of my life. I should like to do it if you agree with me."

Its Mission to the Poor

The story of the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been thrice told. From the beginnings in 1881, when George Henschel was the conductor, to the end of the season of 1916-1917, Major Higginson not only continued his business, the proceeds of which went in a large measure to the development of the orchestra which was to him, as he put it, what yachts and racing stables were to other men of wealth, but cheerfully footed each season deficits which were almost always heavy, and on some occasions amounted to fully $50,000.

His one intent, his one goal, was the establishment and endowment of an orchestra inferior to none, and measures whereby this orchestra could minister to the artistic and spiritual needs of the greatest possible number of people. Today, as in the early years, there remain the top balcony seats for the concerts which go at 25 cents each, and the number of music lovers and students who have benefitted by this arrangement for 39 seasons is not easily to be estimated.

Conductor Is Supreme

From the beginning, the business management of the orchestra was as responsible as the unswerving artistic ideals of the founder for its success. Very soon Major Higginson realized that the financial part of the undertaking must be clearly and definitely separated from the artistic direction. Hence the solid and conservative management of the affairs of the orchestra, hence the longing of the greatest conductors, as the years went by, for the appointment as leader of the Boston Symphony. They longed for the position, not merely because the musical honor which it conferred upon them, but because there is probably no musical position in the world in which a conductor finds himself with such artistic resources, with every need for musical production gratified almost before it is made known, and with absolute musical authority. No business policies hamper the conductor of the Boston Symphony. No expense is spared to give him whatever he needs for the good of the concerts, and his word, in all matters affecting the artistic concerns of the organization, is undisputed and supreme. That is the result of the practical business sense and the true idealism of the man who while in his twenties wrote his father that "he had it in him to be a miser," and didn't want to be and wouldn't.

Trans. Nov. 20

After Mr. Bauer and Mr. Powell ... both declined so difficult a task, a pia... ist, Felix Fox, has at last been fou... willing to undertake the solo part ... Brahms's long and intricate concerto ... B flat. Accordingly he will play it at ... Symphony Concerts in memory of the ... Mr. Higginson on Friday and Saturd... next. Meanwhile Mr. Monteux is "labor... as valiantly with the preparation for ... occasion—and in three short days—of ... concerto, Schubert's Unfinished Symph... and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Trans. Nov. 18

Items and Incidents

The promising pieces proposed for the Symphony Concerts of this week have been put by for the time, to make way for a "memorial programme" of music that the late Mr. Higginson, as founder and sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra, heard with high pleasure, viz.: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Brahms's second concerto for piano and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Upon second thought Mr. Bauer, announced to play the solo part in the concerto, has wisely declined so difficult a task at so short a notice, and a pianist has still to be found for it.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MISS JANACOPULOS AND SUNDRY RUSSIANS

"The New Singing" as Exhibited by a Much-Heralded Singer at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge—Two Vivid Pieces from Musorgsky—Programmes at Hand—Other Impending Joys

To the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge last evening came as "assisting artist" for the first time hereabouts Miss Vera Janacopulos, thrice heralded—for comeliness, for abilities as a "dramatic" singer, for play of personality. The first of her virtues was independent of the pieces that she sang, but as with the other two, the proof did not altogether sustain it. Her dark, deep-set eyes, her fair white face, the ebon and lustrous hair that frame it are good to see; they suggest an emotional, a communicative temperament; but forthwith a somewhat squatty figure clouds this pleasure of the eye. Like Miss Novaes, the pianist, Miss Janacopulos is of South-American origin; and characteristically in both, while the features charm, the form disillusions. Both, however, are primarily to be heard, not seen, and to that end the singer chose four Russian songs—from Musorgsky, "Death the Commander," and "Gathering Mushrooms"; from Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Rose Has Charmed the Nightingale"; from Porodin, "The Sleeping Princess." Three of these songs Miss Janacopulos sang in the original text—a sore handicap to her hearers, since to most of them, even had her diction been clearer, Russian is a strange and seemingly ugly tongue. Only in the French verse to Borodin's music did listening ear meet imparting voice. Miss Janacopulos sang all four pieces also to orchestral accompaniment—whether by the composer or by some other hand, even the learned and inquiring "programmist" did not deign, except in one instance, to say. That instance was the song of Rimsky-Korsakov for which the supposedly raucous and thunderous Mr. Prokofiev had made an orchestral setting lovely in grace of long-drawn, undulating line, quick with harmonic and instrumental imagination, subtle and penetrating in oriental savor. So does "a terrible infant" (as he is represented) coo from the cradle of Rimsky's song. The other settings were serviceable and sympathetic, but as they came and went in the swift commerce of the concert-hall they made little individual impression.

Rimsky's song, relatively familiar, is one more instance of the extended, exfoliating, scroll-like melody that he drew from the East, charged with sensuous voice, inflected with the very quiver of the flesh and led into the music of the West—strange, new, pungent, irresistible. Borodin's song—of the spell-bound princess awaiting in the forest the touch of the releasing lover—illudes likewise by sensuous quality, atmospheric suggestion and adroit detail set lightly upon soft and flowing line. In contrast, Musorgsky's pieces are of another substance and texture, voice and implication. As always he writes with his eye upon the object in the directest of imagery, in the nakedest of utterance. The picture he would summon, the emotion he would evoke impinge sharply, unsparingly upon the hearer. Both Miss Janacopulos's songs, as it happened, also exemplify his ironic vein, his sardonic innuendo.

In one, "Gathering Mushrooms," Musorgsky seems ostensibly to be utilizing a folk-tune—such a ditty as a hawker might sing as she wandered the town selling her wares, sprightly, keenly rhythmic, abounding in the short, "snappy" phrase and figure of not a little of his music. But she who has gathered the mushrooms is wed to a hateful old man. Would that a rotten mushroom might poison him! Would that she might then spread her couch for a lover! And through the chirping ditty of the street leers this vindictive or sensual innuendo. The other piece is one of Musorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death," his uncompleted "cycle" to set Mortality in array in tones as mediæval artists limned it in series of etchings or wood-cuts—Death trapping the peasant in wintry storm with feint of summer; Death closing icy fingers upon the child to whom the mother croons; Death stifling the maiden with his serenade and, finally, "Death the Commander"—"Chef d'Armée" is the truer French title—stalking the field of battle when the combat of the day is done, reviewing the fallen, dooming them to eternal oblivion. "Soon will be gone remembrance of you." In Musorgsky's sharp sequences of reiterated, clashing, propulsive figures, is the din of the conflict. Ghastly, almost, falls the quiet of night. Then through the tones strides the baleful figure, then speaks the mordant tongue. Sardonic, Death marshals his review. The music streams with a stripped, graphic, bitter imagery. Power distributes, directs the flood.

Essaying these pieces—for the most part rare comers and rare pleasure in the concert-hall—Miss Janacopulos followed the ways of what the admiring Mr. van Vechten likes to call the "new singing." That is to say, she seemed to have but one end in view—so to color her tones, so to produce and project them that they would work and enhance the illusion of music and verse. The quality of the tone in itself little concerned her so long as it made the impression sought, designed and emphasized. No more did she heed the means by which it was produced so long as it was the tone desired. Full tilt should her projecting, her characterizing power play through the music to drive that music home. At need, she would deliver the tonal blow "straight from the shoulder," at will she could summon the polished, the artful tonal stroke.

In this singing, Miss Janacopulos gained the [illegible] beauty, the languorous progressions of Rimsky-Korsakov's melody and [illegible] fanciful visioning, set it as in a magical haze of tonal coloring. Then was her "new singing" nearest to the finesse, the vocal virtue of the old. Yet even so, her intensities, controlled though they were, seemed sometimes to squeeze too hard intrinsically light musics. Again with Musorgsky's song of Death, Miss Janacopulos gained such graphic power as dwells in vehemence, but it is possible to conceive the music (which is keen-edged as well as direct) sung with more sardonic subtlety. Musorgsky's Death is not merely truculent and triumphant; he is also crafty and ironic. So urgent a composer as he yet leaves something to the imagination. The singer less trusted her hearers. She was nearer to Musorgsky when she sustained the rhythm, interlocked the phrase, held to the folk-song note of "Gathering Mushrooms," yet flashed through this vocal nonchalance the sinister innuendo within. The wise in the art of song say that the "new singing" has vocal consequences. Probably, since human throats are human throats, it does. Along the way it has also an intensifying power. Miss Janacopulos exhibited it.

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux has set no symphony upon his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a pleasing departure from routine. The listed pieces also include two in which he led in his years with the Russian Ballet—Balakirev's tone-poem of sensual and sardonic Russian legend, "Thamar" and the suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," first played here under Dr. Muck. A Concerto Grosso for strings by Händel with solo parts for the leaders of the several choirs will preface these numbers; while between them for novelty stands Dukas's overture to "Polyeucte," Corneille's tragedy of Christian martyrs and Roman persecutors.

The concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next, at which the Symphony Orchestra will play for its own Pension Fund is not one of the usual entertainments on that day in that place. Contrary to custom on those occasions, 3 and not 3.30 will be the hour for beginning; no extra numbers will be played, and there will be no supplementary concert. Music, not personalities, is actually to have an inning on a Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Malkin, long the first violoncellist of the Boston Orchestra and now in like place in Mr. Stock's band in Chicago, was well received when as "soloist" he played Lalo's concerto at its concerts last week. "His interpretation was poetic," writes Mr. Hackett in The Evening Post, "his tone was rich and he gave the delicate embroidery a surety of touch that made it most graceful. . . . In fine he established himself an artist worthy of his important position in the orchestra." Bostonian plaudits were not always so warm. H. T. PARKER

AS NEW YORK HEARD IT

D'Indy's War-Time Symphony Played by Mr. Damrosch's Orchestra—Music Received and Judged Much as It Was in Boston

HAD Mr. Monteux chosen so to do, he could have included d'Indy's war-time symphony in one of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in New York last week. Instead, he resigned the first performances of the piece in the American capital of music to Mr. Damrosch. They befell last week, prefaced, according to the conductor's custom, with explanations purporting to come from conversations with the composer himself. In New York as in Boston the audience heard the music with interest but gave no sign that it made deep or warm impression. In turn, the reviewers, so far as their articles are available this morning, seem to judge it much as did the commentators here at home. Mr. Aldrich, for example, writes in The Times:

> Themes in the first movement suggest the call to arms; there are march rhythms, a military character. Harsh bugle-calls interrupt the course of the scherzo. In the slow movement a theme of "brutal ugliness," as Mr. Damrosch's analysis calls it, appears to typify the Germans. There is a triumphant march movement in the last with piercing fanfares of high trumpet tones and the sounds of tumultuous rejoicing. There is an attempt to portray in music the anguish, the heroism of the French.
>
> It would be hardly necessary to say of music by d'Indy that there is an evident intention to get beneath the more obvious and extraneous representations of war as they have conventionally appeared in music. He does not deal in "Battles of Prague" or "Wellington's Victories." Yet this symphony, as a product of the great convulsion which was expected to move creative artists to new flights, is disappointing. There are beauties in it, as in the introduction, in which Mr. Damrosch sees the happiness of peace brooding over France; pages of the slow movement are deeply felt and emotionally expressive; the scherzo, with its folk-song character—but it does not seem always French—is enlivening. The last movement, notwithstanding its elaboration and its orchestral brilliancy, seems more commonplace; and, indeed, the composer has not avoided commonplace in more than one extended passage in even his more successful movements. There is much of the skilful and convincing craftsmanship that is to be expected in d'Indy's work. But there is also evidence that less of mature reflection, less of purely artistic concentration have gone into the making of this symphony than into other works of the composer's maturity. There are joints, dislocations in the musical thought. The music in places does not "hang together' unerringly in d'Indy's manner. The stress of emotion under which this symphony was composed can be appreciated, but it has not brought forth music that will enhance the composer's reputation or that is worthy to rank with his best artistic production.

In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel plies a heavy humor upon d'Indy's music, but in the main it disappoints him:

> We confess our inability to recognize either French or German characteristics in the themes. We are speaking hurriedly, of course, and after an insufficient acquaintance with the piece, but to us it seemed that either the French or the Germans, we don't know which, had passed through both Ireland and Africa and cultivated a taste for rattlety-bang percusison instruments and syncopations quite as violent as that of Percy Grainger. In the slow movement there is a section which Mr. Damrosch describes as brutally ugly and which, he said, d'Indy admitted, characterizes the invaders.
>
> The French critic, Fernand le Borne, says that the theme is "close kin to the motive of the Jew in d'Indy's 'St. Christopher.'" We never heard or saw this saintly music and therefore do not know what the French writer meant. We are equally in the dark as to why any kind of a Jew should be dragged, even by suggestion, into a war between modern Teuton and modern Gaul. Le Borne also calls the melody which soars triumphantly over the tumult in the final movement the victorious theme of St. Michael. This theme is permitted to lacerate sensitive ears when sung by a "little trumpet in D" at the end. We had no idea that St. Michael blew a horn (euphemism for trumpet') so brutally. He was commander-in-chief of the angels which drove the rebellious angels out of heaven, but Longfellow tells us that prudence was one of his gifts to man, and prudence implies moderation.
>
> But we fear we are inquiring too curiously when we inquire so. The obvious things about the symphony are that it is short; that it is full of excellent craftsmanship, which would, perhaps, be considered deplorably conservative if it came from a professor of the Conservatory, but is quite the proper thing from the head of the Schola Cantorum. We are also inclined to think that when he was younger d'Indy made better musical pictures of German soldiery in his "Wallenstein" than he did of French soldiery in this symphony. But the new music is interesting, and one ought to hear it several times before presuming to pass any kind of judgment upon it.

NEXT CONCERT IN MEMORIAM

Higginson's Favorite Pieces to Be Played

A special programme has been arranged for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening to be devoted to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, to whose wisdom and beneficence not only the eminence but the existence of the orchestra is due. That this pair of concerts may recall to the patrons and to Major Higginson's friends and relatives the closest associations of seasons past, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has consulted Mrs. Higginson as to her husband's favorite pieces, and in cooperation with Mr. Monteux compiled the following programme of them:

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor.

Brahm's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and at 8 on Saturday evening the doors will be closed until the end of Schubert's Symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN MEMORY OF BENEFACTOR

A special program has been arranged for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night to be devoted to the memory of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, to whose wisdom and beneficence not only the eminence, but the existence of the orchestra is due.

That this pair of concerts may recall to the patrons, and to Maj Higginson's friends and relatives, the closest associations of seasons past, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, consulted Mrs Higginson as to her husband's favorite pieces, and, in cooperation with Mr Monteux, compiled the following program of them: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Brahms' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in B flat, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At 2:30 Friday afternoon and at 8 Saturday night the doors will be closed until the end of Schubert's Symphony.

CONCERT NOTES

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week will be in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. The program will consist of three of his favorite compositions: Beethoven. Symphony No. 5; Schubert, unfinished symphony; Brahms, piano concerto No. 2.

Aurelio Giorni, pianist, has changed

CONCERTS AND LECTURES

Symphony concert in memory of Maj. Higginson tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Brahms, Piano Concerto, No. 2; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5. Felix Fox will be the pianist.

MAJ. HIGGINSON'S FEAR IN HIS YOUTH

Said He Had It in Him to Be a Miser—His One Interest in Founding the Orchestra

BY OLIN DOWNES

"As every one has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better," wrote Henry L. Higginson, in his 23d year, from Vienna, to his father, George Higginson, in America.

The younger Higginson was then a student, and a very serious one, of music. He had taken leave of Harvard, had entered business, and had then gone to Europe in 1856, where he stayed for four years, spending most of his time in assiduous study of the art he loved.

REFUSED TO BECOME MISER

He had even at that time an unusually full realization of the need of music in the daily life and of its invaluable educational influence. He realized that he would be a good business man, but "trade," as he said in another letter, "was not satisfying to the inner man as a life occupation." And again: "What is money good for if not to spend for one's friends and to help them? You've done so all your life—let me do so, too, while I can, for it is in me (I have always known it) to be a close man, a miser. I know about this." These letters are quoted from M. A. DeWolfe Howe's history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The day came when Henry Lee Higginson and the world discovered that his ability in business was in no way incompatible with his public spirit and his love of art. It was, as a matter of fact, the combination of practical energy and the ability to dream a great thing which brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra into existence and developed it into one of the famous organizations in the world.

Famed Throughout Europe

Those who have travelled in Europe can almost, without exception, relate a meeting with some European who might labor under the impression that Indians took scalps in the streets of Chicago or that Mr. Carnegie used a gold toothpick, but who knew of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and the city whose name it bore, as they knew of Niagara Falls and one or two other wonders of this continent.

In Vienna the young Higginson, with but a slender reserve of money at his disposal, economized severely, gave lessons in English ("but it is very hard to compete with the Germans, who will work for 25 to 50 cents an hour, which I cannot do") and slaved at his music. Not everyone knows that the financier, soldier and patriot, whose name is connected with all kinds of practical public labors, worked so hard at the piano that he lamed an arm and shoulder which lost him five months of practice. Such was the fact. Suffering from a severe headache for days, he was bled, eight ounces of blood taken from his left arm, and this, combined with the muscular strain to which he had been subjected, resulted in a long period of discouragement and disability.

Did His Part for Flag

When he returned to America in 1860 Henry Higginson put aside his music, became a cavalryman in the Civil war, advancing to a majority, and carried to his grave a sabre-scar won in battle. This is a fact which might have been more generally remembered when the unfortunate misunderstanding regarding the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra arose. Major Higginson did not at that time or any other rush into print with protestations of patriotism, but he followed the flag he loved in his youth as our young men of today have followed it in theirs, and he should not have been made the butt of those eager for self-advertisement and of fals friends who added to his distress in sorrowful time.

Years after the war and following various successful business ventures Mr. Higginson decided to establish in Boston a Symphony Orchestra. Writing of his intention to one he held dear, he said, "I can drop business now, retire, and lead a life of comparative leisure; or I can continue to work and by my earnings establish an orchestra. This has been the dream of my life. I should like to do it if you agree with me."

Its Mission to the Poor

The story of the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been thrice told. From the beginnings in 1881, when George Henschel was the conductor, to the end of the season of 1916-1917, Major Higginson not only continued his business, the proceeds of which went in a large measure to the development of the orchestra which was to him, as he put it, what yachts and racing stables were to other men of wealth, but cheerfully footed each season deficits which were almost always heavy, and on some occasions amounted to fully $50,000.

His one intent, his one goal, was the establishment and endowment of an orchestra inferior to none, and measures whereby this orchestra could minister to the artistic and spiritual needs of the greatest possible number of people. Today, as in the early years, there remain the top balcony seats for the concerts which go at 25 cents each, and the number of music lovers and students who have benefitted by this arrangement for 39 seasons is not easily to be estimated.

Conductor Is Supreme

From the beginning, the business management of the orchestra was as responsible as the unswerving artistic ideals of the founder for its success. Very soon Major Higginson realized that the financial part of the undertaking must be clearly and definitely separated from the artistic direction. Hence the solid and conservative management of the affairs of the orchestra, hence the longing of the greatest conductors, as the years went by, for the appointment as leader of the Boston Symphony. They longed for the position, not merely because the musical honor which it conferred upon them, but because there is probably no musical position in the world in which a conductor finds himself with such artistic resources, with every need for musical production gratified almost before it is made known, and with absolute musical authority. No business policies hamper the conductor of the Boston Symphony. No expense is spared to give him whatever he needs for the good of the concerts, and his word, in all matters affecting the artistic concerns of the organization, is undisputed and supreme. That is the result of the practical business sense and the true idealism of the man who while in his twenties wrote his father that "he had it in him to be a miser," and didn't want to be and wouldn't.

After Mr. Bauer and Mr. Powell [illegible] both declined so difficult a task, a pianist, Félix Fox, has at last been found willing to undertake the solo part in Brahms's long and intricate concerto in B flat. Accordingly he will play it at the Symphony Concerts in memory of the late Mr. Higginson on Friday and Saturday next. Meanwhile Mr. Monteux is laboring as valiantly with the preparation for the occasion—and in three short days—of the concerto, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Items and Incidents

The promising pieces proposed for the Symphony Concerts of this week have been put by for the time, to make way for a "memorial programme" of music that the late Mr. Higginson, as founder and sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra, heard with high pleasure, viz.: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Brahms's second concerto for piano and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Upon second thought Mr. Bauer, announced to play the solo part in the concerto, has wisely declined so difficult a task at so short a notice, and a pianist has still to be found for it.

Post Nov 17

MISS BRARD ACCLAIMED A VIRTUOSO

Wins Signal Triumph at Pension Fund Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was packed for the occasion.

The orchestral compositions were Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Madeleine Brard, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and now in her 16th year, played the Saint-Saens G-minor piano concerto.

WINS DESERVED TRIUMPH

Of this work Miss Brard, who was wildly applauded, gave a very brilliant performance. The music had sparkle, piquancy and great rythmic life. Miss Brard has not only the fingers, she has the temperament of the virtuoso, the ability to excite an audience by the spirit and bravura of her playing. Qualities such as these are inherent in Saint-Saens' concerto.

This concerto has other qualities, too, in the opening movement, and it would be possible to take issue with Miss Brard concerning the playing of the more lyrical motives. But this is a detail and partly a matter of taste. Miss Brard won a deserved triumph. She played with musicianship, as well as lightness, accuracy, speed. However rapid the tempo, she never lost her grip on herself. Excellent schooling rather than strong individuality is now naturally in the ascendancy, so far as her interpretation is concerned, but this schooling she has assimilated. She knows why as well what she plays. She was heard to the best advantage in the second movement, which she played with exceptional grace and esprit, and in the dashing finale, after which she was recalled five or six times.

Tschaikowsky's Master Work

It is the custom in these days for the superfine musicians to decry the Tschaikowsky of the sixth or "Pathetique" symphony. These people disdain what they feel to be the coarseness and frequent ineptitudes of Tschaikowsky in his expression of overwhelming emotion. The sixth symphony was for years the great favorite of all of Tschaikowsky's symphonic works. Then it was played too much. Then weary reviewers came to prefer either the fourth or the fifth symphonies to the sixth. It is not easy for one reviewer, anyhow, to agree with them. For him, the Symphonic Pathetique remains, in point of musical inspiration, richness of workmanshipp and originality and unconventionality of form, Tschaikowsky's greatest symphonic achievement. Who has produced symphonic music more profound in its feeling than the finale of lamentation? What in modern music matches in elemental power and reckless fury the march, which is as if the hordes of all Asia were causing the earth to tremble at their mighty tread?

But there are those to whom this wild, defiant music is "coarse," "unrefined," and so on. To some, art must wear not only long skirts, but kid gloves! There are criticisms easily recognized as legitimate and logical of the first two movements; but the great passages in both of these movements will stand criticism for many years before they will yield place to works of sophisticated intellectuality or hyper-refinement, to which they are at present disadvantageously compared.

Should Be Heard Oftener

The "Symphonie Pathetique" should be played not only at Pension Fund concerts, as has been the case in late seasons, but also at the subscription concerts of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings.

At the Pension Fund concerts, the public which is too busy or too full of cares during the week to listen to symphonic music attends with profound enjoyment performances by one of the greatest orchestras of orchestral masterpieces. The poignant music of Wagner and the great overture of Rossini thrilled the audience, which applauded the orchestra as well as the soloist to the echo.

Nov 17

BOSTON HERALD, MON

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Gives Its 33d Performance of the Kind

GIRL PIANIST WINS GREAT TRIUMPH

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Orchestra gave its first Pension Fund concert for this season and the 33d in the whole list of them. The soloist was Magdeleine Brard, the youthful pianist from France, who has won extraordinary praise for her playing in New York and other cities, since she came to America last year.

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Brard's number was Saint-Saens's G Minor Concerto No. 2.

The hall was crowded, with many standing. A subdued air of solemnity overcast the throng and the orchestra owing to the death of Maj. Higginson. There was some speculation whether an extra number would be played as a tribute to his memory, but this was hardly necessary, for the depth of lamentation in the final movement of Tschaikowsky's symphony and much of the music in the Wagner number were as appropriate as any musical memorial of the orchestra's founder and sustainer could have been. It was as if a prophetic inspiration had guided the choice of these two numbers for yesterday's concert. It is doubtful if either work was ever played with deeper or more poignant feeling.

Miss Brard's appearance and playing proved to be a revelation. It provided astonishment, admiration and abounding pleasure. As she came on the stage spectators gasped to see a little girl with wavy, unrestrained locks, dressed in a young misses' short white frock, come forward with the unconscious grace of a well-bred child and seat herself at the piano. One was reminded of the picture of the boy Mozart discovered at midnight at his spinet.

Then she began to play and the wonder grew and kept growing as the brilliance and power and intricacy of the concerto developed. Here plainly was no slip of a girl, no infant prodigy, but a youthful artist with marvellous skill, uncommon power, commanding surety in every ripple, trill or run and seeming maturity in feeling and expression. Old hands at piano concerts began to sit up and take notice as the finish, the lightness and firmness and tenderness of touch and emotion were revealed in the opening andante movement.

Then came the allegretto and zip! the little girl's audience was transported to a fairy wood filled with dancing and whirling sprites and gnomes and butterflies and darting birds and flashing waterfalls and a shimmering mystic light "n everything like that."

And the little girl was not playing any piano, just leading the whole big throng, orchestra men and all, in an elfin whirl, drawing them along with her and the fairies by the spell of some magical music with which she filled the wood, the trees, their dancing leaves, the nodding flowers and the spray of fountains.

In the final presto movement strong winds blew away the sprites and the gossamer butterflies and tore the leaves with great gusts and the little lady's followers were tossed about by the power and splendor of her mastery of music. Here, as in the fairy dance, the girlish mistress of their spirits compelled obedience without a show of effort. She seemed to be doing nothing at all special, just filling the air with irresistible rhythm and harmony of which she was a living part. When she ended and the spell was broken there came a tornado of applause so sweeping and continuous that it threatened to smash the stone tablets of the ancient law against "extras" at a symphony concert. But it didn't.

rance. I've wondered and wondered ow the judges ever selected little e.

"My government has sent me to merica, you know. They call me eir 'representative artist,' though m sure I've never earned so proud title.

"The real reason that my friends ove my music is because I love it o myself. I practice for hours and ours every single blessed day, and it's the most fun I've ever had. They ell me that some girls hate to practice, but it isn't really so, is it?

"I think that American girls are o nice, and so pretty. Though I visited the States on tour last year, had so little time to make friends. This year I hope that I'll meet lots and lots of people.

"Won't you tell Boston folk that I appreciate so much the wondrous ovation they gave me, and that I do hope I may play again for them soon?"

Globe Nov 17

GIRL SENSATION OF PENSION CONCERT

Miss Brard, 16, Mature and Skillful Pianist

Magdeleine Brard's performance of Saint-Saens' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor at yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra created a very unusual sensation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra joined enthusiastically in the violent and prolonged applause. She was recalled no less than six times at the end. There were cries of "Bravo" from the audience and she was given a bouquet from the orchestra. No debut in recent years has scored such great and well deserved success with a Symphony concert audience. What is more significant, no soloist within recent memory has ever been so applauded by the members of the orchestra itself.

There were murmurs of surprise in the audience when she first came on the stage. She is actually 16 but looks considerably younger. The solo passage at the beginning of the first movement, however, showed at once that she was not the "infant prodigy" her childish appearance betokened, but a player of mature strength, poise and skill, fairly comparable with men like Hofmann and Rachmaninoff.

Her playing has a breadth, force and dignity very rare in the performance of feminine pianists. Her massive chords and brilliant passage work are like those of the best male performers, rather than the work of a talented girl.

If there are three or four men living who could surpass her in passages where controlled strength is required, there is no one who could improve on her performance of the "Allegretto Scherzando" of this concerto. It has been heard here many times, but no one has ever come anywhere near equalling her interpretation of it.

She has the crisp phrasing, the firm yet delicate touch and the beautiful singing tone needed for an ideal performance. Best of all she does not sentimentalize, and yet is never academic. As a pupil of Cortot and a winner of a "first prize" at the Paris Conservatory she has, of course, been admirably trained. But only phenomenal ability could make it possible for a mere child to play as she does.

She is to be ranked with the youthful Hofmann and with Heifetz as an example of a young player whose performance is never immature. Her future appearances in Boston will be eagerly awaited by everyone who was lucky enough to hear her yesterday.

The rest of the concert brought routine performances of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and of the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," which is "not of an age, but for all time."

A brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which wears on the whole better than most of Tschaikowsky, was the concluding number.

Miss Brard More Than a Prodigy, Says Elson

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE week began very strongly with a pension fund concert, given by our orchestra in Symphony Hall, last Sunday afternoon. As if by prescience M. Monteux had placed Tschaikowsky's symphony of struggle and death on the program, and, while the "Pathetique" was being played, every auditor dedicated it to the memory of the noble founder of the orchestra, who had just passed away. The work brought memories of Mr. Emil Paur, who used to interpret it with our orchestra in an unapproachable manner. In this performance it was not so graphic, except in the third movement, which was performed with a truly barbaric fervor which suited its fierce military vein excellently. The "Tristan and Isolde" selection was very welcome, as indicating a restoration; the king has come into his own again. The "Wm. Tell Overture" was also brilliantly interpreted.

But the most marked success of the concert was the Boston debut of Madeleine Brard, a young miss of sixteen, who is more than a prodigy, who is in some respects a finished artist. She played St. Saens' G minor piano concerto, a work which has entirely dethroned Mendelssohn's concerto in the same key. She played it not as a well-learned lesson, but as well as any artist who has given it in Boston, not excepting the composer himself.

Yet in spite of all the fire that scintillated in the finale, we found the dainty Scherzo the chief glory of her performance. Here there was crisp delicacy and a hearty abandon that was elfin in character and must have aroused the most blase auditor.

We must hear her in more varied works before we can judge of her full scope, but that here is a great artist in embryo, a second Teresa Carrena, is certain. The young artist was recalled endlessly with wild enthusiasm. What with Rosita Renard a couple of weeks ago, and this young phenomenon last Sunday, the French young ladies are certainly in the limelight, and the Paris Conservatoire, from which both graduated, is proving that it has great piano teachers.

ail Girl of 16 as Musical Marvel'

YMPHONY patrons gasped when a small young person advanced upon their exclusive stage, aking her black curls, and primly ranging her short, white skirts, she t herself at the piano. Like the ld Mozart discovered at his spinet, e fingered the keys.

Then she began to play. Magdeine Brard, Parisian pianist, had ade her Boston debut. And, as she ayed, the wonder grew. Like fairy ings her little fingers flitted across e keys. Famous musicians leaned rward that they might not miss a ote. Critics gasped. And as agedeleine Brard played the tension ew.

Never in the history of the Boston ymphony concerts has a performer ade so profound an impression as e little French pianist. In a blaze glory she has left us. But the emory of her recital will linger roughout the seasons of many ymphonies.

Though hailed today as the greatst prodigy of the piano since the hildhood days of Josef Hofmann, ittle Mademoiselle Brard is as harmingly unaffected as a country chool girl. Her youthful freshness uite contradicts the impression one ained at Symphony.

Before sailing for New York last Winter, Magdeleine played for the benefit of the Red Cross at Bordeaux. General Winfield Scott, U. S. A., who was stationed there, was so delighted with her performance that he removed one of the stars from his shoulder and pinned it on the coat of the little lady whose genius had so charmed him.

The little girl in knee-length skirts laughed delightedly at the recollection.

"Don't you just love Yankee soldiers?" she questioned naively. "I adore them."

Modestly Mademoiselle recounted the tale of her triumphs. "I was fourteen," she said, "when the Prix d'Honneur was awarded me. I'm still terribly excited about it, for it's the highest prize the Conservatoire can bestow, you know. I was twelve when the Conservatoire gave me my first prize, and thirteen when I received the Prize of Excellence. All the awards were unanimous and covered by the greatest pianists in

MLLE. BRARD, PIANIST, WHO WON TRIUMPH IN BOSTON

No performer has ever created a more profound impression on an audience here than the little French girl who has achieved success on two continents.

Post Nov 17

MISS BRARD ACCLAIMED A VIRTUOSO

Wins Signal Triumph at Pension Fund Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was packed for the occasion.

The orchestral compositions were Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Madeleine Brard, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, now in her 16th year, played [illegible] G-minor piano concerto.

WINS DESERVED TRIUMPH

Of this work Miss Brard, who was wildly applauded, gave a very brilliant performance. The music had sparkle, piquancy and great rythmic life. Miss Brard has not only the fingers, she has the temperament of the virtuoso, the ability to excite an audience by the spirit and bravura of her playing. Qualities such as these are inherent in Saint-Saens' concerto.

This concerto has other qualities, too, in the opening movement, and it would be possible to take issue with Miss Brard concerning the playing of the more lyrical motives. But this is a detail and partly a matter of taste. Miss Brard won a deserved triumph. She played with musicianship, as well as lightness, accuracy, speed. However rapid the tempo, she never lost her grip on herself. Excellent schooling rather than strong individuality is now naturally in the ascendancy, so far as her interpretation is concerned, but this schooling she has assimilated. She knows why as well what she plays. She was heard to the best advantage in the second movement, which she played with exceptional grace and esprit, and in the dashing finale, after which she was recalled five or six times.

Tschaikowsky's Master Work

It is the custom in these days for the superfine musicians to decry the Tschaikowsky of the sixth or "Pathetique" symphony. These people disdain what they feel to be the coarseness and frequent ineptitudes of Tschaikowsky in his expression of overwhelming emotion. The sixth symphony was for years the great favorite of all of Tschaikowsky's symphonic works. Then it was played too much. Then weary reviewers came to prefer either the fourth or the fifth symphonies to the sixth. It is not easy for one reviewer, anyhow, to agree with them. For him, the Symphonie Pathetique remains, in point of musical inspiration, richness of workmanship and originality and unconventionality of form, Tschaikowsky's greatest symphonic achievement. Who has produced symphonic music more profound in its feeling than the finale of lamentation? What in modern music matches in elemental power and reckless fury the march, which is as if the hordes of all Asia were causing the earth to tremble at their mighty tread?

But there are those to whom this wild, defiant music is "coarse," "unrefined," and so on. To some, art must wear not only long skirts, but kid gloves! There are criticisms easily recognized as legitimate and logical of the first two movements; but the great passages in both of these movements will stand criticism for many years before they will yield place to works of sophisticated intellectuality or hyper-refinement, to which they are at present disadvantageously compared.

Should Be Heard Oftener

The "Symphonie Pathetique" should be played not only at Pension Fund concerts, as has been the case in late seasons, but also at the subscription concerts of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings.

At the Pension Fund concerts, the public which is too busy or too full of cares during the week to listen to symphonic music attends with profound enjoyment performances by one of the greatest orchestras of orchestral masterpieces. The poignant music of Wagner and the great overture of Rossini thrilled the audience, which applauded the orchestra as well as the soloist to the echo.

Nov 17

BOSTON HERALD, MON

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Gives Its 33d Performance of the Kind

GIRL PIANIST WINS GREAT TRIUMPH

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Orchestra gave its first Pension Fund concert for this season and the 33d in the whole list of them. The soloist was Magdeleine Brard, the youthful pianist from France, who has won extraordinary praise for her playing in New York and other cities, since she came to America last year.

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Brard's number was Saint-Saens's G Minor Concerto No. 2.

The hall was crowded, with many standing. A subdued air of solemnity overcast the throng and the orchestra owing to the death of Maj. Higginson. There was some speculation whether an extra number would be played as a tribute to his memory, but this was hardly necessary, for the depth of lamentation in the final movement of Tschaikowsky's symphony and much of the music in the Wagner number were as appropriate as any musical memorial of the orchestra's founder and sustainer could have been. It was as if a prophetic inspiration had guided the choice of these two numbers for yesterday's concert. It is doubtful if either work was ever played with deeper or more poignant feeling.

Miss Brard's appearance and playing proved to be a revelation. It provided astonishment, admiration and abounding pleasure. As she came on the stage spectators gasped to see a little girl with wavy, unrestrained locks, dressed in a young misses' short white frock, come forward with the unconscious grace of a well-bred child and seat herself at the piano. One was reminded of the picture of the boy Mozart discovered at midnight at his spinet.

Then she began to play and the wonder grew and kept growing as the brilliance and power and intricacy of the concerto developed. Here plainly was no slip of a girl, no infant prodigy, but a youthful artist with marvellous skill, uncommon power, commanding surety in every ripple, trill or run and seeming maturity in feeling and expression. Old hands at piano concerts began to sit up and take notice as the finish, the lightness and firmness and tenderness of touch and emotion were revealed in the opening andante movement.

Then came the allegretto and zip! the little girl's audience was transported to a fairy wood filled with dancing and whirling sprites and gnomes and butterflies and darting birds and flashing waterfalls and a shimmering mystic light "a everything like that." And the little girl was not playing any piano, just leading the whole big throng, orchestra men and all, in an elfin whirl, drawing them along with her and the fairies by the spell of some magical music with which she filled the wood, the trees, their dancing leaves, the nodding flowers and the spray of fountains.

In the final presto movement strong winds blew away the sprites and the gossamer butterflies and tore the leaves with great gusts and the little lady's followers were tossed about by the power and splendor of her mastery of music. Here, as in the fairy dance, the girlish mistress of their spirits compelled obedience without a show of effort. She seemed to be doing nothing at all special, just filling the air with irresistible rhythm and harmony of which she was a living part. When she ended and the spell was broken there came a tornado of applause so sweeping and continuous that it threatened to smash the stone tablets of the ancient law against "extras" at a symphony concert. But it didn't.

[illegible]rance. I've wondered and wondered how the judges ever selected little me.

"My government has sent me to America, you know. They call me their 'representative artist,' though I'm sure I've never earned so proud a title.

"The real reason that my friends love my music is because I love it so myself. I practice for hours and hours every single blessed day, and it's the most fun I've ever had. They tell me that some girls hate to practice, but it isn't really so, is it?

"I think that American girls are so nice, and so pretty. Though I visited the States on tour last year, I had so little time to make friends. This year I hope that I'll meet lots and lots of people.

"Won't you tell Boston folk that I appreciate so much the wondrous ovation they gave me, and that I do hope I may play again for them soon?"

Globe Nov 17

GIRL SENSATION OF PENSION CONCERT

Miss Brard, 16, Mature and Skillful Pianist

Magdeleine Brard's performance of Saint-Saens' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor at yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra created a very unusual sensation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra joined enthusiastically in the violent and prolonged applause. She was recalled no less than six times at the end. There were cries of "Bravo" from the audience and she was given a bouquet from the orchestra. No debut in recent years has scored such great and well deserved success with a Symphony concert audience. What is more significant, no soloist within recent memory has ever been so applauded by the members of the orchestra itself.

There were murmurs of surprise in the audience when she first came on the stage. She is actually 16 but looks considerably younger. The solo passage at the beginning of the first movement, however, showed at once that she was not the "infant prodigy" her childish appearance betokened, but a player of mature strength, poise and skill, fairly comparable with men like Hofmann and Rachmaninoff.

Her playing has a breadth, force and dignity very rare in the performance of feminine pianists. Her massive chords and brilliant passage work are like those of the best male performers, rather than the work of a talented girl.

If there are three or four men living who could surpass her in passages where controlled strength is required, there is no one who could improve on her performance of the "Allegretto Scherzando" of this concerto. It has been heard here many times, but no one has ever come anywhere near equalling her interpretation of it.

She has the crisp phrasing, the firm yet delicate touch and the beautiful singing tone needed for an ideal performance. Best of all she does not sentimentalize, and yet is never academic. As a pupil of Cortot and a winner of a "first prize" at the Paris Conservatory she has, of course, been admirably trained. But only phenomenal ability could make it possible for a mere child to play as she does.

She is to be ranked with the youthful Hofmann and with Heifetz as an example of a young player whose performance is never immature. Her future appearances in Boston will be eagerly awaited by everyone who was lucky enough to hear her yesterday.

The rest of the concert brought routine performances of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and of the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," which is "not of an age, but for all time."

A brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which wears on the whole better than most of Tschaikowsky, was the concluding number. A very [illegible]

Adv. Nov 23

Miss Brard More Than a Prodigy, Says Elson

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE week began very strongly with a pension fund concert, given by our orchestra in Symphony Hall, last Sunday afternoon. As if by prescience M. Monteux had placed Tschaikowsky's symphony of struggle and death on the program, and, while the "Pathetique" was being played, every auditor dedicated it to the memory of the noble founder of the orchestra, who had just passed away. The work brought memories of Mr. Emil Paur, who used to interpret it with our orchestra in an unapproachable manner. In this performance it was not so graphic, except in the third movement, which was performed with a truly barbaric fervor which suited its fierce military vein excellently. The "Tristan and Isolde" selection was very welcome, as indicating a restoration: the king has come into his own again. The "Wm. Tell Overture" was also brilliantly interpreted.

But the most striking success of the concert was the Boston debut of Madeleine Brard, a young miss of sixteen, who is more than a prodigy, who is in some respects a finished artist. She played St. Saens' G minor piano concerto, a work which has entirely dethroned Mendelssohn's concerto in the same key. She played it not as a well-learned lesson, but as well as any artist who has given it in Boston, not excepting the composer himself.

Yet in spite of all the fire that scintillated in the finale, we found the fifty Scherzo the chief glory of her performance. Here there was crisp delicacy and a hearty abandon that was elfin in character and must have aroused the most blase auditor.

We must hear her in more varied works before we can judge of her [illegible] scope, but that here is a great artist in embryo, a second Teresa Carrena, is certain. The young artist was recalled endlessly with wild enthusiasm. What with Rosita Renard a couple of weeks ago and this young "phenomenon" last Sunday, the French young ladies are certainly in the lead[illegible], and the Paris Conservatoire, from which both graduated, is proving that it has great piano teachers.

Tall Girl of 16 as Musical Marvel

SYMPHONY patrons gasped when a small young person advanced upon their exclusive stage, shaking her black curls, and primly arranging her short, white skirts, she seated herself at the piano. Like the child Mozart discovered at his spinet, she fingered the keys.

Then she began to play. Magdeleine Brard, Parisian pianist, had made her Boston debut. And, as she played, the wonder grew. Like fairy wings her little fingers flitted across the keys. Famous musicians leaned forward that they might not miss a note. Critics gasped. And as Magdeleine Brard played the tension grew.

Never in the history of the Boston Symphony concerts has a performer made so profound an impression as the little French pianist. In a blaze of glory she has left us. But the memory of her recital will linger throughout the seasons of many symphonies.

Though hailed today as the greatest prodigy of the piano since the childhood days of Josef Hofmann, little Mademoiselle Brard is as charmingly unaffected as a country school girl. Her youthful freshness quite contradicts the impression one gained at Symphony.

Before sailing for New York last Winter, Magdeleine played for the benefit of the Red Cross at Bordeaux. General Winfield Scott, U. S. A., who was stationed there, was so delighted with her performance that he removed one of the stars from his shoulder and pinned it on the coat of the little lady whose genius had so charmed him.

The little girl in knee-length skirts laughed delightedly at the recollection.

"Don't you just love Yankee soldiers?" she questioned naively. "I adore them."

Modestly Mademoiselle recounted the tale of her triumphs. "I was fourteen," she said, "when the Prix d'Honneur was awarded me. I'm still terribly excited about it, for it's the highest prize the Conservatoire can bestow, you know. I was twelve when the Conservatoire gave me my first prize, and thirteen when I received the Prize of Excellence. All the awards were unanimous and covered by the greatest pianists in

MLLE. BRARD, PIANIST, WHO WON TRIUMPH IN BOSTON

No performer has ever created a more profound impression on an audience here than the little French girl who has achieved success on two continents.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 19 1919

Boston Impressions of the Boston Orchestra

Again the question of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor looms large in the musical world. Time was when its visits to the metropolis carried a definite guaranty of quality, both of orchestral playing and of conducting. Since, however, the passing of Dr. Muck and the reorganization of the band's personnel there has been in the mind of all music lovers the undeniable fear that the prestige of former years was a moribund quality.

This year Pierre Monteux, released from operatic duties at the Metropolitan, has succeeded to the post held all too briefly by Henri Rabaud. He made his first appearance as permanent conductor in two concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, a week ago, conducting the following program: Beethoven's Second Symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Catalonia" of Albeniz.

Boston's critical fraternity did not agree on the merits of conductor and orchestra. But they may speak for themselves. According to Phillip Hale in the Herald—

"Of all of Beethoven's symphonies, the second is the least interesting, the least characteristic, in 1919. The first pleases by its simplicity, by its relationship with the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart that preceded it. There are moments in the second that are unmistakably in the incomparable manner of the great Beethoven, but on the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of 'Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed.' The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful. Especially worthy of praise was the treatment of the Introduction, the Scherzo and the Finale. In the Larghetto there might have been more sustained passages of truly piano effect.

"Franck's symphonic poem was really heard here for the first time, although it had been played thrice at these concerts before yesterday. On previous occasions the expression of the supernatural seemed tame, almost timid. There was little suggestion of horror, terror, the demoniacal. One thought that good "Pere" Franck here, as in "The Beautitudes," was unable to express the satanic; that Weber's few measures accompanying the ride through the air of the demon hunter and his train in "Der Freischuetz" were far more imaginative than the many measures of Franck. Yet this demoniacal quality is in Franck's symphonic poem. It needed an imaginative, dramatic conductor to bring it out. As the music was played the other day the effect was well nigh overwhelming.

Debussy's exquisite Prelude has been a stumbling block to many conductors. Even Mr. Weingartner chose so sluggish a pace that the music was lifeless. Even Dr. Muck, singularly fortunate in his choice of tempi, erred in the same direction. The Prelude was never so beautiful as it was the other day, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbers, the prevailing, the solo

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

NOV 18

Evening Public Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

MR. FERIR has had a long and distinguished career as a viola player, having been solo viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a number of years before he came to Philadelphia, which was a little more than a year ago. He has had a large experience in string quartet work, having played in the quartet of Willy Hess and Anton Witek in Boston, while those violinists were filling the position of concertmeister of the Boston Symphony, and also in the Rich Quartet of this city, last year.

He is one of the few men who made the viola their special instrument from the start, as he always intended to become a viola player and did not go to that instrument from the violin as do nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand viola players. Louis Bailly is another who made the viola is special instrument.

Most viola players, as has been said, begin with the violin and then go to the viola for any one of a number of reasons. Louis Svecenski, viola player in the Kneisel Quartet from the day it was organized until Mr. Kneisel disbanded it, a period of almost thirty years, was one of the finest viola players in the world, but he came to this country to be one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He took up the viola at the combined request of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Gericke, then conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Kneisel because he wanted him in the quartet he was about to organize and Mr. Gericke because he needed him for solo viola of the orchestra. His experience has been that of most of the great viola players.

In the leaving of Mr. Ferir the Philadelphia Orchestra and the musical life of the city suffer a severe loss.

Mr. Rabaud, who, it may be presumed, was an exponent of the style of conducting and program making which Mr. Monteux will follow. However, last year it was a temporary position; now it is for a year. And to a certain extent, whether it is wise or fair or just, or not, the audience cannot help making a little forecast of the 23 concerts to come from the one it heard on Friday.

"The Beethoven symphony received a perfunctory reading. The conductor added nothing of his own, being seemingly more occupied with holding his men to the tempo he chose than with letting his fancy run in the scherzo or the slow movement. His best work of the afternoon was in the Debussy number, for here he realized the poetry of the score. The Cesar Franck piece, example of a day of music writing that is gone, seems an unworthy representative of the great French master because it lacks the spontaneity and authority of other works of this pioneer of modernism. It is not a very alarming moment that his portrayal of fear brings forth. Listening to the Albeniz suite was no difficult task, being filled rather with the pleasurable excitement of wondering what sort of an odd sound would next emanate from the orchestra."

MR. MONTEUX, in the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Monday evening, completely reversed the form he showed as the conductor of the first concert here last season when he led the orchestra until Mr. Raband arrived in this country. At that time he gave the Cesar Franck symphony, and, as was mentioned in these columns, his reading was a marvel of detail. The intensely complicated architecture of the symphony, especially the last movement, which is a wonderful mosaic of the themes of the previous movements, combined with the new thematic material in the last movement itself, was brought out with a keen sense of values architectural, thematic and dynamic, but especially architectural.

Naturally one expected something of a similar reading of the Schumann B-flat symphony last Monday evening, even allowing for the fact that, compared to the Franck symphony, the Schumann is simplicity itself in so far as construction goes. But the very reverse occurred. Mr. Monteux paid but slight attention to the detail of the work and even less to the dynamics, although the symphony is not one of strong dynamic contrasts, and evidently concentrated upon a poetic reading.

The orchestra is not yet up to the standard of the old Boston Symphony. It is a first-class body of performers and has many artists of the highest rank, notably in the woodwinds, but it does not play with anything like the unanimity and precision which it had under former conductors. This is especially true with regard to the rhythms, which in a number of places in the symphony, as well as in the Liszt concerto, were decidedly weak, or rather, lacking in certainty.

BOTH conductor and orchestra were at their best in the "Fire Bird" suite of Stravinsky. The composition is of the type which would appeal more to a French conductor than a symphony in the classic style, even with the infiltration of romanticism which the Schumann symphonies all have. French composers have never been fond of the symphony as a form, nor conspicuously successful in its composition, although the revolt of Berlioz from all styles of strict form, at the crucial period of modern French instrumental composition, may have had something to do with this.

However, the fact remains, and to it may be ascribed, at least in part, the comparative nonsuccess of French conductors with the symphony. The same holds true also of the Italians, with the exception of Toscanini, who was both original and forceful in symphonic interpretation.

The Stravinsky suite was delightful music and was interpreted and played with the finest taste and thorough understanding and sympathy. In knowledge and sincerity, it parallels Scriabine, though not nearly so difficult to understand as the work of that remote and original genius. All sincere music may not be good, but all good music is sincere, and this element was highly apparent in the Stravinsky numbers.

The music is written strictly to the text of the legend, but it is legitimate descriptive music. It does not attempt to depict actual physical scenes, which is the rock upon which so many modern composers' hopes have been wrecked, but simply supplies the musical commentary upon the dramatic course of the story. In some mysterious manner it keeps before the audience the fact that it is a fantasy and not life itself that is being revealed. Even the lullaby, with its sinister insistent beat of the tympani, almost like a funeral march, fits perfectly into the dramatic action. It is to be hoped that Mr. Stokowski will play this suite also this year.

THUS early in the season we have

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Providence Season This Week. — Flonzaley Quartette To-day.—Pierre Monteux on American Music

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has already given 20 concerts in a number of cities and in every instance to packed audiences. Now it comes to reawaken the enthusiasm of Providence music lovers. Although the programmes for the later concerts have not been completed it is unofficially given out that a composition by Stravinsky will be given in the second concert on Dec. 16.

Mr. Monteux, who will be introduced to a Providence audience by the concert next Tuesday, has agreed to take under consideration the possibility of giving a hearing to new American music which promises merit, but is not necessarily of a calibre to win it a place in his programmes. This is in line with similar movements started in Chicago and elsewhere. Mr. Monteux points out that the crowded schedule of the orchestra leaves little time for private performances, but that he will co-operate with American composers in this way to the extent that the organization's programme permits.

Mr. Monteux is of undeniably catholic taste in his choice of music, nor does he believe that war memories should prevent restoring to common enjoyment the works of "enemy" composers. For American music he has, naturally, a special interest now, and since his return to the country last August he has consulted a number of our native composers.

* * *

"We may in time develop a true 'American' music," he declares, "but that time has not arrived yet. At present American music is impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the German, and the Russian composer.

"Unlike the music of these nations, you cannot recognize American music at once as typically characteristic. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American comes, there will be no doubt of the nationality. It will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—but with a different style—an American style.

"I think it will come. It will be very original, very American."

* * *

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who will be heard for the first time in the city on Tuesday evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of the few singers of note who have won a place through concert singing alone. He is an American by birth, having been born in New York in 1874. He was educated in Spain, the homeland of his parents, and has inherited to a great degree the Spanish temperament which manifests itself in the originality of his interpretations. He was a boy soprano in the Episcopalian churches of England and on his return to America continued the work for a short time. In New York Gogorza studied with Emilio Agramonte and made his debut in 1897 with another student of Agramonte, Marcella Sembrich. Since that time he has appeared in recitals and concerts throughout the United States and also with the principal orchestras. Although he has never sung in opera his repertoire includes many well-known arias.

From

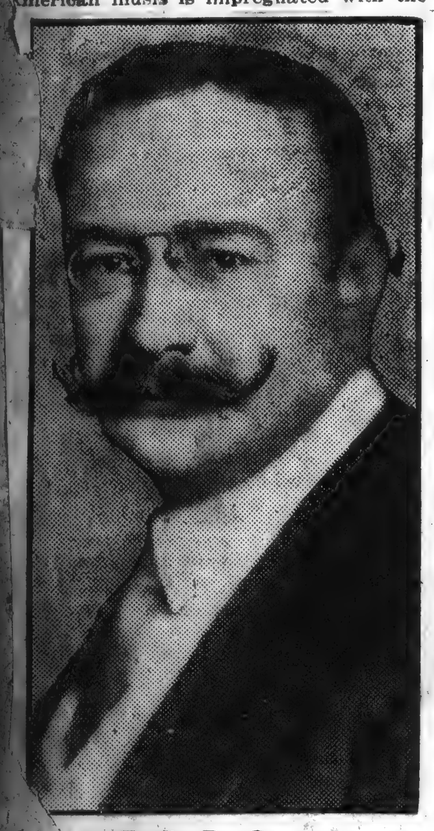
Not only have the music lovers of Providence enjoyed a varied assortment of excellent programmes during the week, but next week promises to hold some attractions which have a distinction and an appeal all their own.

Foremost of the attractions for next week will be the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monetux, who will appear for the first time in this city.

He will lead Beethoven's Second Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's elaborately and brilliantly scored symphonic poem, "The Preludes." Emilie de Gogorza, the foremost baritone of the concert stage, will sing, as soloist of the evening, Massenet's amorous aria from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Since the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been changed in no noteworthy respect save in the 'cello and viola sections, and since these, while formerly of high excellence, have been actually improved, perhaps the great orchestra has never before assembled such an illustrious body of musicians at one time.

When "The Afternoon of a Faun" was performed at the Boston concerts, Mr. H. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript: "The performance yielded richly the beauty of this music, now famous the world over for its voice and imagery. Mr. Laurent, whose flute solo was matchless in its phrases, is still but one of a wood-wind choir which is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness and plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again the instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony Concerts have returned to the old standards, and brought with them the old prestige." In confirmation of this verdict the orchestra has so far performed 20 performances this season in a number of cities and with no single exception to packed audiences.



Emilio De Gogorza
ne Soloist With Boston Symphony rchestra, on Tuesday Evening.

I., NOVEMBER 16, 191

Musical

By N B. PETTIS

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season next Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, in Infantry Hall when Pierre Monteaux, who has already made a generally fine impression as the new conductor, will make his first bow to this city. He will lead Beethovens Second Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's elaborately and brilliantly ludes." Emilio de Gogorza, the foremost baritone of the concert stage, will sing, as soloist of the evening Massenet's amorous aria from "The King of Lahore," and Gluck's "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Since the personnel of the Boston mphony Orchestra has been changed in no noteworthy respect save in the cello and viola sections, and since these, while formerly of high excellence, have been actually improved, perhaps the great orchestra has never before assembled such an illustrious body of musicians at one time.

When "The Afternoon of a Faun" was performed at the Boston Concerts, Mr. H. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript: "The performance yielded richly the beauty of this music, now famous the world over for its voice and imagery. Mr. Laurent, whose ness and plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again the instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony concerts have returned to the old standards, and brought with them the old prestige." In confirmation of this verdict the orchestra has so far performed 20 performances this season in a number of cities, and with no single exception to packed audiences.

From

Pierre Monteux

New Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Make His First Appearance in Providence at Concert at Infantry Hall This Evening.

E PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,

OVEMBER 19, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Orchestra Begins 39th Year in Concert at Infantry Hall.

PIERRE MONTEUX WELCOMED

New Conductor Makes Providence Debut with Americanized Organization. — Emilio De Gogorza, Baritone Soloist, Scores Unqualified Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 39th season here last evening. Infantry Hall held the largest audience seen at these concerts in many a day, and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new leader, together with the men, received a splendid welcome.

The organization, now thoroughly Americanized, and under the leadership of such a man as Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly entering upon a period of prosperity and artistic achievement which should excel that attained in the past. In making this statement and prediction due account is taken of the orchestra's record, its famous conductors and personnel of earlier days. But new blood has now been added, its membership has been purged of an undesirable element, a new and vitalizing enthusiasm is manifest in its playing and that still higher artistic levels will be reached seems certain.

The performance last evening was of absorbing interest. The Beethoven Symphony in D-major No. 2, written when the composer was depressed in spirit because of rapidly increasing deafness, is familiar to Providence audiences through its many presentations here by the Boston Symphony players. Last evening its effect was one of breadth and power. Mr. Monteux's reading being dignified yet vigorous and virile. The new leader is a man of force and personality and is inclined to use his instrumental resources lavishly. In general outline and effect the symphony was played in a manner that made it appear a musical structure of towering proportions. Perhaps Mr. Monteux's liking for stately tempi in many portions of the work added to the effect of grandeur produced. At all events, the director made a profound impression in this first symphony he has conducted here, and he was applauded to the echo at its conclusion. After returing several times to bow in acknowledgement he motioned to the players, who rose and shared in the applause.

The Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" showed the conductor in an entirely different light. The poetical musical creation of the French modernist was a thing of ravishing beauty under Mr. Monteux's baton. Light and shade, mystery and visions of beauty seemed blended in the strange and fascinating harmonies which, interspersed with plaintive fragments for flute, violin and oboe, rose and fell. The martial and brilliant "Les Preludes" of Lizst was inspiring in its sweep, strength and fine climaxes. At the close of this final number a storm of applause arose and continued after many of the audience had left their seats.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is remembered by his appearances here a few seasons ago, sang two operatic airs and after the second, "Promesse de mon avenir," by Massenet, was recalled six times. His voice seemed less resonant than a few years ago, but it is still powerful and searching in quality and is used with great dramatic effect.

The programme:

Beethoven....Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op.36
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
Larghetto.
Schorzo.
Allegro molto.
Massenet....Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le Roi de Labore."
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce"
Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."
Lizst..."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

ESTABLISHED 1861

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Soloist Scores Great Triumph in Fine Concert—Stravinsky Work Also Performed

Sergei Rachmaninoff, one of the greatest of present-day musicians, whether judged from the standpoint of composer or performer, was the star of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music last evening. An immense audience was attracted not only by the soloist, but also by the first appearance of the Orchestra under the new conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played the Lizst concerto in E flat, commonly known as the "triangle concerto" on account of the piquant solo which that instrument instrument of percussion, especially in a concerto. His reading was highly individual, but without the slightest infraction of the Liszt traditions. It was an entirely masculine interpretation, without the least approach to sentimentalizing, although it was full of delicate sentiment. His tone was as always, round and full and of great power in the fortissomo passages. He has the strength necessary to play the tremendous close of the concerto without being overwhelmed by the orchestra, although Mr. Monteux used the entire orchestra for the accompaniment. It was a masterly performance of one of the great compositions of all time for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Rachmaninoff received a large number of recalls at the close.

The orchestra itself appeared in three compositions, the Schumann symphony in B flat, the overture and the fifth ballet from Beethoven's "Prometheus" and five numbers from Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire." The orchestra was at its best in the Stravinsky number, and at its worst in the symphony.

As a whole the orchestra shows a decided improvement over its form of last year, as the tone is better and there appears to be a return to the discipline necessary to a great orchestra and which was so noticeably lacking, especially toward the close of last season. In the symphony, however, there was little shading, the tonal quantity of the orchestra being nearly on the same level throughout the whole work. There were spots, too, where the rhythms were not distinct and where the characteristic syncopations of Schumann was decidedly muddy, and there was an unhappy moment or two at the close of the scherzo.

On the other hand, the tone quality was fine throughout in the melodies with which the symphony abounds, especially in the wood-wind. The attacks were good, although there were places where the notes were not released together, notably in the first violins. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was generally along the conventional lines, but he took the last movement slower than it is usually played, with a consequent gain in clarity, but a corresponding loss in the spirit of springlike joyousness that the symphony epitomizes.

The Beethoven numbers, a rather infrequently given work of his first period, were well played. The ballet music allowed some of the solo instruments of the orchestra an excellent chance to show their fine tone quality, the "soloists" being Messrs. Bedetti, the new solo cellist; Laurent, first flute; Sand, first clarinet; Laus, bassoon, and Holy, harp. It was an enjoyable number and well received.

The Stravinsky work created a most favorable impression, both as a composition and for the fine manner in which it was performed. It is modern music, but by no mean freakish. It shows a thorough knowledge of all the resources of composition, and while it is descriptive music, it is real music of this type, because it does not attempt the impossible in description, nor go beyond the legitimate bounds of the art.

Stravinsky is one of the few moderns who are not afraid to write a real melody, and his melodies, while individual and original, are attractive and conform closely to the feeling of the text of the legend.

He does not by any means disdain modern dissonances, but the hearer feels that they are being used for a purpose, and not simply in an overstrained attempt to be original, no matter at what cost to the ears of the audience. The orchestration is effective, but not rich, when compared to that of Rimsky-Korsakoff or Tschaikowsky. It was beautifully performed in every detail, and was very much the finest piece of work from every standpoint that the orchestra did in the concert.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

Boston Symphony Plays Music by Stravinsky.

The second local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, began with Haydn's symphony "The Queen of France" (the queen being Marie Antoinette). Whether this one of Haydn's 125 symphonies had or had not been played in New York before I am not sure, but I am sure that it is both unfamiliar and worth playing. Mr. Monteux conduoted it sympathetically, without the antiquarian affectation, the insistence that the music must sound quaint, which obsesses some conductors of Haydn. He brought out, but in no spirit of undue emphasis, the breadth, the touch of pomp, in the first movement.

The slow movement as he conducted it was a gem. It is music of the smiling countryside, sweet with the murmur of streams and the call of birds. The orchestra played it with ravishing beauty of sound and the most delicate and successful adjustment of tonal values. It was indeed a triumph for the conductor and his men. In the minuet there are similar landward hints, as if the dancers in stately measure had entered the pastoral scene. It, too, went admirably, as did the finale, a Haydn frolic of jest and youthful jollity.

Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture followed. Why Mr. Monteux for each of his opening concerts should choose one of the very [illegible] Beethoven I cannot guess, but there is ample excuse on historical grounds for an occasional performance of the "King Stephen," as well as the further excuse of some passages of indisputable beauty. The overture need not be played better than it was on Saturday.

The second half of the programme was given over to the modern in César Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur maudit" and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "The Fire Bird." The performance of "Le Chasseur maudit" was both magnificent and illuminating. For once the demoniac character of the music, which some have denied as a possibility with the simple and pious Père Franck, was clearly manifest. In fact the performance was so genuinely instructive that one found one's self asking why the symphonic poems of César Franck have been so consistently neglected here. Those of Liszt and of Saint-Saëns are played continually, but it would be very easy to maintain that they are inferior to the compositions in the same class by Franck.

The music of "The Fire Bird" is scarcely less fascinating in the concert room than in the theatre; and if in the theatre it has the advantages of dancers and scenery, in the concert room it is likely to have the advantage of a better orchestra. Mr. Monteux is a Stravinsky expert and under his guidance the Boston band is also a Stravinsky expert. It is a natural hope that as soon as the only available score of Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring" can be procured from its place of wartime internment in Berlin, Mr. Monteux will conduct for us that work also. It is pointed to as the milestone on the road to the future beyond which music has not yet advanced, and Mr. Monteux has conducted it many times, both as a concert piece and in the theatre, for audiences in Paris and in London. It is high time we heard it in New York.

Saturday's audience, as is usual at Boston Symphony concerts, filled Carnegie Hall, and like Thursday night's was singularly grudging of applause.

PITTS SANBORN.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Music.

A dispatch from Paris last Friday said that "a referendum taken recently at a large concert resulted in an almost unanimous vote favoring the return of German music." One newspaper, commenting on the subject, said: "Why not take advantage of the music of a vanquished foe, considering it one of the spoils of war?"

The same argument has been repeatedly submitted by the musical editor of the Evening Post. At the same time he concurred with Ernest Newman of London in deeming this an oppertune time to eliminate from our programmes pieces by German composers which would sink like stones if they were not floated by an inflated name.

The Parisian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, had on his Carnegie Hall, New York, programme last Thursday numbers from Beethoven's "Prometheus," and again on Saturday afternoon the same composer's overture to "King Stephen." Beethoven, by his own confession, often wrote pot boilers for the sake of the money he needed to be able to give his time to worth-while compositions. When the London Philharmonic got the "King Stephen" overture it was declined as being "unworthy" of Beethoven. The verdict was correct, and it applies also to the "Prometheus." Why, then, did M. Monteux put them on his programmes?

César Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," was quite exciting after the empty "King Stephen," but why were the bells played so softly that they were almost inaudible?

The feature of this concert was the final number, the "Suite from the Danced Story, the Fire Bird," by Stravinsky. This was not a novelty; the complete work was danced and played by the Ballet Russe at the Century Theatre on January 17, 1916. But in the concert hall, too, it makes a dazzling impression, and the audience enjoyed it exceedingly. Stravinsky is a futurist, but a futurist plus genius, and that makes all the difference in the world. A victim of the Bolshevikian highwaymen, he is now lying ill in Switzerland, and in want. We shall recur to him in the magazine section next Saturday.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 16 1919

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

We Like Monteux, Too.

New Yorkers evidenced their warm interest in the series of concerts to be [illegible] in the metropolis by the Boston [illegible]ony Orchestra in that every seat [illegible]e Hall was sold days in [illegible]

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Under the baton of Pierre Monteux, now permanent conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its annual series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday evening last, before an audience that completely filled all seats and permissible standing spaces. Brooklyn is still fond of the Bostonian orchestral organization despite the slings and arrows of misfortune that have pursued it during the past two seasons. Mr. Monteux, as temporary conductor, opened the series in Brooklyn a year ago, having also subsequently directed opera here during the annual visits of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is, therefore, no stranger in our musical midst, and was accorded a personal greeting of applause that was more than conventionally perfunctory in its welcoming ring. To assert that Mr. Monteux has as yet brought the orchestra back to its Gericke-Muck high tide of perfection would be taking liberty with fact, for the shades and inner shades of subtle orchestral tone qualities such as those associated with the B. S. O. of former years, are not now as fully evident in the performance of this famous band. The two violin sections are unequal in tone color, and the brass choir, although heard less than usual at this concert, has a tendency toward thickness of tone. The woodwind tonal effect was soft and ingratiating, and the cellos and violas little short of magnificent. In Schumann's B flat major symphony Mr. Monteux did not get the full values of lights and shades of its springtime feeling, for which this symphony is famous. Here are tripping Mendelssohnianisms, enriched by the deep romanticisms of Robert Schumann, and in places where a light fantastic element was called for Mr. Monteux was heavy handed. More happy was the conductor in the congenial swing of Beethoven's opus 43 overture and fifth ballet from "The Creatures of Prometheus" ballet, which, though cast in a familiar antiquated mold, nevertheless retains an unfaded Beethoven spirit. The overture has much movement, while the ballet limps in adagio tempo. The latter, however, afforded beautiful solo opportunities for cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, and full advantage thereof was taken respec-

[illegible] Leginska, Laus and Holy. Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, soloist upon this occasion, opened new vistas of pianistic interpretation by his wonderful playing of Liszt's E flat major concerto, being recalled no less than a dozen times at its conclusion. His performance was well worthy the attention of a group of concert pianists who feature this concerto in their repertoires. M. Rachmaninoff brought to his task an astounding virtuosity, comprehension and complete understanding that made of him a commanding figure at the piano in collaboration with orchestral background. Into his interpretation he infused the brooding spirit of veritable wizardry, such as, no doubt, Liszt [illegible] might have done. It was an expected revelation in regard to the possibilities of the concerto itself which is a work of thin pomposity. At times the pianoforte was overlorded by the strings. The soloist and orchestra were also frequently at sixes and sevens as to tempo. Enesco's suite for orchestra, op. 9, given in Brooklyn nearly a decade ago by the late Gustav Mahler, brought to a close the evening's programme. In this work are dramatic modernisms to which Mr. Monteux's musical temperament instinctively springs. The work itself has moments of decided uniqueness and compelling charm. The long stretches of string unison in its "Prelude a l'unision" are impressive, although the unchangeableness of mood and color becomes a parent of monotony. Most happy indeed were the conductor and players in the gorgeous finale, music quite akin in feeling to that of Stravinsky in his "Petrouchka" ballet.

The Boston series, as in [illegible]

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 16 1919

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday there was somewhat of a rush back stage to shake the hand of Pierre Monteux, the scholarly leader of the band. Leading the rush were Michel Fokine, the Russian dancer; Morris Gest, the producer of "Chu Chin Chow" and "Aphrodite" (only twenty dollars to sit in the front rows, boys!); Ethel Leginska, Wynne Pyle, respectively, the English and Texan pianists, while at the back of the hall stood Walter Damrosch applauding with a distinguished group of fellow musicians.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Two Orchestral Concerts.

After the unrefined efforts of New York's latest orchestra, it was a pleasure to listen in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to the tones of one of our mature and euphonious aggregations of players, the New York Symphony Orchestra. To be sure, Walter Damrosch recently lost several of his best players, but he has succeeded in filling their places satisfactorily, and his band seems to be about as good as ever, which is fortunate, because of its impending spring trip to Europe. But Mr. Damrosch will have to put a little more zinger, as well as ginseng, into his readings if he hopes to give foreigners samples of the first-class things we have over here in the way of orchestral music. His reading of the first Brahms symphony yesterday was rather lethargic till the final exultant Beethoven strains were reached.

Albert Spalding was the soloist. He was most cordially greeted after his absence for two years in the army service in Italy. During his sojourn in that country some rare and well-deserved honors were bestowed upon him. His playing of the Mendelssohn violin concerto was not on his own highest level, which is easily understood and pardoned, but it was nevertheless a performance beautiful in many details and infused with spirit. The concert closed with Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and finale.

There was no soloist in the evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance in Carnegie Hall. When this orchestra lost more than thirty of its best players because of the war, and its founder, Major Higginson, left it to its fate, it seemed as if its knell had sounded, but it has gradually improved, and while still far below its former standard in smoothness and tonal refinement, it sounded better last night than it did at any time last season. There was a good deal to command, too, in M. Monteux's reading of Schumann's "Spring" symphony; rather more, strange to say, than in his reading of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." The music from Beethoven's "Prometheus" was hardly worth playing. When the great composer wrote that he nodded somnolently. Enesco's suite, opus 9, closed the entertainment, which was enjoyed by a large audience.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Is at Its Best in the Schumann Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night, under Institute auspices, before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with Brooklyn concertgoers was conclusive.

As an added attraction Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist, and his pianistic efforts, which were simply classic elegance, proved to be one of the high lights of the programme. His reception developed into genuine enthusiasm.

The Boston organization offered a programme which, orchestrally speaking, was more eventful than any other symphonic performance given the past season and was eminently creditable to both Conductor Monteux and his men.

In the Schumann Symphony, which is a joyously imaginative, youthful and buoyant "Spring Symphony," with its laughing choirs and abounding joy in melody, the Bostonians were at their best.

Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" furnished Conductor Monteux with a good vehicle to display the best points in his orchestra's present form. It was played wonderfully well. The conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's playing of Liszt's concerto in E flat major for pianoforte and orchestra was executed with a wonderful variety of tone and contrast. He displayed unusual resources of dynamic contrast and variety and an artistic interpretation which brings home convincingly to his audience the psychologic meaning of every composition he plays.

The concert closed with Enesco's suite for orchestra, Op. 9, which was played with fervor and finesse. To say that Mr. Monteux fully rose to his opportunities would not be to overpraise him. He read each number with full adherence to its unmistakable meaning. The audience was notably demonstrative and quite determined to show Conductor Monteux and his men that their efforts were highly es[illegible]

E PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,

OVEMBER 19, 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Orchestra Begins 39th Year in Concert at Infantry Hall.

PIERRE MONTEUX WELCOMED

New Conductor Makes Providence Debut with Americanized Organization. — Emilio De Gogorza, Baritone Soloist, Scores Unqualified Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 39th season here last evening. Infantry Hall held the largest audience seen at these concerts in many a day, and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new leader, together with the men, received a splendid welcome.

The organization, now thoroughly Americanized, and under the leadership of such a man as Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly entering upon a period of prosperity and artistic achievement which should excel that attained in the past. In making this statement and prediction due account is taken of the orchestra's record, its famous conductors and personnel of earlier days. But new blood has now been added, its membership has been purged of an undesirable element, a new and vitalizing enthusiasm is manifest in its playing and that still higher artistic levels will be reached seems certain.

The performance last evening was of absorbing interest. The Beethoven Symphony in D-major No. 2, written when the composer was depressed in spirit because of rapidly increasing deafness, is familiar to Providence audiences through its many presentations here by the Boston Symphony players. Last evening its effect was one of breadth and power. Mr. Monteux's reading being dignified yet vigorous and virile. The new leader is a man of force and personality and is inclined to use his instrumental resources lavishly. In general outline and effect the symphony was played in a manner that made it appear a musical structure of towering proportions. Perhaps Mr. Monteux's liking for stately tempi in many portions of the work added to the effect of grandeur produced. At all events, the director made a profound impression in this first symphony he has conducted here, and he was applauded to the echo at its conclusion. After returing several times to bow in acknowledgement he motioned to the players, who rose and shared in the applause.

The Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fanne" showed the conductor in an entirely different light. The poetical musical creation of the French modernist was a thing of ravishing beauty under Mr. Monteux's baton. Light and shade, mystery and visions of beauty seemed blended in the strange and fascinating harmonies which, interspersed with plaintive fragments for flute, violin and oboe, rose and fell. The martial and brilliant "Les Preludes" of Lizst was inspiring in its sweep, strength and fine climaxes. At the close of this final number a storm of applause arose and continued after many of the audience had left their seats.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is remembered by his appearances here a few seasons ago, sang two operatic airs and after the second, "Promesse de mon avenir," by Massenet, was recalled six times. His voice seemed less resonant than a few years ago, but it is still powerful and searching in quality and is used with great dramatic effect.

The programme:

Beethoven....Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op.36
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro molto.
Massenet....Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le Roi de Labore."
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce"
Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."
Lizst..."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Soloist Scores Great Triumph in Fine Concert—Stravinsky Work Also Performed

Sergei Rachmaninoff, one of the greatest of present-day musicians, whether judged from the standpoint of composer or performer, was the star of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music last evening. An immense audience was attracted not only by the soloist, but also by the first appearance of the Orchestra under the new conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played the Lizst concerto in E flat, commonly known as the "triangle concerto" on account of the piquant solo which that instrument of percussion, especially in a concerto. His reading was highly individual, but without the slightest infraction of the Liszt traditions. It was an entirely masculine interpretation, without the least approach to sentimentalizing, although it was full of delicate sentiment. His tone was as always, round and full and of great power in the fortissomo passages. He has the strength necessary to play the tremendous close of the concerto without being overwhelmed by the orchestra, although Mr. Monteux used the entire orchestra for the accompaniment. It was a masterly performance of one of the great compositions of all time for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Rachmaninoff received a large number of recalls at the close.

The orchestra itself appeared in three compositions, the Schumann symphony in B flat, the overture and the fifth ballet from Beethoven's "Prometheus" and five numbers from Stravinsky's danced legend, "The Bird of Fire." The orchestra was at its best in the Stravinsky number, and at its worst in the symphony.

As a whole the orchestra shows a decided improvement over its form of last year, as the tone is better and there appears to be a return to the discipline necessary to a great orchestra and which was so noticeably lacking, especially toward the close of last season. In the symphony, however, there was little shading, the tonal quantity of the orchestra being nearly on the same level throughout the whole work. There were spots, too, where the rhythms were not distinct and where the characteristic syncopations of Schumann was decidedly muddy, and there was an unhappy moment or two at the close of the scherzo.

On the other hand, the tone quality was fine throughout in the melodies with which the symphony abounds, especially in the wood-wind. The attacks were good, although there were places where the notes were not released together, notably in the first violins. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was generally along the conventional lines, but he took the last movement slower than it is usually played, with a consequent gain in clarity, but a corresponding loss in the spirit of springlike joyousness that the symphony epitomizes.

The Beethoven numbers, a rather infrequently given work of his first period, were well played. The ballet music allowed some of the solo instruments of the orchestra an excellent chance to show their fine tone quality, the "soloists" being Messrs. Bedetti, the new solo cellist; Laurent, first flute; Saud, first clarinet; Laus, bassoon, and Holy, harp. It was an enjoyable number and well received.

The Stravinsky work created a most favorable impression, both as a composition and for the fine manner in which it was performed. It is modern music, but by no mean freakish. It shows a thorough knowledge of all the resources of composition, and while it is descriptive music, it is real music of this type, because it does not attempt the impossible in description, nor go beyond the legitimate bounds of the art.

Stravinsky is one of the few moderns who are not afraid to write a real melody, and his melodies, while individual and original, are attractive and conform closely to the feeling of the text of the legend.

He does not by any means disdain modern dissonances, but the hearer feels that they are being used for a purpose, and not simply in an overstrained attempt to be original, no matter at what cost to the ears of the audience. The orchestration is effective, but not rich, when compared to that of Rimsky-Korsakoff or Tschaikowsky. It was beautifully performed in every detail, and was very much the finest piece of work from every standpoint that the orchestra did in the concert.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

Boston Symphony Plays Music by Stravinsky.

The second local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, began with Haydn's symphony "The Queen of France" (the queen being Marie Antoinette). Whether this one of Haydn's 125 symphonies had or had not been played in New York before I am not sure, but I am sure that it is both unfamiliar and worth playing. Mr. Monteux conducted it sympathetically, without the antiquarian affectation, the insistence that the music must sound quaint, which obsesses some conductors of Haydn. He brought out, but in no spirit of undue emphasis, the breadth, the touch of pomp, in the first movement.

The slow movement as he conducted it was a gem. It is music of the smiling countryside, sweet with the murmur of streams and the call of birds. The orchestra played it with ravishing beauty of sound and the most delicate and successful adjustment of tonal values. It was indeed a triumph for the conductor and his men. In the minuet there are similar landward hints, as if the dancers in stately measure had entered the pastoral scene. It, too, went admirably, as did the finale, a Haydn frolic of jest and youthful jollity.

Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture followed. Why Mr. Monteux for each of his opening concerts should choose the very minor overtures of Beethoven I cannot guess, but there is ample excuse on historical grounds for an occasional performance of the "King Stephen," as well as the further excuse of some passages of indisputable beauty. The overture need not be played better than it was on Saturday.

The second half of the programme was given over to the modern in César Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur maudit" and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "The Fire Bird." The performance of "Le Chasseur maudit" was both magnificent and illuminating. For once the demoniac character of the music, which some have denied as a possibility with the simple and pious Père Franck, was clearly manifest. In fact the performance was so genuinely instructive that one found one's self asking why the symphonic poems of César Franck have been so consistently neglected here. Those of Liszt and of Saint-Saëns are played continually, but it would be very easy to maintain that they are inferior to the compositions in the same class by Franck.

The music of "The Fire Bird" is scarcely less fascinating in the concert room than in the theatre; and if in the theatre it has the advantages of dancers and scenery, in the concert room it is likely to have the advantage of a better orchestra. Mr. Monteux is a Stravinsky expert and under his guidance the Boston band is also a Stravinsky expert. It is a natural hope that as soon as the only available score of Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring" can be procured from its place of wartime internment in Berlin, Mr. Monteux will conduct for us that work also. It is pointed to as the milestone on the road to the future beyond which music has not yet advanced, and Mr. Monteux has conducted it many times, both as a concert piece and in the theatre, for audiences in Paris and in London. It is high time we heard it in New York.

Saturday's audience, as is usual at Boston Symphony concerts, filled Carnegie Hall, and like Thursday night's was singularly grudging of applause.

PITTS SANBORN.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Music.

A dispatch from Paris last Friday said that "a referendum taken recently at a large concert resulted in an almost unanimous vote favoring the return of German music." One newspaper, commenting on the subject, said: "Why not take advantage of the music of a vanquished foe, considering it one of the spoils of war?"

The same argument has been repeatedly submitted by the musical editor of the Evening Post. At the same time he concurred with Ernest Newman of London in deeming this an opportune time to eliminate from our programmes pieces by German composers which would sink like stones if they were not floated by an inflated name.

The Parisian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, had on his Carnegie Hall, New York, programme last Thursday numbers from Beethoven's "Prometheus," and again on Saturday afternoon the same composer's overture to "King Stephen." Beethoven, by his own confession, often wrote pot boilers for the sake of the money he needed to be able to give his time to worth-while compositions. When the London Philharmonic got the "King Stephen" overture it was declined as being "unworthy" of Beethoven. The verdict was correct, and it applies also to the "Prometheus." Why, then, did M. Monteux put them on his programmes?

César Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," was quite exciting after the empty "King Stephen"; but why were the bells played so softly that they were almost inaudible?

The feature of this concert was the final number, the "Suite from the Danced Story, the Fire Bird," by Stravinsky. This was not a novelty; the complete work was danced and played by the Ballet Russe at the Century Theatre on January 17, 1916. But in the concert hall, too, it makes a dazzling impression, and the audience enjoyed it exceedingly. Stravinsky is a futurist, but a futurist plus genius, and that makes all the difference in the world. A victim of the Bolshevikian highwaymen, he is now lying ill in Switzerland, and in want. We shall recur to him in the magazine section next Saturday.

ESTABLISHED 1881

NOV 16 1919

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

We Like Monteux, Too.

New Yorkers evidenced their warm interest in the series of concerts to be ... in the metropolis by the Boston ...ony Orchestra in that every seat ...egie Hall was sold days in ... the opening con...

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From ST... 64

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Under the baton of Pierre Monteux, now permanent conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its annual series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday evening last, before an audience that completely filled all seats and permissible standing spaces. Brooklyn is still fond of the Bostonian orchestral organization despite the slings and arrows of misfortune that have pursued it during the past two seasons. Mr. Monteux, as temporary conductor, opened the series in Brooklyn a year ago, having also subsequently directed opera here during the annual visits of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is, therefore, no stranger in our musical midst, and was accorded a personal greeting of applause that was more than conventionally perfunctory in its welcoming ring. To assert that Mr. Monteux has as yet brought the orchestra back to its Gericke-Muck high tide of perfection would be taking liberty with fact, for the shades and inner shades of subtle orchestral tone qualities such as those associated with the B. S. O. of former years, are not now as fully evident in the performance of this famous band. The two violin sections are unequal in tone color, and the brass choir, although heard less than usual at this concert, has a tendency toward thickness of tone. The woodwind tonal effect was soft and ingratiating and the cellos and violas little short of magnificent. In Schumann's B flat major symphony Mr. Monteux did not get the full values of lights and shades of its springtime feeling, for which this symphony is famous. Here are tripping Mendelssohnianisms, enriched by the deep romanticisms of Robert Schumann, and in places where a light fantastic element was called for Mr. Monteux was heavy handed. More happy was the conductor in the congenial swing of Beethoven's opus 43 overture and fifth ballet from "The Creatures of Prometheus" ballet, which, though cast in a familiar antiquated mold, nevertheless retains an unfaded Beethoven spirit. The overture has much movement, while the ballet limps in adagio tempo. The latter, however, afforded beautiful solo opportunities for cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, and full advantage thereof was taken respec-

...by Messrs. Bedetti, Laurent, Saud, Laus and Holy. Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, soloist upon this occasion, opened new vistas of pianistic interpretation by his wonderful playing of Liszt's E flat major concerto, being recalled no less than a dozen times at its conclusion. His performance was well worthy the attention of a group of concert pianists who feature this concerto in their repertoires. M. Rachmaninoff brought to his task an astounding virtuosity, comprehension and complete understanding that made of him a commanding figure at the piano in collaboration with orchestral background. Into his interpretation he infused the brooding spirit of veritable wizardry, such as, no doubt, Liszt himself might have done. It was an expected revelation in regard to the possibilities of the concerto itself, which is a work of thin pomposity. At times the pianoforte was overlorded by the strings. The soloist and orchestra were also frequently at sixes and sevens as to tempo. Enesco's suite for orchestra, op. 9, given in Brooklyn nearly a decade ago by the late Gustav Mahler, brought to a close the evening's programme. In this work are dramatic modernisms to which Mr. Monteux's musical temperament instinctively springs. The work itself has moments of decided uniqueness and compelling charm. The long stretches of string unison in its "Prelude a l'unision" are impressive, although the unchangeableness of mood and color becomes a parent of monotony. Most happy indeed were the conductor and players in the gorgeous finale, music quite akin in feeling to that of Stravinsky in his "Petrouchka" ballet.

The Boston series, as in [illegible]

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Two Orchestral Concerts.

After the unrefined efforts of New York's latest orchestra, it was a pleasure to listen in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to the tones of one of our mature and euphonious aggregations of players, the New York Symphony Orchestra. To be sure, Walter Damrosch recently lost several of his best players, but he has succeeded in filling their places satisfactorily, and his band seems to be about as good as ever, which is fortunate, because of its impending spring trip to Europe. But Mr. Damrosch will have to put a little more zinger, as well as ginseng, into his readings if he hopes to give foreigners samples of the first-class things we have over here in the way of orchestral music. His reading of the first Brahms symphony yesterday was rather lethargic till the final exultant Beethoven strains were reached.

Albert Spalding was the soloist. He was most cordially greeted after his absence for two years in the army service in Italy. During his sojourn in that country some rare and well-deserved honors were bestowed upon him. His playing of the Mendelssohn violin concerto was not on his own highest level, which is easily understood and pardoned, but it was nevertheless a performance beautiful in many details and infused with spirit. The concert closed with Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and finale.

There was no soloist in the evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance in Carnegie Hall. When this orchestra lost more than thirty of its best players because of the war, and its founder, Major Higginson, left it to its fate, it seemed as if its knell had sounded, but it has gradually improved, and while still far below its former standard in smoothness and tonal refinement, it sounded better last night than it did at any time last season. There was a good deal to commend, too, in M. Monteux's reading of Schumann's "Spring" symphony; rather more, strange to say, than in his reading of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." The music from Beethoven's "Prometheus" was hardly worth playing. When the great composer wrote that he nodded somnolently. Enesco's suite, opus 9, closed the entertainment, which was enjoyed by a large audience.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

From Morning Telegraph New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday there was somewhat of a rush back stage to shake the hand of Pierre Monteux, the scholarly leader of the band. Leading the rush were Michel Fokine, the Russian dancer; Morris Gest, the producer of "Chu Chin Chow" and "Aphrodite" (only twenty dollars to sit in the front rows, boys!); Ethel Leginska, Wynne Pyle, respectively, the English and Texan pianists, while at the back of the hall stood Walter Damrosch applauding with a distinguished group of fellow musicians.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Is at Its Best in the Schumann Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night, under Institute auspices, before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with Brooklyn concertgoers was conclusive.

As an added attraction Sergei Rachmaninoff, eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist, and his pianistic efforts, which were simply classic elegance, proved to be one of the high lights of the programme. His reception developed into genuine enthusiasm.

The Boston organization offered a programme which, orchestrally speaking, was more eventful than any other symphonic performance given the past season and was eminently creditable to both Conductor Monteux and his men.

In the Schumann Symphony, which is a joyously imaginative, youthful and buoyant "Spring Symphony," with its laughing choirs and abounding joy in melody, the Bostonians were at their best.

Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" furnished Conductor Monteux with a good vehicle to display the best points in his orchestra's present form. It was played wonderfully well. The conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received.

Mr. Rachmanipoff's playing of Liszt's concerto in E flat major for pianoforte and orchestra was executed with a wonderful variety of tone and contrast. He displayed unusual resources of dynamic contrast and variety and an artistic interpretation which brings home convincingly to his audience the psychologic meaning of every composition he plays.

The concert closed with Enesco's suite for orchestra, Op. 9, which was played with fervor and finesse. To say that Mr. Monteux fully rose to his opportunities would not be to overpraise him. He read each number with full adherence to its unmistakable meaning. The audience was notably demonstrative and quite determined to show Conductor Monteux and his men that their efforts were highly es[illegible]

EAGLE

Address 55 Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

A Crowded House Welcomed the Band and Rachmaninoff.

It is indeed good news for Brooklyn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned with every seat for the season at the Academy sold and last night with a large fringe of auditors standing. All the wounds caused by Doktor Muck and his Germanism have been healed, including those in the orchestra caused by the expulsion of a considerable number of German aliens. The first movement of the Schumann Symphony last night disclosed the balance and purity so long associated with this band and the audience settled for an evening of pure enjoyment.

The chief interest, however, centered not in the orchestra nor in its conductor, Pierre Monteux, who received merely a polite greeting on his entrance and a cordial recall after the Schumann, a tribute in which he insisted that the band should share. The hero of the night was Rachmaninoff, the pianist. The audience showed that they wanted him when he came on and wanted him still more badly when he went off. There must have been at least a dozen recalls. The old first Concerto of Liszt has been played to death, but under Rachmaninoff's fingers, or rather under his mighty spirit, it suggested a paraphrase of Lady Macbeth's comment on the murdered Duncan: "Who would have thought the old thing had so much blood in it!" Blood and fire were the qualities that marked the great Russian's performance. In the long procession of pianists who have used the Concerto there have been some who coaxed a more perfect singing tone and perhaps more clearness in some of the rapid passages, though nobody achieved greater delicacy in the soft passage with the strings. But nobody has poured himself through the composition with such compelling eloquence as Rachmaninoff. The Concerto last night did not sound like a trick piece for the piano but like a bit of musical inspiration, which shows how effectively Rachmaninoff reinforced Liszt. The accompaniment was a special credit to Monteux and his men.

Schumann denominated his B-flat Symphony "Spring." Its composition is of the springtide in its composer's life, the early days of his marriage to Clara Wieck. Certainly it is bright, joyous, blithe, with the freshest of youthful fancy. Last evening, however, it was rude and rough under the heavy hand of Mr. Monteux. The fault always in such a performance of the particular work is of two sources, a positive murkiness of orchestration on the composer's part and a negative failure on the conductor's part to clear up the fog of the composer's primitive orchestrating. Mr. Monteux took his Schumann straight. Considering the difference between the orchestra of Schumann's day and that of the present, even the most precise Schumannite can offer no logical objection to what he might consider "tampering."

The Enesco Suite is not unfamiliar. It has merit and individuality both of thematic thought and of orchestral color and variety. The composer, however, is still a young man; as composers go, a very young man; and it is too easy to make an oracle of him. The suite is not a composition to excite any undue concern among the members of either the right or left wing of a musical parliament.

The Boston Symphony still possesses many of its ancient qualities. In personnel it undoubtedly fills the first place among such orchestras as are heard in New York. The strings, at least in potentiality, are finer even than those that played under the late unlamented Doktor Muck and during the past two years there has been a notable betterment of the second violin section. Certainly the wood and brass choirs are incomparable. But Mr. Monteux does not insist upon the finer and most ingratiating qualities of orchestral playing; the story comes from Boston that he is far from the inexorable taskmaster his predecessors were.

In fact, Mr. Monteux is not a conductor of the first rank. That is no recent discovery. He is an excellent musician, a fine gentlemen, and an indifferent conductor. And until a new evangel comes, the unique position of the Boston orchestra will be a thing of the past. Today its playing does not fill the ancient requirement of being everything that is excellent.

Public Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSICAL BARRAGE IS ON FOR NEW YORK

The Wonder Is That There Are Concertgoers Enough for All the Concert-Givers

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

New York, Nov. 9.—In music, as with the tide, we find an ebb and flow. There was a strong upward swing last week to our harmonic progression; a tightening all round that bespoke a "waiting moment's" arrival. For to the blare of the New Symphony's brasses were added those of a more golden-like quality belonging to the Boston musicians and Walter Damrosch's well-matured New York Symphony Orchestra.

From the town of wisdom came Pierre Monteux, but he did not bring the old-time, once revered, Boston Symphony. The name still remains, a name which to many possesses the same glittering allure. Changes in the personnel, however, have ensued since the days of its fullest glory. All the while the other orchestras have been growing, until the older and long-respected "brother" has fallen back a peg.

It was inevitable. The fittest alone survive, just as the deserving assuredly catches up. So have we reached the moment when tradition stands leveled before what is newer and quite as good. All about us may we find orchestras wholly the equals of the Boston men. I shall be surprised if, before the season's end, decree does not place two or three organizations above those hailing from New England.

* * *

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date NOV 19 1919

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Boston Symphony, with Pierre Monteux, Welcomed by Music Lovers.

With its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its series of Providence concerts in Infantry Hall last evening. The hall was filled with a representative and brilliant audience, an audience, too, that was enthusiastic throughout the concert and gave a welcome to the conductor that was as spontaneous as it was sincere.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, was the soloist and the program follows: Beethoven Symphony in D. major, No. 2, Op. 36; I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio; II. Larghetto; III. Scherzo; IV. Allegro molto. Massenet: Recitative and Air "Promesse de mon avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore." Debussy: "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune [Eglogue de S. Mallarme]" (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun [Eclogue by S. Mallarme]"). Gluck: Recitative and Air, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide." Liszt: "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem o. 3 (after Lamartine).

It is difficult to imagine a better performance of Beethoven's second symphony than that of last evening and Mr. Monteux's reading of it was vital, vivid and musically beautiful.

Especially worthy of praise was the introduction, the scherzo and the finale, the scherzo being played with superb effect.

Mr. Monteaux, however, seemed to inspire his men to unusual heights last evening, however, and the audience was not slow to recognize his genius and felt something of the enthusiasm with which the conductor led his forces and at the end of the symphony a storm of applause long continued brought Mr. Monteaux to the front of the platform six times to bow his achievements. It was a notable tribute to a great artist and the rest of the program was not less enjoyed than its splendid beginning.

Debussy's exquisite prelude was a gem of the program, the tonal coloring, the poetic feeling, the wonderful harmony of the work being brought out under the skill of the conductor with such masterly orchestral effect as to arouse the audience to added enthusiasm and a burst of applause followed.

The final number on the program, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine), is descriptive of joy and sorrow, the calm and struggle of life.

The effect of the interpretation of this massive work was electrical, its climaxes being magnificently played, especially at the close of the work, when the ful orchestra united in a march movement of grandeur and power, closing with a superb climax of beautifully blended harmony, full of tragic fire and dramatic strength.

Mr. De Gogorza, the soloist of the evening, scored a vocal triumph in his two big arias with the orchestra. He has a singularly warm and flexible voice, which he uses with consummate skill. His singing was highly dramatic, full of authority and his voice was easily heard above the orchestra.

Moreover, his singing was characterized by elegance of style and rare musicianly intelligence. He was recalled a half-dozen or more times, but encores are barred at the Symphony concerts.

N. B. P.

From R. I.

NOV 1919

PIERRE MONTEUX LEADS SYMPHONY FIRST TIME HERE

Pierre Monteux, who for the first time appeared in Providence as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, impressed the big audience in Infantry Hall last night as a man bound, by leadership, artistic temperament and past successes to be capable of achieving, with his reorganized orchestra, even greater heights than in the long history of the orchestra have been reached by other leaders.

It was the first time the orchestra had been in Providence since the unfortunate experience with Dr. Karl Muck, since deported as a dangerous alien enemy. The undesirables in the orchestra have all gone the way of the distinguished former conductor and new blood and new ambitions have come to make the 39th Symphony season one which holds forth great promises for the future.

Beethoven's Symphony in D-Major No. 2 was the principal number of last evening's programme. Written when the composer was greatly depressed because of his growing deafness, it holds much of color which only an able conductor and capable temperamental musicians could interpret in the way in which the Boston Symphony did last evening. There was an effect of grandeur and stateliness which was produced and yet was not too severe.

The "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fanne" by Debussy, something entirely different, one of the most beautiful works of the French school of modernists, gave the conductor opportunity to display still further his versatility in producing the coloring necessary in this class of music. Lizst's "Les Preludes" was played with much effect.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is well known to Providence music lovers, sang in a voice which, if not quite resonant as a few years ago, was, nevertheless, effective and quite worth hearing, especially since he possesses the dramatic ability to an unusual degree.

The programme follows:

Beethoven...Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op. 36
- Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- Larghetto.
- Scherzo.
- Allegro molto.

Massenet..Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le de Labore."

Debussy.."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce"

Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyale," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."

Liszt.."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

From Evening Star

NOV 5 - 1919

Washington, D. C.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon by a distinguished audience. Miss Margaret Wilson occupying the President's box with her sister, Mrs. Francis B. Sayre; Mrs. Bolling and Miss Bolling, mother and sister of Mrs. Wilson; Mrs. James Garfield and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies. Mrs. Robert Lansing and Mrs. Truman H. Newberry occupied a box opposite, and Mrs. Van Spantvoord Merle-Smith also had a box for the concert, and had as guests Mrs. Kirk, Mrs. Michael J. Lanahan, Mrs. Albert B. Buddock, Mrs. Maitland Dwight and Mrs. Christian A. Herter.

Others there were Mrs. James L. Mann, Mrs. J. H. Hewson, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Dr. and Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, the Misses Sedgley and Admiral O'Neil.

Melodies From M...

Balt Star

BY J. NORRIS

The new-born child is welcomed by the few; the adult by the many.

Never was there better example of this than at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore last Wednesday, when "extremes met" in Handel's so-called "largo" and Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Singing of the opera excerpt caused the general spontaneous applause of the concert.

Never within the memory of the writer has any work played publicly in Baltimore by any orchestra received so little aggregate aplause from an audience (which was attentive) as the suite. This was so indicative of an attitude as to attract notice. It is capable of just comparison, too, as the circumstance was differentiated clearly from the extent of receptions which usually follow last numbers of programs—which the suite was.

Commonly, audiences give a more or less perfunctory applause after last numbers—but a general applause—before rather precipitate preparations for departure. Upon this occasion, however, the audience collectively, which practically filled the Lyric Theater, sat for an appreciable time inert, then revived, and, while a few persons applauded—so few that they might have been counted—prepared slowly to go and did so silently.

It was an involuntary recognition of the stupendous.

This work of Schmitt (who is a Frenchman) is probably the most abstruse, complex product of present-day musical thought presented publicly to date in Baltimore, although its substance was formed at least 12 years ago. The eager student of musical art witnessed its exhibition with all the elation and zest of one penetrating little or unexplored domains. It was not so easy to "get his number," either, for applause or lack of it is not necessarily an index, as is well known. The audience, collectively, however, seemed to be stunned by the strangeness of what it had heard; its attention seemed to be that which the amazing, the uncomprehended, from which there is no escape, compels; and when the cause was removed, the auditors were limp, without initiative.

It is not to be inferred from this that the audience was hostile to the composition; and if any one were hostile to it, it seems reasonably certain that his number, too, constituted a minority. To read hostility into unresponsiveness would be a serious mistake, and it is hoped no one will interpose an impediment by making it. Moreover, many in the audience doubtless recognized that some persons were merely having their "turn" at listening to something which appealed especially strongly to them; and they exercised the forbearance they expect for themselves under similar circumstances.

It was an occasion of joy, and also an occasion of fear that one might not experience its like again—that something, someone might stop the wheels of progress here whose kind is just beginning really to turn.

The organization deserves great credit for the new work it has done here this season. Knowing the comparative remoteness of the Schmitt work, it doubtless experienced no disappointment from its reception here. It should experience none. Moreover, it has the eager sympathy of all forward-looking persons, who are ready for all the pioneering there is, and whose consequent hunger requires appropriate food.

May the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, be spiritually and financially rich enough to continue in Baltimore, in spite of any obstacle which may interpose to disseminate knowledge of what is going on in the advanced musical world today and in which other places in the world have been sharing for long, at the same time not denying anyone full access to the "fossils" and other historic exhibits, but exhibiting them in glass cases where they belong and not in wild animals' cages.

Searching in the future for truth seems to be a reasonably difficult task; yet, the one who searches in the past for it "has his work cut out for him"—as an inverted term expresses it. So much has not been "cut out" for him, which could have been with nothing more difficult than exercise of will, that his task in this respect is unreasonably difficult.

In this work he encounters the baffling lack of records; but this lack subdivides in part into a condition arising from thoughtlessness and heedlessness.

It sounds splendid, sometimes, to hear someone talking grandly about "opening the pages of history;" but it doesn't kindle enthusiasm alike. Many feel nothing more than a faint initial sensation and memory checks it; and this sensation is due frequently to suggestion touching something desired rather than something accomplished.

Recently Philip Hale, of Boston, "opened the pages of history" to find something of Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, The Queen of France (played in Baltimore this season) as relating to Boston. When he opened them, ghosts of the departed came out and mocked him. He tells of it simply, as follows, in his published official program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"I have been unable to find any record of a performance of this symphony by any Boston orchestra in a symphony concert since 1839. No doubt the symphony has been played here, for Haydn's symphonies were on the program of orchestral concerts in Boston from 1783 to 1800. It is impossible to identify them, for they were announced as 'Grand Symphony of Haydn,' 'Overture of Haydn' or 'Full Piece of Haydn.'"

Blank pages are "bad enough," but of useless ones, what shall be said?

Post Dispatch

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1919.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS GREETED BY LARGE AUDIENCE

Orchestra, Headed by Pierre Monteux, Begins 39th Year in Concert at Infantry Hall. Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone Soloist, Applauded.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 39th season here last evening. Infantry Hall held the largest audience seen at these concerts in many a day, and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new leader, together with the men, received a splendid welcome.

The organization, now thoroughly Americanized, and under the leadership of such a man as Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly entering upon a period of prosperity and artistic achievement which should excel that attained in the past. In making this statement and prediction due account is taken of the orchestra's record, its famous conductors and personnel of earlier days. But new blood has now been added, its membership has been purged of an undesirable element, a new and vitalizing enthusiasm is manifest in its playing and that still higher artistic levels will be reached seems certain.

The performance last evening was of absorbing interest. The Beethoven Symphony in D-major No. 2, written when the composer was depressed in spirit because of rapidly increasing deafness, is familiar to Providence audiences through its many presentations here by the Boston Symphony players. Last evening its effect was one of breadth and power. Mr. Monteux's reading being dignified yet vigorous and virile. The new leader is a man of force and personality and is inclined to use his instrumental resources lavishly. In general outline and effect the symphony was played in a manner that made it appear a musical structure of towering proportions. Perhaps Mr. Monteux's liking for stately tempi in many portions of the work added to the effect of grandeur produced. At all events, the director made a profound impression in this first symphony he has conducted here, and he was applauded to the echo at its conclusion. After returing several times to bow in acknowledgement he motioned to the players, who rose and shared in the applause.

The Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fanne" showed the conductor in an entirely different light. The poetical musical creation of the French modernist was a thing of ravishing beauty under Mr. Monteux's baton. Light and shade, mystery and visions of beauty seemed blended in the strange and fascinating harmonies which, interspersed with plaintive fragments for flute, violin and oboe, rose and fell. The martial and brilliant "Les Preludes" of Lizst was inspiring in its sweep, strength and fine climaxes. At the close of this final number a storm of applause arose and continued after many of the audience had left their seats.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is remembered by his appearances here a few seasons ago, sang two operatic airs and after the second, "Promesse de mon avenir," by Massenet, was recalled six times. His voice seemed less resonant than a few years ago, but it is still powerful and searching in quality and is used with great dramatic effect.

The programme:

Beethoven....Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op.36
- Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- Larghetto.
- Scherzo.
- Allegro molto.

Massenet....Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore."

Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce"

Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."

Liszt..."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

A Crowded House Welcomed the Band and Rachmaninoff.

It is indeed good news for Brooklyn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned with every seat for the season at the Academy sold and last night with a large fringe of auditors standing. All the wounds caused by Doktor Muck and his Germanism have been healed, including those in the orchestra caused by the expulsion of a considerable number of German aliens. The first movement of the Schumann Symphony last night disclosed the balance and purity so long associated with this band and the audience settled for an evening of pure enjoyment.

The chief interest, however, centered not in the orchestra nor in its conductor, Pierre Monteux, who received merely a polite greeting on his entrance and a cordial recall after the Schumann, a tribute in which he insisted that the band should share. The hero of the night was Rachmaninoff, the pianist. The audience showed that they wanted him when he came on and wanted him still more badly when he went off. There must have been at least a dozen recalls. The old first Concerto of Liszt has been played to death, but under Rachmaninoff's fingers, or rather under his mighty spirit, it suggested a paraphrase of Lady Macbeth's comment on the murdered Duncan: "Who would have thought the old thing had so much blood in it!" Blood and fire were the qualities that marked the great Russian's performance. In the long procession of pianists who have used the Concerto there have been some who coaxed a more perfect singing tone and perhaps more clearness in some of the rapid passages, though nobody achieved greater delicacy in the soft passage with the strings. But nobody has poured himself through the composition with such compelling eloquence as Rachmaninoff. The Concerto last night did not sound like a trick piece for the piano but like a work of musical inspiration, which shows how effectively Rachmaninoff reinforced Lizst. The accompaniment was a special credit to Monteux and his men.

Schumann denominated his B-flat Symphony "Spring." Its composition is of the springtide in its composer's life, the early days of his marriage to Clara Wieck. Certainly it is bright, joyous, blithe, with the freshest of youthful fancy. Last evening, however, it was rude and rough under the heavy hand of Mr. Monteux. The fault always in such a performance of the particular work is of two sources, a positive murkiness of orchestration on the composer's part and a negative failure on the conductor's part to clear up the fog of the composer's primitive orchestrating. Mr. Monteux took his Schumann straight. Considering the difference between the orchestra of Schumann's day and that of the present, even the most precise Schumannite can offer no logical objection to what he might consider "tampering."

The Enesco Suite is not unfamiliar. It has merit and individuality both of thematic thought and of orchestral color and variety. The composer, however, is still a young man; as composers go, a very young man; and it is too easy to make an oracle of him. The suite is not a composition to excite any undue concern among the members of either the right or left wing of a musical parliament.

The Boston Symphony still possesses many of its ancient qualities. In personnel it undoubtedly fills the first place among such orchestras as are heard in New York. The strings, at least in potentiality, are finer even than those that played under the late unlamented Doktor Muck and during the past two years there has been a notable betterment of the second violin section. Certainly the wood and brass choirs are incomparable. But Mr. Monteux does not insist upon the finer and most ingratiating qualities of orchestral playing; the story comes from Boston that he is far from the inexorable taskmaster his predecessors were.

In fact, Mr. Monteux is not a conductor of the first rank. That is no recent discovery. He is an excellent musician, a fine gentlemen, and an indifferent conductor. And until a new evangel comes, the unique position of the Boston orchestra will be a thing of the past. Today its playing does not fill the ancient requirement of being everything that is excellent.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSICAL BARRAGE IS ON FOR NEW YORK

The Wonder Is That There Are Concertgoers Enough for All the Concert-Givers

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

New York, Nov. 9.—In music, as with the tide, we find an ebb and flow. There was a strong upward swing last week to our harmonic progression; a tightening all round that bespoke a "waiting moment's" arrival. For to the blare of the New Symphony's brasses were added those of a more golden-like quality belonging to the Boston musicians and Walter Damrosch's well-matured New York Symphony Orchestra.

From the town of wisdom came Pierre Monteux, but he did not bring the old-time, once revered, Boston Symphony. The name still remains, a name which to many possesses the same glittering allure. Changes in the personnel, however, have ensued since the days of its fullest glory. All the while the other orchestras have been growing, until the older and long-respected "brother" has fallen back a peg.

It was inevitable. The fittest alone survive, just as the deserving assuredly catches up. So have we reached the moment when tradition stands leveled before what is newer and quite as good. All about us may we find orchestras wholly the equals of the Boston men. I shall be surprised if, before the season's end, decree does not place two or three organizations above those hailing from New England.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 19 1919

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Boston Symphony, with Pierre Monteux, Welcomed by Music Lovers.

With its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its series of Providence concerts in Infantry Hall last evening. The hall was filled with a representative and brilliant audience, an audience, too, that was enthusiastic throughout the concert and gave a welcome to the conductor that was as spontaneous as it was sincere.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, was the soloist and the program follows: Beethoven Symphony in D. major, No. 2, Op. 36; I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio; II. Larghetto; III. Scherzo; IV. Allegro molto. Massenet: Recitative and Air "Promesse de mon avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore." Debussy: "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune [Eglogue de S. Mallarme]" (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun [Eclogue by S. Mallarme]"). Gluck: Recitative and Air, "Diane impitoyable," from "Ipnigenie en Aulide." Liszt: "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem o. 3 (after Lamartine).

It is difficult to imagine a better performance of Beethoven's second symphony than that of last evening and Mr. Monteux's reading of it was vital, vivid and musically beautiful.

Especially worthy of praise was the introduction, the scherzo and the finale, the scherzo being played with superb effect.

Mr. Monteaux, however, seemed to inspire his men to unusual heights last evening, however, and the audience was not slow to recognize his genius and felt something of the enthusiasm with which the conductor led his forces and at the end of the symphony a storm of applause long continued brought Mr. Monteaux to the front of the platform six times to bow his achievements. It was a notable tribute to a great artist and the rest of the program was not less enjoyed than its splendid beginning.

Debussy's exquisite prelude was a gem of the program, the tonal coloring, the poetic feeling, the wonderful harmony of the work being brought out under the skill of the conductor with such masterly orchestral effect as to arouse the audience to added enthusiasm and a burst of applause followed.

The final number on the program, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine), is descriptive of joy and sorrow, the calm and struggle of life.

The effect of the interpretation of this massive work was electrical, its climaxes being magnificently played, especially at the close of the work, when the ful orchestra united in a march movement of grandeur and power, closing with a superb climax of beautifully blended harmony, full of tragic fire and dramatic strength.

Mr. De Gogorza, the soloist of the evening, scored a vocal triumph in his two big arias with the orchestra. He has a singularly warm and flexible voice, which he uses with consummate skill. His singing was highly dramatic, full of authority and his voice was easily heard above the orchestra.

Moreover, his singing was characterized by elegance of style and rare musicianly intelligence. He was recalled a half-dozen or more times, but encores are barred at the Symphony concerts.

N. B. P.

From

PIERRE MONTEUX LEADS SYMPHONY FIRST TIME HERE

Pierre Monteux, who for the first time appeared in Providence as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, impressed the big audience in Infantry Hall last nigh as a man bound, by leadership, artistic temperament and past successes to be capable of achieving, with hi reorganized orchestra, even greate heights than in the long history o the orchestra have been reached b other leaders.

It was the first time the orchestr had been in Providence since th unfortunate experience with Dr Karl Muck, since deported as a dan gerous alien enemy. The undesir ables in the orchestra have all gon the way of the distinguished forme conductor and new blood and ne ambitions have come to make th 39th Symphony season one whic holds forth great promises for th future.

Beethoven's Symphony in D-Majo No. 2 was the principal number o last evening's programme. Writte when the composer was greatly d pressed because of his growing dea ness, it holds much of color whic only an able conductor and capabl temperamental musicians could i terpret in the way in which the Bo ton Symphony did last evening. was an effect of grandeur and stat liness which was produced and yet was not too severe.

The "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d' Fanne" by Debussy, something e tirely different, one of the most bea tiful works of the French school modernists, gave the conductor opportunity to display still furth his versatility in producing the c oring necessary in this class of m sic. Lizst's "Les Preludes" w played with much effect.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, w is well known to Providence mu lovers, sang in a voice which, if quite resonant as a few years a was, nevertheless, effective and qu well worth hearing, especially since he possesses the dramatic ability to an unusual degree.

The programme follows:

Beethoven...Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op. 36
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro molto.

Massenet..Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le de Labore."

Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce"

Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyale," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."

Liszt..."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

From Evening Star
Washington, D. C.
NOV 5 - 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon by a distinguished audience. Miss Margaret Wilson occupying the President's box with her sister, Mrs. Francis Sayre; Mrs. Bolling and Miss Bolling, mother and sister of Mrs. Wilson; Mrs. James Garfield and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies. Mrs. Robert Lansing and Mrs. Truman H. Newberry occupied a box opposite, and Mrs. Van Spantvoord Merle-Smith also occupied a box for the concert, and had as guests Mrs. Kirk, Mrs. Michael J. Lanahan, Mrs. Albert B. Huddock, Mrs. Maitland Dwight and Mrs. Christian A. Herter.

Others there were Mrs. James I Mann, Mrs. J. H. Hewson, Mrs. Victo Kauffmann, Dr. and Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, the Misses Sedgle and Admiral O'Neil.

Melodies From M

Bal Star

BY J. NORRIS

The new-born child is welcomed by the few; the adult by the many.

Never was there better example of this than at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore last Wednesday, when "extremes met" in Handel's so-called "largo" and Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Singing of the opera excerpt caused the general spontaneous applause of the concert.

Never within the memory of the writer has any work played publicly in Baltimore by any orchestra received so little aggregate aplause from an audience (which was attentive) as the suite. This was so indicative of an attitude as to attract notice. It is capable of just comparison, too, as the circumstance was differentiated clearly from the extent of receptions which usually follow last numbers of programs—which the suite was.

Commonly, audiences give a more or less perfunctory applause after last numbers—but a general applause—before rather precipitate preparations for departure. Upon this occasion, however, the audience collectively, which practically filled the Lyric Theater, sat for an appreciable time inert, then revived, and, while a few persons applauded—so few that they might have been counted—prepared slowly to go and did so silently.

It was an involuntary recognition of the stupendous.

This work of Schmitt (who is a Frenchman) is probably the most abstruse, complex product of present-day musical thought presented publicly to date in Baltimore, although its substance was formed at least 12 years ago. The eager student of musical art witnessed its exhibition with all the elation and zest of one penetrating little or unexplored domains. It was not so easy to "get his number," either, for applause or lack of it is not necessarily an index, as is well known. The audience, collectively, however, seemed to be stunned by the strangeness of what it had heard; its attention seemed to be that which the amazing, the uncomprehended, from which there is no escape, compels; and when the cause was removed, the auditors were limp, without initiative.

It is not to be inferred from this that the audience was hostile to the composition; and if any one were hostile to it, it seems reasonably certain that his number, too, constituted a minority. To read hostility into unresponsiveness would be a serious mistake, and it is hoped no one will interpose an impediment by making it. Moreover, many in the audience doubtless recognized that some persons were merely having their "turn" at listening to something which appealed especially strongly to them; and they exercised the forbearance they expect for themselves under similar circumstances.

It was an occasion of joy, and also an occasion of fear that one might not experience its like again—that something, someone might stop the wheels of progress here whose kind is just beginning really to turn.

The organization deserves great credit for the new work it has done here this season. Knowing the comparative remoteness of the Schmitt work, it doubtless experienced no disappointment from its reception here. It should experience none. Moreover, it has the eager sympathy of all forward-looking persons, who are ready for all the pioneering there is, and whose consequent hunger requires appropriate food.

May the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, be spiritually and financially rich enough to continue in Baltimore, in spite of any obstacle which may interpose to disseminate knowledge of what is going on in the advanced musical world today and in which other places in the world have been sharing for long, at the same time not denying anyone full access to the "fossils" and other historic exhibits, but exhibiting them in glass cases where they belong and not in wild animals' cages.

Searching in the future for truth seems to be a reasonably difficult task; yet, the one who searches in the past for it "has his work cut out for him"—as an inverted term expresses it. So much has not been "cut out" for him, which could have been with nothing more difficult than exercise of will, that his task in this respect is unreasonably difficult.

In this work he encounters the baffling lack of records; but this lack subdivides in part into a condition arising from thoughtlessness and heedlessness.

It sounds splendid, sometimes, to hear someone talking grandly about "opening the pages of history;" but it doesn't kindle enthusiasm alike. Many feel nothing more than a faint initial sensation and memory checks it; and this sensation is due frequently to suggestion touching something desired rather than something accomplished.

Recently Philip Hale, of Boston, "opened the pages of history" to find something of Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, The Queen of France (played in Baltimore this season) as relating to Boston. When he opened them, ghosts of the departed came out and mocked him. He tells of it simply, as follows, in his published official program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"I have been unable to find any record of a performance of this symphony by any Boston orchestra in a symphony concert since 1839. No doubt the symphony has been played here, for Haydn's symphonies were on the program of orchestral concerts in Boston from 1783 to 1800. It is impossible to identify them, for they were announced as 'Grand Symphony of Haydn,' 'Overture of Haydn' or 'Full Piece of Haydn.'"

Blank pages are "bad enough," but of useless ones, what shall be said?

Post Dispatch Tribune

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1919.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS GREETED BY LARGE AUDIENCE

Orchestra, Headed by Pierre Monteux, Begins 39th Year in Concert at Infantry Hall. Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone Soloist, Applauded.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 39th season here last evening. Infantry Hall held the largest audience seen at these concerts in many a day, and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new leader, together with the men, received a splendid welcome.

The organization, now thoroughly Americanized, and under the leadership of such a man as Mr. Monteux is undoubtedly entering upon a period of prosperity and artistic achievement which should excel that attained in the past. In making this statement and prediction due account is taken of the orchestra's record, its famous conductors and personnel of earlier days. But new blood has now been added, its membership has been purged of an undesirable element, a new and vitalizing enthusiasm is manifest in its playing and that still higher artistic levels will be reached seems certain.

The performance last evening was of absorbing interest. The Beethoven Symphony in D-major No. 2, written when the composer was depressed in spirit because of rapidly increasing deafness, is familiar to Providence audiences through its many presentations here by the Boston Symphony players. Last evening its effect was one of breadth and power. Mr. Monteux's reading being dignified yet vigorous and virile. The new leader is a man of force and personality and is inclined to use his instrumental resources lavishly. In general outline and effect the symphony was played in a manner that made it appear a musical structure of towering proportions. Perhaps Mr. Monteux's liking for stately tempi in many portions of the work added to the effect of grandeur produced. At all events, the director made a profound impression in this first symphony he has conducted here, and he was applauded to the echo at its conclusion. After returing several times to bow in acknowledgement he motioned to the players, who rose and shared in the applause.

The Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fanne" showed the conductor in an entirely different light. The poetical musical creation of the French modernist was a thing of ravishing beauty under Mr. Monteux's baton. Light and shade, mystery and visions of beauty seemed blended in the strange and fascinating harmonies which, interspersed with plaintive fragments for flute, violin and oboe, rose and fell. The martial and brilliant "Les Preludes" of Lizst was inspiring in its sweep, strength and fine climaxes. At the close of this final number a storm of applause arose and continued after many of the audience had left their seats.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is remembered by his appearances here a few seasons ago, sang two operatic airs and after the second, "Promesse de mon avenir," by Massenet, was recalled six times. His voice seemed less resonant than a few years ago, but it is still powerful and searching in quality and is used with great dramatic effect.

The programme:

Beethoven....Symphony in D-major, No. 2 Op.36
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro molto.

Massenet....Recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore."

Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce."

Gluck..Recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide."

Liszt..."Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 -

RACHMANINOFF IN A NEW CONCERTO

A new piano concerto by Rachmaninoff, played with the composer at the piano, and the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux as conductor, were the two musically important events that brought a capacity audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the first of the five concerts of this orchestra, presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

If M. Monteux continues to give as finely built programs, with the spirit and fineness of his interpretations, this will prove a significant season with the Boston players.

Seldom is one privileged to hear a great creative artist interpret his own work. And Sergei Rachmaninoff is doubly great in that his playing and his creations are both great art. He grips one with the depth of his musicianship, the power that is in him—not in force, but in idea, in all that genius gives which words cannot express. And he sways and thrills one with the mastery and the exquisite pianism of his playing.

It was his third concerto. His second he played here last season. Racial, yet universal, there is such a wealth of imagination in this composition that one would like to program it, rather than say "concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30."

A romance it is, not a tragedy. Pure melody he has given, set in an infinity of entrancing music figures 'till one marvels at the mind that has strung them together in such unity. The orchestra is equally rich in this tone-poem. Varied rhythms, character, warmth of color and vibrancy are in the orchestra. And the piano holds cadenza passages of exquisite runs and trills as of running waters. A ballet moment—a long crescendo—fair dynamic force, and tone-painting of exquisite hue.

Spirit of Russia.

The waltz! It enters into whimsical romance of the second movement with irresistible Russian spirit, intense, capricious, a Bacchanale in a pastoral setting! While the finale works into a soaring love song as sweeping as the love death of "Tristan." Six or more recalls thundered approval. Even the orchestra joined in enthusiasm for the great master, a Titan, and artist!

In his program M. Monteux added the exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," of Debussy, giving in all, a pure classic of Haydn in the happy symphony entitled "The Queen of France," and then in relief, the great Russian Romance, this myth of France, and types of Spain in the Enesco "Suite." It revealed analysis, animated by a touch alive and subtle, with complete mastery of detail.

"Intermede" Fascinating.

The orchestra played superbly. The "Prelude in Unison" of Enesco was a great achievement as this entire huge body—like one great instrument—wrought out the vibrant, sweeping color in rich tones and strange tonalities. Fascinating was the "Intermede" with its four-four rhythm against a six-eight.

The rhythmic sway of the Latin is as compelling as the Slav. Into the other worldliness of the "Faun" he put a life and passion, and an individuality that made it new. The symphony was a series of delicious figures of contrast and delicate caprice.

These types stand out strongly stamped as sheer beauty and charm, as atmosphere and wonder, and again as Oriental temperament and tone in counter rhythms that waltzed into a Bacchanale, that held rich harmony in massive chords. M. Monteux offers vital and fine interpretations with that dramatic response that holds his hearers—expectancy.

J. MacB.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Rachmaninoff, Pianist and Soloist, Shares in the Unstinted Applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave the first concert in its Washington series this season at the National Theater yesterday with Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as soloist. The large audience was enthusiastic, and remained until the end of the long program when they recalled M. Monteux several times.

The new conductor arranged an intensely interesting program for yesterday, opening with Haydn's symphony in B flat major, "La Reine de France," followed by the soloist who played his own concerto in D minor, opus 30, No. 3; Debussy's prelude, "L'Apres midi d'un Faune," and a suite for orchestra, opus 9, by Georges Enesco. The symphony was played with charming delicacy and the usual perfect ensemble which has made this organization famous, although the tone of the first violins could have been improved upon in the symphony.

The Enesco suite in an unusual composition, written, through the first three movements, in simple harmonies. In the first movement, for strings and kettledrum, the strings played in unison almost throughout, making an effect of simplicity and great beauty.

Mr. Rachmaninoff was at his best, showing no coldness of tone as in his appearance here last season. The concerto itself is full of beauty of melody and harmonies, is very difficult and fascinating in rhythm, and has a richly orchestrated accompaniment. Mr. Rachmaninoff played with brilliant technic, smooth legato in the melodies and warmth of feeling, making the concerto a work of great beauty and color.

The audience recalled him many times. Mr. Monteux, who will be the conductor of the symphony through the season, conducted the first concert in Washington last season and by his work yesterday strengthened the splendid impression he made then.

K. B.

From Post
Washington, D. C.
NOV 5 - 1919

Music Notes.

The Second Boston Symphony Concert.

As usual, there was a highly representative, as well as large, gathering assembled in the Opera House of the Academy of Music on the occasion of the second in the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, last week Friday evening. And the audience was well rewarded for attending by an agreeably varied program; Russia, Germany, Italy and France were drawn from. Of the evening's pièce de résistance, Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, there is nothing new to be said. The "Pathetic" has stood the test of a little more than a quarter of a century with American concert-goers and it is generally liked. If the average person who hears it is unable to picture in his mind's eye all that Philip Hale so carefully sets down in his program notes, that does not mar particularly the enjoyment of music which speaks a common language. The symphony was well played under the direction of Monteux, who seemed, however, to revel rather more in the intricacies of the only other orchestral number—"La Tragédie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, who was born in Lorraine, of Alsatian parents, in 1870, and therefore is a Frenchman. This "mute drama," in the Paris première of which Loie Fuller danced, really calls for a ballet performance. Nevertheless, the orchestral arrangement of five scenes—with the help of the omnipresent Philip Hale—affords much pleasure, to which the introduction of women's voices behind the scenes adds not a little. "La Tragédie de Salome" was played with fine spirit. Of the three vocal numbers by Louise Homer which immediately preceded it, "O don fatale," that famous old concert war horse from Verdi's "Don Carlos," was brilliantly sung by the great contralto. Over this and over "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the "Ombra mai fù" from Handel's "Xerxes"—music best known to all as the "Largo"—the audience waxed enthusiastic. And with good reason, for Homer is a wonderful singer. So, by the way, is Emilia de Gogorza, who will return to his native Brooklyn to sing at the next Boston Symphony concert—January ninth.

DEC 6 - 1919

From Brooklyn Life
New York City

Madame Homer Boston Symphony Soloist.

Madame Louise Homer will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, December fifth. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

Mail & Empire
From Toronto, Can.

Two important dates in the musical season of Toronto this year are those set aside for the appearance of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, November 26th, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Louise Homer on December 12th. Under the leadership of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Toronto, and a genuine treat is assured. There are 90 players and the event will be one of the finest. Mail orders may be sent to Massey Hall now. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, and Mme. Louise Homer, will be heard December 12th, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Massey Music Hall. The orchestra comprises 104 players, and has already entered upon one of the busiest seasons in its history. The famous prima donna contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera Company to [illegible] warm welcome in Toronto.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 9 - 1919

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Of the five Boston Symphony concert which are to be given in Infantry Hall this year, and for which the sale of subscription seats will close next Wednesday, the opening concert will take place a week from Tuesday, on Nov. 18. The same symphony which Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor, chose to open the season in Boston, will head this concert: Beethoven's graceful and melodious Second Symphony in D Major. Mr. Monteux will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," with which sensuous music he became famous as conductor of the Russian Ballet, scandalizing many. The concert will close with Liszt's most popular Symphonic Poem, "The Prelude," a brilliant and splendidly scored work. As first soloist of the year at the same concert, Emilio de Gogorza, the foremost concert baritone of the day, will sing Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
NOV 23 1919

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble symphony in B flat major, considered one of the master works of French work by the young and highly praised composer, Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." For the rest, Balakiroff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's Bourre's "Fantasque."

Another score of interest will be a new

For the Saturday matinee, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama, "The Tragedey of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number played by request.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 22 1919

The Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on December 4 and 6 will offer, at the former, a novelty by Charles T. Griffes based on Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," and some rather seldom heard French and Russian music; and at the latter Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

RACHMANINOFF IN A NEW CONCERTO

A new piano concerto by Rachmaninoff, played with the composer at the piano, and the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux as conductor, were the two musically important events that brought a capacity audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the first of the five concerts of this orchestra, presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

If M. Monteux continues to give as finely built programs, with the spirit and fineness of his interpretations, this will prove a significant season with the Boston players.

Seldom is one privileged to hear a great creative artist interpret his own work. And Sergei Rachmaninoff is doubly great in that his playing and his creations are both great art. He grips one with the depth of his musicianship, the power that is in him—not in force, but in idea, in all that genius gives which words cannot express. And he sways and thrills one with the mastery and the exquisite pianism of his playing.

It was his third concerto. His second he played here last season. Racial, yet universal, there is such a wealth of imagination in this composition that one would like to program it, rather than say "concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30."

A romance it is, not a tragedy. Pure melody he has given, set in an infinity of entrancing music figures 'til one marveis at the mind that has strung them together in such unity. The orchestra is equally rich in this tone-poem. Varied rhythms, character, warmth of color and vibrancy are in the orchestra. And the piano holds cadenza passages of exquisite runs and trills as of running waters. A ballet moment—a long crescendo—fair dynamic force, and tone-painting of exquisite hue.

Spirit of Russia.

The waltz! It enters into whimsical romance of the second movement with irresistible Russian spirit, intense, capricious, a Bacchanale in a pastoral setting. While the finale works into a soaring love song as sweeping as the love death of "Tristan." Six or more recalls thundered approval. Even the orchestra joined in enthusiasm for the great master, a Titan, and artist!

In his program M. Monteux added the exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," of Debussy, giving in all, a pure classic of Haydn in the happy symphony entitled "The Queen of France," and then in relief, the great Russian Romance, this myth of France, and types of Spain in the Enesco "Suite." It revealed analysis, animated by a touch alive and subtle, with complete mastery of detail.

"Intermede" Fascinating.

The orchestra played superbly. The "Prelude in Unison" of Enesco was a great achievement as this entire huge body like one great instrument—wrought out the vibrant, sweeping color in rich tones and strange tonalities. Fascinating was the "Intermede" with its four-four rhythm against a six-eight.

The rhythmic sway of the Latin is as compelling as the Slav. Into the other worldliness of the "Faun" he put a life and passion, and an individuality that made it new. The symphony was a series of delicious figures of contrast and delicate caprice. These types stand out strongly stamped as sheer beauty and charm, as atmosphere and wonder, and again as Oriental temperament and tone in counter rhythms that waltzed into a Bacchanale, that held rich harmony in massive chords. M. Monteux offers vital and fine interpretations with that dramatic response that holds his hearers' expectancy.

J. MacB.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Boston Symphony Program.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble symphony in B flat major, considered one of the master works of French ..... Another score of interest will be a new work by the young and highly praised composer, Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." For the rest, Balakiroff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's Bourre's "Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama, "The Tragedey of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number played by request.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Rachmaninoff, Pianist and Soloist, Shares in the Unstinted Applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave the first concert in its Washington series this season at the National Theater yesterday with Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as soloist. The large audience was enthusiastic, and remained until the end of the long program when they recalled M. Monteux several times.

The new conductor arranged an intensely interesting program for yesterday, opening with Haydn's symphony in B flat major, "La Reine de France," followed by the soloist who played his own concerto in D minor, opus 30, No. 3; Debussy's prelude, "L'Apres midi d'un Faune," and a suite for orchestra, opus 9, by Georges Enesco. The symphony was played with charming delicacy and the usual perfect ensemble which has made this organization famous, although the tone of the first violins could have been improved upon in the symphony.

The Enesco suite in an unusual composition, written, through the first three movements, in simple harmonies. In the first movement, for strings and kettledrum, the strings played in unison almost throughout, making an effect of simplicity and great beauty.

Mr. Rachmaninoff was at his best, showing no coldness of tone as in his appearance here last season. The concerto itself is full of beauty of melody and harmonies, is very difficult and fascinating in rhythm, and has a richly orchestrated accompaniment. Mr. Rachmaninoff played with brilliant technic, smooth legato in the melodies and warmth of feeling, making the concerto a work of great beauty and color.

The audience recalled him many times. Mr. Monteux, who will be the conductor of the symphony through the season, conducted the first concert in Washington last season and by his work yesterday strengthened the splendid impression he made then.

K. B.

From

Two important dates in the musical season of Toronto this year are those set aside for the appearance of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, November 26th, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Louise Homer on December 12th. Under the leadership of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Toronto, and a genuine treat is assured. There are 90 players and the event will be one of the finest. Mail orders may be sent to Massey Hall now. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Mme. Louise Homer, will be heard December 12th, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Massey Music Hall. The orchestra comprises 101 players, and has already entered upon one of the busiest seasons in its history. The famous prima donna contralto of the Metropolian Opera Company will make a warm welcome in Toronto.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Of the five Boston Symphony concerts which are to be given in Infantry Hall this year, and for which the sale of subscription seats will close next Wednesday, the opening concert will take place a week from Tuesday, on Nov. 18. The same symphony which Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor, chose to open the season in Boston, will head this concert: Beethoven's graceful and melodious Second Symphony in D Major. Mr. Monteux will also play Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's Poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," with which sensuous music he became famous as conductor of the Russian Ballet, scandalizing many. The concert will close with Liszt's most popular Symphonic Poem, "The Prelude," a brilliant and splendidly scored work. As first soloist of the year at the same concert, Emilio de Gogorza, the foremost concert baritone of the day, will sing Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore," and an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

The Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on December 4 and 6 will offer, at the former, a novelty by Charles T. Griffes based on Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," and some rather seldom heard French and Russian music; and at the latter Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

From Brooklyn Life
New York City

Music Notes.

The Second Boston Symphony Concert.

As usual, there was a highly representative, as well as large, gathering assembled in the Opera House of the Academy of Music on the occasion of the second in the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, last week Friday evening. And the audience was well rewarded for attending by an agreeably varied program; Russia, Germany, Italy and France were drawn from. Of the evening's pièce de résistance, Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, there is nothing new to be said. The "Pathetic" has stood the test of a little more than a quarter of a century with American concert-goers and it is generally liked. If the average person who hears it is unable to picture in his mind's eye all that Philip Hale so carefully sets down in his program notes, that does not mar particularly the enjoyment of music which speaks a common language. The symphony was well played under the direction of Monteux, who seemed, however, to revel rather more in the intricacies of the only other orchestral number—"La Tragédie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, who was born in Lorraine, of Alsatian parents, in 1870, and therefore is a Frenchman. This "mute drama," in the Paris première of which Loie Fuller danced, really calls for a ballet performance. Nevertheless, the orchestral arrangement of five scenes—with the help of the omnipresent Philip Hale—affords much pleasure, to which the introduction of women's voices behind the scenes adds not a little. "La Tragédie de Salome" was played with fine spirit. Of the three vocal numbers by Louise Homer which immediately preceded it, "O don fatale," that famous old concert war horse from Verdi's "Don Carlos," was brilliantly sung by the great contralto. Over this and over "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the "Ombra mai fù" from Handel's "Xerxes"—music best known to all as the "Largo"—the audience waxed enthusiastic. And with good reason, for Homer is a wonderful singer. So, by the way, is Emilia de Gogorza, who will return to his native Brooklyn to sing at the next Boston Symphony concert—January ninth.

From Brooklyn Life
New York City

Madame Homer Boston Symphony Soloist.

Madame Louise Homer will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, December fifth. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Fiorent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

HERALD, SATURDA

Y, NOVEMBER 22, BO

HONOR FOUNDER OF SYMPHONY

Orchestra's Sixth Concert Is in Memory of Maj. Higginson

PROGRAM MADE UP OF HIS FAVORITES

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Brahms, Concerto No. 2 for Piano; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5. Felix Fox was the pianist.

This concert was in memory of Maj. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The program was made up of compositions that he especially liked to hear. To discuss the nature of these compositions without regard to the performance, if any discussion were needed, would now be out of place. The symphonies have long been regarded as the full expressions of the composer's characteristics and they are familiar to all lovers of music. The concerto had been performed nearly a dozen times at these concerts. It was heard in the more recent years three times in succession: in 1916, 1917, 1918. The performances by Josephy and Adele aus der Ohe are gratefully remembered by the older concert-goers; the performances by Messrs. Bauer and Gabrilowitsch are fresh in the memory.

It is not out of place to praise the interpretation of the symphonies and the concerto by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. Mr. Monteux had before this shown that a Frenchman can be as eloquent an interpreter of the great German masters as of the modern and ultra-modern French; but yesterday he revealed new strength and beauty in the fragment of Schubert's Symphony—unfortunately for the world it is a fragment, for it is doubtful whether Schubert could have sustained his lofty flight to the end—and not within our recollection have the grandeur, the mystic[illegible] and the triumphant exaltation of the Fifth Symphony been so boldly brought before one.

Too many conductors regard only the lyrical side of Schubert's genius; they soften or ignore his dramatic intensity, forgetting that among his songs are the "Doppelgaenger," "Atlas," "The Dwarf," not to mention other masterpieces of a robust and even wild imagination. M. Vincent d'Indy, a stickler for form, deplores the fact that Schubert died before he had taken lessons in counterpoint of Simon Sechter, and does not hesitate to say that Schubert's symphonic works have, for the most part, only a mediocre interest; works injured by the absolute want of order, proportion, and general harmonious arrangement." It is true that many of Schubert's compositions are diffuse; that in them he was charmingly and at last tiresomely garrulous; but this reproach cannot be urged against the first movement of the "Unfinished." Here is music that is much more than

"Notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out."

Mr. Monteux not only felt the dramatic intensity, the passion of certain pages, but, by his art, his personal authority, and his magnetism, the audience felt with him.

In like manner the fiery, self-torturing first Allegro of Beethoven was no longer taken smugly for granted as a long esteemed composition by a justly respected musician: it was as vital and modern as if the great war had inspired a genius. (In fact, as the whole symphony was performed yesterday, it deserves the title "Eroica" more than the third, with its final variations). The transition from the Scherzo to the Finale is a test of a conductor's vision. Here again Mr. Monteux triumphed in his solving of this crux. After the double-bass figure—"the gambols of a frolicsome elephant," to quote Berlioz—come those strange, sinister measures of preparation for the superb tonal outburst. After this outburst the problem is how to maintain the spirit of exultation to the end, without drooping, without halting. Mr. Monteux clearly showed that this problem is not without a convincing, stirring solution.

Mr. Fox, a pianist of clear, fluent, polished technic, also an excellent musician, was called on at the eleventh hour to play the piano part of Brahms's voluminous concerto. The task for one that has long been in readiness is an arduous one. Mr. Fox acquitted himself with pleasure to the hearers and with credit to himself. A feature of the performance was the playing by Mr. Bedetti of the violoncello solo in the andante, playing that ravished the ear by tonal beauty and richness and wholly satisfied the musical understanding.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chausson, symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra; Beethoven, "Nature's Adoration"; Handel, "Ombra Mai Fu," from "Xerxes"; Bach, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; [illegible], "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla"; [illegible] symphonic poem (after the poem [illegible] first performance; Verdi, [illegible] from "Don Carlos"; [illegible] Fantasque."

BOSTON POST, SAT

NOVEMBER 22,

MEMORIAL CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Higginson's Loved Pieces Are Played —Fox Is Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The sixth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was "In memory of Henry Lee Higginson (Nov. 18, 1834-Nov. 14, 1919), Founder and Sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The programme was made of compositions which Major Higginson particularly loved. This was the only ceremonial attached to what was essentially a memorial concert, and it was the only kind of ceremonial—the performance, which Major Higginson made possible, of noble music—which would be adequate to the occasion.

FELIX FOX, PIANIST

This programme consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Brahms' B-flat piano concerto and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Felix Fox of this city took the solo piano part of one of the most difficult of all piano concertos at very short notice, and was warmly and deservedly applauded for his accomplishment.

The symphony of Schubert was superbly interpreted by Mr. Monteux with justness of pace, dramatic accent, romantic feeling, as also in the noble serenity and melancholy of the slow movement. Mr. Monteux is gaining gradually the repute of an exceptionally sympathetic student of the classics, as well as a brilliant exponent of modern works with which his name has been particularly associated—witness his performance not only of this music, but of the orchestral part of the Brahms concerto. We have seldom heard so sympathetic and totally beautiful a performance of the Schubert symphony.

Mr. Fox's Performance

Then came the heroic music of Brahms. The B-flat piano concerto is rugged, powerful in its developments, at times harshly or thickly colored, and in every way uncompromising so far as effort to please the public is concerned. Therefore, this concerto has waited long for public recognition, which it is slowly but surely gaining. Mr. Fox by his musicianship presented the music with uncommon clearness and understanding. He had a very difficult and, in a sense, ungrateful task. The concerto, in professional parlance, is not "pianistic"—does not lend itself well to effective performance on the piano. It requires of the pianist temperament and imagination backed by extraordinary intellectual understanding, interpretative power and a very extensive technic.

Mr. Fox understood these qualities of the music and met them with resource which constantly became greater as the performance went on and he warmed to his work. Not only is the concerto heroic: it is a heroic deed for any man to essay a performance of it with three or four days for preparation. Therefore, no doubt, Mr. Fox used music. It would be a good thing if more pianists, even when they had ample time to prepare a concerto, would use their music, thus giving themselves as well as their audience greater mental security and ease during the performance. The poetic slow movement of the concerto, in particular, made a deep impression, and the finale was played with appropriate humor and exhilaration. Mr. Fox was repeatedly recalled.

Beethoven's Fifth

Mr. Monteux's performance of the fifth symphony was dramatic and passionate to a degree. There was not a dull moment in it. The famous "fermatas" of the first movement had uncommon force and grip. The feeling was contagious. The second movement seemed pleasantly shortened; the ominous scherzo, the shouts of triumph, the noble march of the last movement, made a great effect. For the writer, nevertheless, there was too precipitate a pace in the first movement and there was seldom the marvellous union of elemental power and fury and at the same time a profound underlying strength and very deep down the quality of repose—repose which, in Beethoven's stormiest moods, yet remains, as the bottomless depths of the ocean remain in repose, however terrible the tempest that tortures the surface of the deep. Nor are we among the majority who feel it reasonable and advisable to double brass and wood in this symphony. Last season, in an unforgettable performance of this work, Mr. Rabaud showed what could be done with Beethoven's orchestra as it was originally devised.

These are details concerning which musicians may differ. What was deeply felt was the inherent grandeur of the music, and the spirit of the great, simple man who, like the composer, had won his battles, triumphed and marched on.

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF MAJ HIGGINSON

Symphony's Tribute to Founder of Orchestra

The program of this week's Symphony concerts is in memory of Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, who died on Nov 14. It is made up of pieces which were his especial favorites, none of them funeracl in character.

To both orchestra and audience the concert yesterday afternoon was one without parallel, which will be long remembered. Never again in Symphony Hall will there be occasion for an equally solemn and beautiful tribute, since no one else can ever do for the Symphony Orchestra anything comparable to what its founder did.

The first of the chosen numbers was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance given yesterday called to mind the perfect playing by the Flonzaley Quartet of the Adagio from Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, under similar circumstances, at a concert in memory of their founder and sustainer, Mr De Coppet, several years ago.

The familiar music sounded as it never has before. Words are inadequate to describe its beauty. One wondered whether it could have been better played in heaven. It never has been in this world. The orchestra has sometimes seemed to surpass itself on other occasions, but it is doubtful whether its founder ever heard it play anything as well as it played this symphony yesterday.

Moments of escape from human limitations are rare, and the "clouds of glory" had faded before Brahms' Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, the next number on the program, was begun.

Mr Felix Fox, called on at very short notice to take the piano part, gave a surprisingly good performance of the exceptionally difficult music. Except that he had the score before him there was nothing which showed that he had not been preparing for months to play it, instead of for only three days.

Many far more noted virtuosi have given less admirable performances of this concerto at Symphony concerts here. He made the piano what Brahms meant it to be, a part of the orchestra, not a solo instrument with orchestral acompaniment. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part equally well, but the total result was only the usual admirable performance heard with satisfaction, not a thing apart from routine.

The concluding number was, like Schubert's "Unfinished," among the best-loved of symphonies for many others besides Maj Higginson. It was Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor, which the orchestra has played oftener than any other symphony, always to eager audiences.

All the tragedy, irony and beauty of life fill this music. It reaches at times, as in the last few pages of the scherzo, heights unattained by other masters.

The performance yesterday, however, fell short of perfection. The first movement was taken at too rapid a pace, which made it seem a petulant, rather than a tragic outburst. The andante, too, lacked the underlying massive solidity given by gradually mounting and broadening phrases. Only the finale was played with the requisite restrained eloquence and intimation of inexhaustible reserves of strength. But the time for rehearsals had been unduly short.

Louise Homer will be the soloist next week, and the symphony is to be Chausson's, in B-flat major. The memorial program will be given again tonight at 8.

SWEDISH CHILDREN MADE

Monitor Nov 22

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The musical week in Boston has brought forth two pianists and two singers of interest. George Smith, who made his first public appearance, gives promise of becoming an artist of fine quality. That he possesses an adequate tech[illegible] seldom heard.

Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Beethoven's fifth and the second pianoforte concert by Brahms, all favorites of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra, formed this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux discovered new beauties in the "Unfinished" symphony. His reading was poetic and the playing of the orchestra, especially in the wood wind was a delight. The immortal fifth was given a spirited performance. There were no attempts at "new readings." The music was permitted to speak its message without interferance, for which let us thank Mr. Monteux. Felix Fox was the pianist in the Brahms concerto. Playing at short notice, Mr. Fox cannot fairly be judged by this performance. He is well and favorably known as a pianist and it was unfortunate that he attempted so long and difficult a work without more preparation. The concert at its best is but a poor medium for a pianist.

PAY HONOR TO MEMORY OF HIGGINSON

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Felix Fox, pianist, soloist; sixth concert of the season at Symphony Hall. The program:

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Brahms—Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

The performance was given in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program consisted of three of his favorite works selected for yesterday's program by Mrs. Higginson. The occasion was highly impressive. The spirit of the great patron of the arts, who has done so much to fill with happiness the lives of thousands, who live in our midst, was present. The music had new meaning. How dear is the music that has delighted the souls of our benefactors!

"He built for himself," said Mr. Hale in his program book, "a monument; not of marble or bronze to his own glory, but a sonorous, euphoninic, eloquent witness to his love for music, his generosity, his regard for his fellowmen."

This great gift of Maj. Higginson to his city sang his praises. The inspiring peace, the fairyland loveliness of the Schubert symphony praised him.

What a gift to his fellow man, an orchestra to play those glorious pages of the C minor symphony which are the very heart, the very soul, the very mind, the very genius of Beethoven!

There is an unwritten law that occasions such as that of yesterday shall not be the subject of routine criticism. There are plenty of times to wrangle concerning the tempo at which the C minor symphony should be taken and the prominence that should be gien to the pianoforte in the Brahms concerto. There will be opportunity every time the Schubert symphony is played to compare the poetry of Conductor A's interpretation with Conductor B's.

The Higginson memorial concert will be remembered not for the brilliancy of its performance or the glory of the three great masterpieces which constituted it, but as opportunity when those of us who love music and who owe an inestimable debt to Henry Lee Higginson could gather to pay pay respect to his memory.

American Nov 22

[illegible] WATSON - CONNELLY, N.Y.C.

FELIX FOX SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By FRED J. McISAAC

During the forty years that Major Henry L. Higginson supported the Boston Symphony Orchestra he never dictated a program to any of his long line of great conductors.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played a program of three favorite compositions of the major, three numbers suggested by his wife. They Were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony Brahms' Concerto Number Two in B flat major, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Such a thoroughly Teutonic program had not been heard within these walls since the eclipse of Dr. Muck, and that Pierre Monteaux, the French conductor, performed them with the greatest reverence and appreciation was proof of the respect in which the memory of the founder was held, and that after all, music is not racial or national.

You have to be such a musical enthusiast as was Major Higginson who rarely missed a concert during the four decades his orchestra existed to love the Brahms concerto. It is exquisite in patches but interminably long, and much of it is dry and prosy, at least to my Pagan ears. Pianists who play it are not found on every bush, and it was placed on the program at only forty-eight hours' notice. Fortunately Felix Fox, the Boston pianist and teacher, knew the work and got it ready at a few hours' notice. Mr. Fox played brilliantly and followed the the traditions of the piece most faithfully, but Monteux's beat was a trifle slow. Aside from a few very excusable technical faults he gave a highly creditable performance.

The Andante of the Unfinished Symphony is better suited to such an occasion than any funeral march. Major Higginson loved it dearly. And the beautiful and inspired Fifth Symphony of Beethoven gave the concert a charming close.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1801 NOV 17

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HIGGINSON INHERITANCE

THE debt which music in America owes to the late Major Henry L. Higginson is incalculable. He gave a fortune to foster both the art and appreciation of it, but the esthetic and spiritualizing forces which he thereby set in motion cannot be measured in terms of money. Major Higginson with his bounty, Theodore Thomas with his genius and enthusiasm were architects of the now refining structure of American musical taste.

The misfortunes of the Boston Symphony at the outbreak of the war profoundly shocked its idealistic patron. Karl Muck was but a temporary stain. He could not overturn Major Higginson's monument, reared not only in Boston but in Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, Detroit, San Francisco—every large city which developed a noble orchestra.

Philadelphia is justly proud of its fine organization. The men who have made it are among the inheritors of the Higginson inspiration. How invigorating, different it all was from the testamentary munificence of the "my-name-on-every-brick" variety!

Traveler Nov 22

SYMPHONY PAYS TRIBUTE TO ITS FOUNDER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Peirre Monteux conductor, paid its tribute to the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, by a memorial concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was: Shubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Brahms' Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, all favorite numbers of Maj. Higginson. Felix Fox was at the piano.

One could scarcely have asked for a more impressive memorial. The numbers were beautifully played, Mr. Monteux and his orchestra bringing out every possible point. Mr. Fox was notably successful at the piano.

Transcript Nov 21

Mr. Monteux's Next Programme

Released from commemorative rites, Mr. Monteux proposes a promising programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week. They will begin with Chausson's symphony, added to the repertory of the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, sustained there by his successors, last played two seasons and more ago under Dr. Muck. In the whole range of Parisian symphonies in our day, only Franck's and d'Indy's second are comparable with it in exaltation of mood and eloquence of voice. Mr. Monteux does well to play it once more. The second orchestral piece of the programme is new music by a relatively new composer, Mr. C. T. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan" suggested by Coleridge's little remembered verse. Hitherto in Boston, Mr. Griffes has been known only by a few songs and short piano-pieces. They have sufficed, however, to indicate him as one of the more imaginative and individual of younger American composers. The final orchestral number is Chabrier's sharply rhythmic and warmly colored "Bourrée Fantasque" as scored from the original piano-piece by the admiring Mottl. Between these symphonic pieces Mme. Homer will sing the air from Bach, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; the air from Händel's opera, "Xerxes," best known in orchestral arrangement as his Largo; Beethoven's song, "Nature's Adoration"; and the air, "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera, "Don Carlos." In all or nearly all these numbers Mme. Homer has already been heard and applauded at the Symphony Concerts. Why, then, take the pains to "get up" new pieces? For no reason at all, if one happens to be a well-liked—and none too ambitious—singer.

Items and Announcements

The Symphony Concerts of Friday, Nov. 28, and Saturday, Nov. 29, will be the last that the orchestra will undertake at home for three weeks—the longest break in the annual series that the longest memory may recall. During the first week in December it will make the monthly journey to New York, Philadelphia and other cities southward. Thence—and contrary to custom—it will go westward to Pittsburg, Buffalo and neighboring cities for another week of concerts. Conductor and men will not return to Boston until Sunday, Dec. 14, to be heard again at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20.

HERALD, SATURDA... BOSTON POST, SAT... Record Nov 22

...Y, NOVEMBER 22, BO... NOVEMBER 22,

HONOR FOUNDER OF SYMPHONY

Orchestra's Sixth Concert Is in Memory of Maj. Higginson

PROGRAM MADE UP OF HIS FAVORITES

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Brahms, Concerto No. 2 for Piano; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5. Felix Fox was the pianist.

This concert was in memory of Maj. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The program was made up of compositions that he especially liked to hear. To discuss the nature of these compositions without regard to the performance, if any discussion were needed, would now be out of place. The symphonies have long been regarded as the full expressions of the composer's characteristics and they are familiar to all lovers of music. The concerto had been performed nearly a dozen times at these concerts. It was heard in the more recent years three times in succession: in 1916, 1917, 1918. The performances by Josephy and Adele aus der Ohe are gratefully remembered by the older concert-goers; the performances by Messrs. Bauer and Gabrilowitsch are fresh in the memory.

It is not out of place to praise the interpretation of the symphonies and the concerto by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. Mr. Monteux had before this shown that a Frenchman can be as eloquent an interpreter of the great German masters as of the modern and ultra-modern French; but yesterday he revealed new strength and beauty in the fragment of Schubert's Symphony—fortunately for the world it is a fragment, for it is doubtful whether Schubert could have sustained his lofty flights to the end—and not within our recollection have the grandeur, the mystery and the triumphant exaltation of the Fifth Symphony been so boldly brought before one.

Too many conductors regard only the lyrical side of Schubert's genius; they soften or ignore his dramatic intensity, forgetting that among his songs are the "Doppelgaenger," "Atlas," "The Dwarf," not to mention other masterpieces of a robust and even wild imagination. M. Vincent d'Indy, a stickler for form, deplores the fact that Schubert died before he had taken lessons in counterpoint of Simon Sechter, and does not hesitate to say that Schubert's symphonic works have, for the most part, only a mediocre interest; works injured by the absolute want of order, proportion, and general harmonious arrangement." It is true that many of Schubert's compositions are diffuse; that in them he was charmingly and at last tiresomely garrulous; but this reproach cannot be urged against the first movement of the "Unfinished." Here is music that is much more than

"Notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out."

Mr. Monteux not only felt the dramatic intensity, the passion of certain pages, but, by his art, his personal authority, and his magnetism, the audience felt with him.

In like manner the fiery, self-torturing first Allegro of Beethoven was no longer taken smugly for granted as a long esteemed composition by a justly respected musician: it was as vital and modern as if the great war had inspired a genius. (In fact, as the whole symphony was performed yesterday, it deserves the title "Eroica" more than the third, with its final variations). The transition from the Scherzo to the Finale is a test of a conductor's vision. Here again Mr. Monteux triumphed in his solving of this crux. After the double-bass figure—"the gambols of a frolicsome elephant," to quote Berlioz—come those strange, sinister measures of preparation for the superb tonal outburst. After this outburst the problem is how to maintain the spirit of exultation to the end, without drooping, without halting. Mr. Monteux clearly showed that this problem is not without a convincing, stirring solution.

Mr. Fox, a pianist of clear, fluent, polished technic, also an excellent musician, was called on at the eleventh hour to play the piano part of Brahms's voluminous concerto. The task for one that has long been in readiness is an arduous one. Mr. Fox acquitted himself with pleasure to the hearers and with credit to himself. A feature of the performance was the playing by Mr. Bedetti of the violoncello solo in the andante, playing that ravished the ear by tonal beauty and richness and wholly satisfied the musical understanding.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chausson, symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra; Beethoven, "Nature's Adoration"; Handel, "Ombra Mai Fu," from "Xerxes"; Bach, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; Debussy, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla"; Mottl, symphonic poem (after the poem in the first performance; Verdi, the confirmation from "Don Carlos"; [illegible] and testa[illegible] infants, if any, free Fantasque." [illegible] a special [illegible] the singer. [illegible] red to appe[illegible] en of the prob[illegible]

MEMORIAL CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Higginson's Loved Pieces Are Played —Fox Is Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The sixth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was "In memory of Henry Lee Higginson (Nov. 18, 1834-Nov. 14, 1919), Founder and Sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The programme was made of compositions which Major Higginson particularly loved. This was the only ceremonial attached to what was essentially a memorial concert, and it was the only kind of ceremonial—the performance, which Major Higginson made possible, of noble music—which would be adequate to the occasion.

FELIX FOX, PIANIST

This programme consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Brahms' B-flat piano concerto and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Felix Fox of this city took the solo piano part of one of the most difficult of all piano concertos at very short notice, and was warmly and deservedly applauded for his accomplishment.

The symphony of Schubert was superbly interpreted by Mr. Monteux with justness of pace, dramatic accent, romantic feeling, as also in the noble serenity and melancholy of the slow movement. Mr. Monteux is gaining gradually the repute of an exceptionally sympathetic student of the classics, as well as a brilliant exponent of modern works with which his name has been particularly associated—witness his performance not only of this music, but of the orchestral part of the Brahms concerto. We have seldom heard so sympathetic and totally beautiful a performance of the Schubert symphony.

Mr. Fox's Performance

Then came the heroic music of Brahms. The B-flat piano concerto is rugged, powerful in its developments, at times harshly or thickly colored, and in every way uncompromising so far as effort to please the public is concerned. Therefore, this concerto has waited long for public recognition, which it is slowly but surely gaining. Mr. Fox by his musicianship presented the music with uncommon clearness and understanding. He had a very difficult and, in a sense, ungrateful task. The concerto, in professional parlance, is not "pianistic"—does not lend itself well to effective performance on the piano. It requires of the pianist temperament and imagination backed by extraordinary intellectual understanding, interpretative power and a very extensive technic.

Mr. Fox understood these qualities of the music and met them with resource which constantly became greater as the performance went on and he warmed to his work. Not only is the concerto heroic: it is a heroic deed for any man to essay a performance of it with three or four days for preparation. Therefore, no doubt, Mr. Fox used music. It would be a good thing if more pianists, even when they had ample time to prepare a concerto, would use their music, thus giving themselves as well as their audience greater mental security and ease during the performance. The poetic slow movement of the concerto, in particular, made a deep impression, and the finale was played with appropriate humor and exhilaration. Mr. Fox was repeatedly recalled.

Beethoven's Fifth

Mr. Monteux's performance of the fifth symphony was dramatic and passionate to a degree. There was not a dull moment in it. The famous "fermatas" of the first movement had uncommon force and grip. The feeling was contagious. The second movement seemed pleasantly shortened; the ominous scherzo, the shouts of triumph, the noble march of the last movement, made a great effect. For the writer, nevertheless, there was too precipitate a pace in the first movement and there was seldom the marvellous union of elemental power and fury and at the same time a profound underlying strength and very deep down the quality of repose—repose which, in Beethoven's stormiest moods, yet remains, as the bottomless depths of the ocean remain in repose, however terrible the tempest that tortures the surface of the deep. Nor are we among the majority who feel it reasonable and advisable to double brass and wood in this symphony. Last season, in an unforgettable performance of this work, Mr. Rabaud showed what could be done with Beethoven's orchestra as it was originally devised.

These are details concerning which musicians may differ. What was deeply felt was the inherent grandeur of the music, and the spirit of the great, simple man who, like the composer, had won his battles, triumphed and marched on.

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF MAJ HIGGINSON

Symphony's Tribute to Founder of Orchestra

The program of this week's Symphony concerts is in memory of Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, who died on Nov 14. It is made up of pieces which were his especial favorites, none of them funeracl in character.

To both orchestra and audience the concert yesterday afternoon was one without parallel, which will be long remembered. Never again in Symphony Hall will there be occasion for an equally solemn and beautiful tribute, since no one else can ever do for the Symphony Orchestra anything comparable to what its founder did.

The first of the chosen numbers was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance given yesterday called to mind the perfect playing by the Flonzaley Quartet of the Adagio from Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, under similar circumstances, at a concert in memory of their founder and sustainer, Mr De Coppet, several years ago.

The familiar music sounded as it never has before. Words are inadequate to describe its beauty. One wondered whether it could have been better played in heaven. It never has been in this world. The orchestra has sometimes seemed to surpass itself on other occasions, but it is doubtful whether its founder ever heard it play anything as well as it played this symphony yesterday.

Moments of escape from human limitations are rare, and the "clouds of glory" had faded before Brahms' Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, the next number on the program, was begun.

Mr Felix Fox, called on at very short notice to take the piano part, gave a surprisingly good performance of the exceptionally difficult music. Except that he had the score before him there was nothing which showed that he had not been preparing for months to play it, instead of for only three days.

Many far more noted virtuosi have given less admirable performances of this concerto at Symphony concerts here. He made the piano what Brahms meant it to be, a part of the orchestra, not a solo instrument with orchestral acompaniment. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part equally well, but the total result was only the usual admirable performance heard with satisfaction, not a thing apart from routine.

The concluding number was, like Schubert's "Unfinished," among the best-loved of symphonies for many others besides Maj Higginson. It was Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor, which the orchestra has played oftener than any other symphony, always to eager audiences.

All the tragedy, irony and beauty of life fill this music. It reaches at times, as in the last few pages of the scherzo, heights unattained by other masters.

The performance yesterday, however, fell short of perfection. The first movement was taken at too rapid a pace, which made it seem a petulant, rather than a tragic outburst. The andante, too, lacked the underlying massive solidity given by gradually mounting and broadening phrases. Only the finale was played with the requisite restrained eloquence and intimation of inexhaustible reserves of strength. But the time for rehearsals had been unduly short.

Louise Homer will be the soloist next week, and the symphony is to be Chausson's, in B-flat major. The memorial program will be given again tonight at 8.

SWEDISH CHILDREN MADE

Monitor Nov 22

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The musical week in Boston has brought forth two pianists and two singers of interest. George Smith, who made his first public appearance, gives promise of becoming an artist of fine quality. That he possesses an adequate tech-

[illegible] seldom heard.

Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Beethoven's fifth and the second pianoforte concert by Brahms, all favorites of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra, formed this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux discovered new beauties in the "Unfinished" symphony. His reading was poetic and the playing of the orchestra, especially in the wood wind was a delight. The immortal fifth was given a spirited performance. There were no attempts at "new readings." The music was permitted to speak its message without interferance, for which let us thank Mr. Monteux. Felix Fox was the pianist in the Brahms concerts. Playing at short notice, Mr. Fox cannot fairly be judged by this performance. He is well and favorably known as a pianist and it was unfortunate that he attempted so long and difficult a work without more preparation. The concert at its best is but a poor medium for a pianist.

PAY HONOR TO MEMORY OF HIGGINSON

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Felix Fox, pianist, soloist; sixth concert of the season at Symphony Hall. The program:

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Brahms—Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

The performance was given in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program consisted of three of his favorite works selected for yesterday's program by Mrs. Higginson. The occasion was highly impressive. The spirit of the great patron of the arts, who has done so much to fill with happiness the lives of thousands, who live in our midst, was present. The music had new meaning. How dear is the music that has delighted the souls of our benefactors!

"He built for himself," said Mr. Hale in his program book, "a monument; not of marble or bronze to his own glory, but a sonorous, euphoninic, eloquent witness to his love for music, his generosity, his regard for his fellowmen."

This great gift of Maj. Higginson to his city sang his praises. The inspiring peace, the fairyland loveliness of the Schubert symphony praised him.

What a gift to his fellow man, an orchestra to play those glorious pages of the C minor symphony which are the very heart, the very soul, the very mind, the very genius of Beethoven!

There is an unwritten law that occasions such as that of yesterday shall not be the subject of routine criticism. There are plenty of times to wrangle concerning the tempo at which the C minor symphony should be taken and the prominence that should be gien to the pianoforte in the Brahms concerto. There will be opportunity every time the Schubert symphony is played to compare the poetry of Conductor A's interpretation with Conductor B's.

The Higginson memorial concert will be remembered not for the brilliancy of its performance or the glory of the three great masterpieces which constituted it, but as opportunity when those of us who love music and who owe an inestimable debt to Henry Lee Higginson could gather to pay pay respect to his memory.

American Nov 22

FELIX FOX SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By FRED J. McISAAC

During the forty years that Major Henry L. Higginson supported the Boston Symphony Orchestra he never dictated a program to any of his long line of great conductors.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played a program of three favorite compositions of the major, three numbers suggested by his wife. They Were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony Brahms' Concerto Number Two in B flat major, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Such a thoroughly Teutonic program had not been heard within these walls since the eclipse of Dr. Muck, and that Pierre Monteaux, the French conductor, performed them with the greatest reverence and appreciation was proof of the respect in which the memory of the founder was held, and that after all, music is not racial or national.

You have to be such a musical enthusiast as was Major Higginson who rarely missed a concert during the four decades his orchestra existed to love the Brahms concerto. It is exquisite in patches but interminably long, and much of it is dry and prosy, at least to my Pagan ears. Pianists who play it are not found on every bush, and it was placed on the program at only forty-eight hours' notice. Fortunately Felix Fox, the Boston pianist and teacher, knew the work and got it ready at a few hours' notice. Mr. Fox played brilliantly and followed the the traditions of the piece most faithfully, but Monteux's beat was a trifle slow. Aside from a few very excusable technical faults he gave a highly creditable performance.

The Andante of the Unfinished Symphony is better suited to such an occasion than any funeral march. Major Higginson loved it dearly. And the beautiful and inspired Fifth Symphony of Beethoven gave the concert a charming close.

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1801 NOV 17

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HIGGINSON INHERITANCE

THE debt which music in America owes to the late Major Henry L. Higginson is incalculable. He gave a fortune to foster both the art and appreciation of it, but the esthetic and spiritualizing forces which he thereby set in motion cannot be measured in terms of money. Major Higginson, with his bounty, Theodore Thomas with his genius and enthusiasm were architects of the now refining structure of American musical taste.

The misfortunes of the Boston Symphony at the outbreak of the war profoundly shocked its idealistic patron. Karl Muck was but a temporary stain. He could not overturn Major Higginson's monument, reared not only in Boston but in Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, Detroit, San Francisco—in every large city which developed a noble orchestra.

Philadelphia is justly proud of its fine organization. The men who have made it are among the inheritors of the Higginson inspiration. How invigorating different it all was from the testamentary munificence of the "my-name-on-every-brick" variety!

Traveler Nov 22

SYMPHONY PAYS TRIBUTE TO ITS FOUNDER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Peirre Monteux conductor, paid its tribute to the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, by a memorial concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was: Shubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Brahms' Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, all favorite numbers of Maj. Higginson. Felix Fox was at the piano.

One could scarcely have asked for a more impressive memorial. The numbers were beautifully played, Mr. Monteux and his orchestra bringing out every possible point. Mr. Fox was notably successful at the piano.

Transcript Nov 21

Mr. Monteux's Next Programme

Released from commemorative rites, Mr. Monteux proposes a promising programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week. They will begin with Chausson's symphony, added to the repertory of the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, sustained there by his successors, last played two seasons and more ago under Dr. Muck. In the whole range of Parisian symphonies in our day, only Franck's and d'Indy's second are comparable with it in exaltation of mood and eloquence of voice. Mr. Monteux does well to play it once more. The second orchestral piece of the programme is new music by a relatively new composer, Mr. C. T. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan" suggested by Coleridge's little remembered verse. Hitherto in Boston, Mr. Griffes has been known only by a few songs and short piano-pieces. They have sufficed, however, to indicate him as one of the more imaginative and individual of younger American composers. The final orchestral number is Chabrier's sharply rhythmic and warmly colored "Bourrée Fantasque" as scored from the original piano-piece by the admiring Mottl. Between these symphonic pieces Mme. Homer will sing the air from Bach, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; the air from Händel's opera, "Xerxes," best known in orchestral arrangement as his Largo; Beethoven's song, "Nature's Adoration"; and the air, "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera, "Don Carlos." In all or nearly all these numbers Mme. Homer has already been heard and applauded at the Symphony Concerts. Why, then, take the pains to "get up" new pieces? For no reason at all, if one happens to be a well-liked—and none too ambitious—singer.

Items and Announcements

The Symphony Concerts of Friday, Nov. 28, and Saturday, Nov. 29, will be the last that the orchestra will undertake at home for three weeks—the longest break in the annual series that the longest memory may recall. During the first week in December it will make the monthly journey to New York, Philadelphia and other cities southward. Thence—and contrary to custom—it will go westward to Pittsburg, Buffalo and neighboring cities for another week of concerts. Conductor and men will not return to Boston until Sunday, Dec. 14, to be heard again at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20.

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

COMMEMORATION BRINGS ALSO INNOVATION

Closed Doors Upon a Symphony as Possible Precedent for the Future—Music of Schubert in a Beauty and Passion Worthy of an Unusual Occasion—Vigorously Dramatized Beethoven—The Impossible Task of an Exacting and Hastily Prepared Concerto

SCHUBERT'S Unfinished Symphony began the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon as first item in a programme designed to honor the memory of the late Mr. Higginson as founder of the orchestra in 1881, as financial sustainer of it until it was reorganized in the autumn of 1918. Between the two movements—for the first time in the longest memory at Symphony Hall—the doors were not opened for the tardy, though they received a somewhat longer grace than usual in a late beginning. Thus, only a brief pause separated the two divisions of the fragment; the music flowed, as the composer designed it, in virtually continuous stream; neither players nor hearers were disturbed by late-comers trooping down the aisles to their seats, saluting acquaintances along the way and finally "settling themselves" for the afternoon. In fact, the whole audience, timely warned of this departure from routine on an unusual occasion, was in its place before Mr. Monteux lifted his stick for the first measure. Such uninterrupted performance clearly heightened for all concerned the pleasure of the music and the performance.

According to the management, the innovation was only an incident of the day; but if it is possible for the audience to assemble promptly on one occasion, why should it not do likewise on others, and why should not that management gently, yet persistently persuade it to such courtesy? It is Mr. Monteux's custom, as it was Dr. Muck's before him, to set the symphony of the afternoon at the beginning of the concert. After the first movement the tardy are wont to provide a noisy interlude sometimes three or four minutes long; after the succeeding movements these intermezzi gradually diminish until by the end of the whole symphony the whole audience is seated. Obviously these delays and intrusions hamper the continuity and illusion of music and performance, vex the conductor intent upon his task and sensitive withal, distract and irritate not a few eager and absorbed listeners.

Now, once upon a time, it was the custom to wear hats and bonnets at the Symphony Concerts. There were rumors that the management was about to insist upon the removal of coverings for the head. "How dare it?" was the retort of many august dames and damsels. It dared quietly, politely persisted, finally prevailed. Probably like good fortune would reward it did it insist upon unopened doors through the first number upon the programme, even though it were a symphony thirty or forty minutes long. Grumbling would die away into submission; submission would fructify into habitual promptness; and no superfluous interludes would disturb the progress of symphony or suite. To write these things, moreover, is not to forget the unforeseen and unescapable delays that may befall any of us, however foresighted and well-intentioned, on our way to Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday. They, however, like most incidents of living, are the luck of the day, to be taken casually, amusedly.

Another departure from routine begun yesterday, likewise abates a long-standing and increasing irritation about which the management has recently received much complaint. It has been the custom of the tardy to beguile their waiting with lively, high-pitched, amusingly intimate conversation and seemingly to place themselves for that diversion as near as possible to the closed doors. In a single afternoon those sitting near them within the hall have readily learned that John's "flier" in the stock market was not too lucrative and that Jane's conduct toward eligible suitors leaves something to be desired. Moreover, when Josepha confides these mischances to Antoinette, "you dear old thing," her tones are often shrill and by no means keyed to the symphony by Schumann or d'Indy in progress on the other side of none too thick doors. So much has this annoyance increased of late on the fringes of the auditorium, so resentful has been complaint about it, that over every entrance now stands a sign: "Silence Requested." These signs are there to stay. For within the velvet glove of the management of the Symphony Concerts is the firm hand that seeks the ways of perfection. And little things do count in weekly pleasure to the audience, in weekly zest in conductor and orchestra.

Designed as has been said to honor the memory of Mr. Higginson, the concert of yesterday in itself was rather a rite of mourning and remembrance than a public performance of symphonic music in the usual sense of the words, in the ordinary course of the season. At the request of his family and his intimates the programme traversed two pieces which, as many frequenters of Symphony Hall knew, he heard with endless pleasure before he forsook the concerts—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Between them stood a third music to which, it seems, he listened almost as gladly—Brahms's concerto in B-flat for piano and orchestra. These numbers, of course, displaced the programme which Mr. Monteux had proposed and partially prepared the week, compelled him to revise mate[rially] by the lists of pieces arranged for [illegible] undertake in other cities, and exacted strenuous rehearsal of the concerto and the two symphonies from conductor and players. Since the concert was a ceremony of mourning and since it was made ready under difficult circumstance, it were unbecoming to record and test it in the usual terms and processes of reviewing.

Yet it would be as unbecoming to leave unnoted the renewed, the enhancing beauty with which conductor and orchestra clothed Schubert's fragments. For the time they regained the golden tone, sensitive and supple, rich, euphonious and translucent, which of old was a chief glory of the band; while Mr. Monteux himself plied upon the music the divination which is the conductor's crown—enkindling force upon his men, transporting illusion upon his audience. At his hands, the music spoke with manifold and exalted voice—in serene and songful flow, in shadowed melancholy, in impatient and passionate intensity, in the warm glow, the penetrating strangeness of romantic vision. Nowhere has Schubert written more moody a music, nowhere a symphonic music of such sustained yet diverse emotion. From it springs the beauty of instrumental song that was the fountain of his youth. From it also rises the power and passion that, had death relented, might have poured through his maturity. In this music, which Mr. Higginson cherished above all other, in a performance worthy of the zenith of the orchestra, sounded his true funeral rite in the concert hall.

Again it were duty to orchestra, to conductor, to hearers and to that fetich which is called "the record" to note the vigor of progress, the incisiveness of rhythm and accent, the largeness of phrase, the high pitch of tonal emotion, the sustained dramatizing energy with which Mr. Monteux projected Beethoven's symphony upon his hearers. There have been performances in easy memory which achieved a deeper beauty, which more abounded in imaginative stroke and shading, which sought and maintained a loftier voice. These distinctions lie well within Mr. Monteux's abilities, as he had proved, half an hour before, upon Schubert's music. For Beethoven's he preferred another way—a way that cost the transition into the finale not a little of its throbbing mystery, that made the slow movement seem short-breathed and a little impatient, but a way also that wrought the first movement into a tumult of passionate outcry and bore the finale to surging climax. Beethoven of the theatre, if the hearer chose, but Beethoven also dramatizing and dramatized in tones.

Between the symphonies, Brahms's concerto—a wholly unreasonable, an almost impossible task for conductor, orchestra and pianist in two or three days of preparation—came lengthily and went dryly in as lucid and painstaking performance as such circumstance permitted. When pianist after pianist had declined the solo part or foregone it because of other engagements, Mr. Félix Fox undertook it. His willingness as well as his accomplishment praise him. Equally diligent but equally hard-pressed was Mr. Monteux. And in this baffling music "the readiness" is by no means "all." The munificence, the sense of obligation, the just ambition of Mr. Higginson indeed founded the orchestra and for thirty-odd years sustained it. Through all those years, his devotion to the highest standards of repertory and performance never flagged. When he laid down the orchestra it was at the zenith of a deserved and unsurpassed fame. For once a founder and sustainer, a succession of conductors, an orchestra variously renewed had held fast to a single ideal and in its sign conquered. To ask of leader, band and pianist the impossible feat of Brahms's concerto made ready in two or three rehearsals was neither to honor Mr. Higginson's memory nor to maintain his standards. The maintenance of these ideals in even artistic course best commemorates, best perpetuates him.

H. T. PARKER

MUSIC A TRIBUTE TO HIGGINSON

Symphony Program Made Up of Favorite Numbers of the Founder

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.

Schubert, Unfinished Symphony.
Brahms, Second Piano Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Felix Fox.
Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.

The program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening was changed into a tribute to the memory of Major Higginson, for it was made up of three works which were his especial favorites. These works are not new to Boston and certainly require no analysis. It was a feast of classical music of the purest type.

The unfinished symphony was read with more of shading and finesse than romance. It probably contains the best melodies that were ever put into this form, for Schubert's symphonies were really songs in disguise and were never very powerful on the development side, although the andante contains some of the best figure treatment that Schubert ever achieved. Still, the melodies are the chief charm of both movements and the work can bear some degree of sentiment.

Beethoven's fifth symphony is also clear sailing, both for conductor and audience, and made up in its development what the Schubert work lacked.

MEASURING THE STANDARD.

The surprisingly effective performance of M. Rabaud with this orchestra was, however, not rivalled. Not that there are faults to find. M. Monteux is probably blameless in the matter. But there was a time when our orchestra was far ahead of every other organization of its kind, while now it is but one of a half a dozen good American orchestras. In such works as these two one can make comparisons with ease and surety, and measured by such a yard-stick, the superiority of our band is not as clearly evident as it used to be.

The chief figure of the first movement was sometimes ragged and the work was often boisterous. Even the strings did not shine in the andante, where there used to be a most perfect ensemble. It is possible that the sudden change of program caused a lack of rehearsals and that the men had not become used to the difference of reading from the former performances.

The Brahms concerto was far more complex than the symphonies before and after it. Yet the present writer recalls a remark of the late Professor Carl Baermann about this concerto: "When I first took it up I studied its difficult passages as a duty. But afterwards I began to see that each of these had a definite artistic purpose that could not have been expressed differently."

Mr. Felix Fox, our estimable resident pianist, was the soloist, and he conquered the difficulties which beset the thorny path with considerable success. It is a work which may have appealed to Major Higginson, who was a trained musician, but it certainly can never be an appeal to the general public; it was too abstruse for that.

FOX WAS THE FEATURE.

The pianist, too, can never shine here as in a Liszt or a Rachmaninoff concerto, for the soloist must frequently abnegate his prominence and must sink into the ensemble, as if he were but a single tone-color in a symphony. This Mr. Fox bravely did, and he deserves credit for his careful attention to the ensemble effects. He never attempted to make a solo out of this eminently orchestral work.

And the orchestra and M. Monteux seconded him well, so that, for the musician, this became the chief number of the concert. It was the most ambitious work that this pianist has ever done before a Boston public and we are glad to pronounce it successful.

The pianist did not play the work from memory, but had the music before him. This is unusual, but it is sensible, for it is certainly better that the music, rather than the performer, should be upon the rack. Mr. Fox was recalled with much enthusiasm at the completion of his task.

Post Nov 23

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Preceding an absence of two weeks, during which time the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in 11 cities of the South and West, Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of exceptional interest for the regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first number he will revive Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The Symphony has its tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his musical career. Attention will doubtless be attracted by a new work which will have its first performance upon this programme. "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a musical setting of Coleridge's poem by the talented and highly praised young composer, Charles P. Griffes. The rather important piano obligato to the piece will be played by Mr. Alfred De Voto. Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number.

As the soloist for this pair of concerts, Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, will sing three perennially beautiful songs, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's aria from the opera "Xerxes," from which the popular "Largo" was derived, and Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful."

Adv. Nov 23

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At next week's Symphony concerts Mr. Monteux will revive Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat. A new work which will have its first performance here is "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a musical setting of Coleridge's poem by Charles P. Griffes. The piano obligato will be played by Alfred de Voto. Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number.

Mme. Louise Homer, the contralto, will sing three songs.

Concerts

Nov 22

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Notably Interesting Programme for the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Heifetz Anew—Mr. Maier's Recital for Children—The Boston Quintet for Chamber-Pieces—Mrs. Littlefield in Songs—The First of the "Morning Musicales"—Other Entertainments

A NOTABLE new piece to be played for the first times anywhere, a long overlooked show-piece, and a piece from the "standard" repertory of the Symphony Concerts fill the orchestral part of Mr. Monteux's programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The new piece is a tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," suggested by fragments of Coleridge's half-forgotten verse and written by Charles T. Griffes, one of the younger and more imaginative American composers. As yet he is known in concert-halls only by songs, piano-pieces and a "Poem" for flute and orchestra while for the theatre he has arranged sundry Japanese dances for Michio Itow. Through nearly all his music flows a fantastical, visionary, quasi-Oriental vein that should be quickened by Coleridge's dream-steeped poetry. The show-piece is Mottl's arrangement for orchestra of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a glorified and transmogrified dance originally written for the piano and comparable in rhythmic vivacity and blaze of color with the composer's familiar "Espana." Not for long has it been played at the Symphony Concerts. The "standard" piece is Chausson's symphony in B-flat, lofty of mood, grave of voice, austere yet penetrating, worthy to companion Franck's symphony or d'Indy's in modern French music. For interludes Mme. Homer, the familiar and applauded alto singer, will assist the orchestra. Her numbers, nearly all of which she has already sung here, are the air from one of Bach's cantatas, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; the air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," best known in orchestral transcription as his Largo; Beethoven's swelling song, "Nature's Adoration," and an air, "O Don Fatale," from the sombre opera, "Don Carlos."

Herald Nov 23

SYMPHONY CONCERT

